COMMISSION.

VICTORIA by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland QUEEN Defender of the Faith. To Our trusty and well beloved THOMAS FLOWER ELLIS Esquire Barrister at Law and THOMAS BROS Esquire Barrister at Law Greeting:

WHEREAS We have deemed it expedient for divers good reasons and considerations that a Commission should forthwith issue for enquiring into the Criminal Laws now in force in Our Channel Islands and into the constitutions and powers of the Tribunals and Authorities charged with the execution of such Laws. Now KNOW YE that We having especial trust and confidence in your wisdom and fidelity have assigned nominated and appointed and do by these presents assign nominate and appoint you the said THOMAS FLOWER ELLIS and THOMAS BROS to be Our Commissioners to go into our said Islands for the purposes aforesaid. And for the better effecting the purposes of this Our Commission, We do by these presents give and grant to you or any one of you full power and authority to call before you or any one of you such persons as you shall judge necessary by whom you may be the better informed on the subject of this Our Commission and of every matter connected therewith. And also to call for have access to and examine all such Official Books Documents Papers and Records as may afford the fullest information on the subject, and to enquire of and concerning the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever. And We do hereby give and grant to you or any one of you full power and authority where the same shall appear to be requisite to administer an Oath or Oaths to any person or persons whatsoever to be examined before you or any one of you touching or concerning the premises. And Our further will and pleasure is, that you do and shall with as little delay as possible report to Us in Our Privy Council under your hands and seals respectively your several Proceedings by virtue of this Our Commission as the same shall be respectively completed and perfected. And We will and command and by these presents ordain that this Our Commission shall continue in full force and virtue and that you Our said Commissioners or any one of you may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof and of every matter and thing therein contained although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment. And we do hereby require all and every Our Officers and Ministers in our said Islands respectively to be aiding and assisting to you and each of you in the due execution of this Our Commission. And we have made choice of Our trusty and well-beloved CHARLES CLARK Esquire Barrister at Law to be Secretary to this Our Commission and to attend you in the execution thereof whose service and assistance we require you to use from time to time as occasion may require. In witness whereof We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent. Witness Ourself at Westminster. the Sixteenth day of May in the ninth year of our Reign.

By Writ of Privy Seal,

EDMUNDS.

FIRST REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY IN COUNCIL.

REPORT.

Your Majesty having been pleased to direct a Commission to us, who have hereunto subscribed our names and affixed our seals, nominating and appointing us to be Your Majesty's Commissioners to go into Your Majesty's Channel Islands, for the purpose of inquiring into the Criminal Laws now in force there, and into the constitutions and powers of the Tribunals and Authorities charged with the execution of such laws, and declaring it to be Your Majesty's further will and pleasure that we should, with as little delay as possible, report to Your Majesty in Your Privy Council, under our hands and seals respectively, our several proceedings by virtue of the said Commission, as the same should be respectively completed and perfected:—

We humbly report to Your Majesty that, upon receiving the Commission, we proceeded immediately with the inquiry with which Your Majesty was pleased to charge us; and that we have, to the best of our power, employed ourselves in arranging the materials which we have collected, and in forming our judgment as to the result.

We propose, at present, to lay before Your Majesty only so much as relates to the Island of Jersey. By this means we shall be enabled to submit, without further delay, what we believe to be quite sufficient to enable Your Majesty to take into consideration the measures, if any, fit to be adopted with respect to the Criminal Law of that Island. We believe that such measures may be discussed and determined upon quite independently of any matters, present or prospective, touching Guernsey and its dependencies. For, although the origin of the institutions of all the Channel Islands is historically one, the institutions themselves differ most widely. For instance, in Jersey trial by jury prevails in criminal cases, and its value is highly appreciated; in Guernsey it does not exist, and is looked upon with dislike and suspicion. In Jersey, the judicial and legislative powers are, to a great extent, separate; in Guernsey, they are almost completely blended together. Many other differences affecting, not simply the accidental details, but the very essence of the legal institutions might be pointed out. To this we may add that the Islands are very differently circumstanced as to the state of their political intelligence and knowledge, that the population in the two is very differently constituted, and that the feelings and wishes which they entertain as to their legal systems point continually in opposite directions. The intercourse between Jersey and Guernsey is, we believe, very much less than that between either and Great Britain. We see, on the whole, no reason for expecting that it will be found advisable to apply the same measures to the two; certainly not so as to detail, and, as we further believe, not as to principle.

The fact that Your Majesty had charged us with this inquiry became known in Jersey very shortly after the Commission issued. Two legal functionaries of the Island, the Bailiff and the Procureur Général, in consequence, honoured us with an interview in London, and pointed out to us several sources of information. We were thus enabled early to acquire some acquaintance with written works containing accounts, more or less minute, of many of the particulars into which we were to inquire; and we also had the great advantage of learning the names and addresses of persons capable of supplying us with valuable evidence. We then framed three series of written questions, for the purpose of obtaining, before we should visit Jersey, as much general knowledge of the criminal law as might prepare us for conducting an oral inquiry into details. The questions in the first series were directed to the general nature of the jurisdiction of the tribunals administering the Criminal Law of Jersey, the fundamental principles of the system of that law, and the course of practice; the second, to the general principles of personal responsibility, separate or joint; the third, to the general principles of evidence. These questions we addressed to the Bailiff, the members of the Bench, the legal functionaries of the Criminal Court, and the Bar. Answers were transmitted to us, prepared, in many instances, with an assiduity and fairness which we cannot too strongly acknowledge; and we found the advantage of having taken this step in the first instance much greater than we had anticipated.

We visited Jersey at the end of August, 1846. Immediately on our arrival, we were made acquainted with the course adopted on former occasions of Commissioners having been appointed by the Crown for Jersey; and we learned that the Commissions had been read to the States and there registered, and that their object and nature had been explained to the States by the Commissioners. We, therefore, in concert with the Bailiff, took steps for having this done; and, accordingly, the States, upon Your Majesty's Commission having been read, ordered it to be registered; and we then shortly pointed out to the States our view of the duty with which we were charged, and the course which we intended to pursue.

We proposed to conduct the oral examination in public, reserving to ourselves the power, should that appear to us necessary at any part of the inquiry, to exclude all but the parties under examination; but we found no occasion to act upon this reservation. We requested the Bailiff, the members and officers of the Royal Court, the Crown lawyers, and the members of the Bar, to attend as constantly as possible at these examinations; and we explained that we should examine different witnesses separately and successively, and that we desired that those who should be present would state, during the course or at the close of each such examination, any matters which they could supply, contradicting, modifying or illustrating the evidence given. During the examinations which ensued, the Bailiff was almost constantly present; some of the other members of the Bench also generally attended; and the law officers of the Crown and the members of the Bar gave attendance and supplied information with an alacrity and industry which, especially when we consider the continued professional calls made upon their time, we beg leave to point out to Your Majesty as a proof of their great anxiety to further the execution of Your Majesty's gracious purpose in issuing the Commission. It is to this circumstance that we are bound principally to attribute whatever approach we may have made to a satisfactory performance of the task imposed upon us.

In some instances also we derived valuable assistance from the suggestions of non-professional persons who had been led to take an interest in the subject of the Criminal Law of the Island.

We had announced that we should be ready to receive communications from any persons who would point out either proper subjects of inquiry, or important evidence. We expressed, at the same time, our wish that no evidence should be offered tending merely to throw blame on individuals without illustrating the system itself. We found it, as might be expected, not easy to confine the evidence within this proposed limit. As soon as any part of the system appeared likely, in itself, to produce evil effects, the question necessarily arose, whether it had done so in fact. This could scarcely ever be answered without bringing forward the conduct of individuals; so that the evidence was continually liable to take the form of personal attack and defence. The difficulty was the more to be regretted, because, in Jersey, the most conflicting opinions on many points of the institutions are strongly entertained and warmly expressed, and because a very vehement and active party feeling exists, manifesting itself upon almost every subject of public interest. This state of things has, no doubt, coloured the evidence which was given to us, and has made it necessary to exercise much caution in using the materials placed in our hands.

We found, also, very great difficulty in making it understood that we were not charged to redress individual grievances, nor even to inquire into them in any cases where the inquiry would not lead to some result connected with the general system. We refused numerous applications upon this principle. Another class of applications, which we refused, related to subjects upon which we conceived that our commission did not authorize us to enter. For instance, we declined entering into questions relating merely to civil injuries, to the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Courts, to the law of marriage, to commitment for contempt by a court acting as a civil tribunal.

We also, after the evidence had gone so far upon a subject as to authorize us, in our opinion, to form a decided judgment, declined receiving further evidence confirming our views, leaving ourselves open only to receiving evidence opposed to the result at which we had arrived.

We thought it important, before inquiring orally into other details, to make ourselves as far as possible familiar with the form in which the records of the criminal proceedings are made up. We therefore examined, in the first instance, the written Acts with the assistance of the Greffier and Commis au Greffe: both of these gentlemen afforded us very important assistance at this and other stages of our inquiry. Much information in this department was also supplied to us, in the course of the investigation, by the Viscount of the Island, who attended the examinations very constantly, and has devoted much attention to the history of the Law of Jersey.

We occasionally attended the Court in which criminal proceedings were going on, for the purpose of facilitating our understanding of the evidence given before us.

In conducting the oral examination, it did not appear to us requisite to administer any oath.

Having explained generally the course which we pursued for the purpose of obtaining information, we have now to lay before Your Majesty our views as to the present state of the Criminal Law in Jersey and the Tribunals and Authorities charged with its execution, and our opinion as to the efficiency of the present system, and as to such alterations as it may be expedient to make. It is impossible to conceal from ourselves that our judgment must be seriously affected by our previous habits as English lawyers. We have earnestly endeavoured to divest our minds of the prejudices incidental to a long familiarity with one particular system of law; but we cannot hope that we have altogether succeeded. We are, therefore, bound humbly to point out to Your Majesty that our opinions must frequently have been influenced by our own professional education, and that the views which we have adopted cannot be safely received without taking into consideration the point from which we have looked.

The Criminal Law of Jersey is derived from five sources. These are: first, the Customary Law; secondly, the Charters; thirdly, the Orders of the Sovereign in Council; fourthly, the Ordinances of the Local Legislature; fifthly, certain Statutes of the Realm.

The Customary Law originates in the ancient Norman institutions. The Island, as well as Guernsey and its dependencies, formed part of the Duchy of Normandy down to the reign of King John of England. When the continental part of the Duchy was conquered by the French King, Philip Augustus, about 1205, A.D., the sovereigns of England retained the Channel Islands. Theoretically, it would follow that whatever was law at the time of the separation is law still, unless it has been abrogated or modified by Charter, Order in Privy Council, Ordinance of the Local Legislature, or Statute. And, similarly, it is supposed that no law can in theory exist which was not then existing, unless it has been established by one of these four.

The principal authority as to the ancient customary law of Normandy is Le Grand Coustumier du pays et duche de Normandie. According to Sir Edward Coke (Preface to Inst. 2.), this work is compounded of some English laws given by Edward the Confessor, and of divers customs of the Duchy of Normandy. Coke appears to have taken this opinion from Rouillé of Alençon, who, in his prefatory comment on the Grand Coustumier, entitled Northmannorum Origo, speaks of Edward as "hujusce Normanicæ consuetudinis latorem sive datorem." Basnage dissents from this. Sir Edward Coke assigns the compilation of the work to the time of Henry III. of England, and places it about forty years after the coronation of Richard the First of England, that is, about 1229. For this he refers to certain passages in the Coustumier itself, and the Comment. The passages referred to seem not to prove more than that the compilation must not be dated earlier than the time of Richard I. But his date does not differ much from that given at the commencement of Le stille de proceder en pays de Normendie, which seems to be itself a commentary upon an Ordinance of the Parliament of Normandy, dated 21st January, 1515, and which probably was composed about 1539. This account is as follows: "Premieremēt est assauoir que en ce pays & duche de Normendie sont aulcunes loyx coustumes establissementz q̄ sont cōtenus au liure cōmunement nōme le coustumier de Normēdie & ainsi appelle. Lesquelles loyx & mesmes iceulx establissementz et coustumes sont tenues pour loyx aud' pays. Et y sont et ont este obseruez, tenuz, et gardez de toute anciennete, et au deuant q̄ lad' duche fust baillee p' le roy Charles le simple au duc Rou. Et depuis que le roy de Frāce Philippe auguste eust retire & mis dehors des mains des angloys lad' duche il se voulut enquerir des loyx & coustumes dudict pays et fit escrivre & mettre en pl' belle ordre ledict liure coustumier q̄l nestoit eu precedent. Tint et assembla cōseil ou furent les prelatz seigneurs barons du pays, par le conseil desquelz il auctorisa de rechief lesdictes loyx & coustumes ainsi ql appert assez p' vng chapitre dudict coustumier ou est contenu le conseil du roy Philippe" (whom Rouillé, in his commentary on ch. 110, considers to be Philippe le Hardi; which is manifestly a gross blunder) "quil tint a lislebōne: & est ledict chapitre en iceluy liure sur le pas ou il traicte de bref de patronnage deglise." This Council, however, contains merely regulations as to the trial of the right of ecclesiastical patronage in certain cases.

It is quite clear that the work, in its present form, belongs to some time later than that of St. Louis, who is mentioned in chapter 6: and we may perhaps place it at about the end of the thirteenth century, that is, from fifty to a hundred years after the separation. It contains the ancient Law and Custom of the Duchy, intermixed with ordinances (établissemens) of French monarchs down to the time of St. Louis.

A Latin Commentary on the Grand Coustumier was composed by Rouillé of Alençon, in the year 1533. This is annexed to the text in the edition to which we shall refer in this Report, that of 1539. There is also annexed a French Gloss, some parts of which seem to be of much greater antiquity than Rouillé's Latin Commentary; but, in its present shape, it appears to be a collection or amalgamation of glosses, brought down to the time of the edition of 1539. Other supplemental treatises and documents are added, comprising the Charter of Louis Hutin, called La Chartre aux Normans, Ordinances of the Court of Exchequer at Rouen, and of French kings down to the time of Francis the First, as well the Stille de proceder, of which we have already spoken. The whole collection, ncluding text and comments, is often simply cited under the name of Rouillé.

In the time of the reign of Queen Elizabeth of England, was published a posthumous work of Terrien, Lieutenant Bailiff of Dieppe. This work is entitled Commentaires dv Droict Civil, tant pvblic qve privé, obserué au Pays & Duché de Normandie. The Norman law is here professedly brought down to the time of the work. The several chapters of the Grand Coustumier which it contains are rearranged, and form a very small part of the whole. The treatise enjoys a high reputation among the lawyers of Jersey, for which we find it difficult to account. The intention of the author seems to have been to arrange and expound the Law of Normandy according to the system of the Civil Law; a design, as we think, ill conceived and ill executed. The treatise appears to us to be utterly vague and unsatisfactory, and to possess scarcely any of the requisites essential to a legal authority. Whichever be the correct estimate of the merits of this work, it can be of but little value for the purposes of the law of Jersey; inasmuch as it is, to a very great extent, made up of law which has been engrafted upon the Norman institutions since the separation, and which, therefore, is properly of no authority in Jersey. In Guernsey, indeed, it has, as we shall shew in our Report upon the Criminal Law of that Island, received a very remarkable recognition in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. But in Jersey it can be used, so far as we can judge, for little else than the occasional explanation which it furnishes of the old law as existing at the time of the separation.

These are the works principally referred to for the ancient customary law: but occasionally others are cited, which are either treatises on the Norman institutions generally, or on particular branches of them, or comments upon the customs of other parts of France, or legal works incidentally discussing points arising on the Norman Law. These we do not think it necessary to particularize.

The precedents of the Court are, of course, cited as authority for the customary law. A fire consumed all the Records in 1503. There are a few remaining, as old as 1504; but a nearly regular series commences at 1524. Since 1797, the Criminal Records have been kept apart from the rest. No authorized publication of them exists: nor is it probable that the demand for such a work would ever be sufficient to meet the expense of publication. Nor, as the Criminal Court is now constituted, does it appear likely that the decisions, if regularly made public, would be treated with the same deference as that which is shown in England to the published reports of the cases in Westminster Hall. The lawyers of Jersey do not quite agree in their estimate of the precise value which is to be attributed to a precedent: but, upon any view, it falls much short of that which English lawyers ascribe to a decision of their own courts. The recorded Acts of the Court are accessible to the legal profession; but they, of course, do not show the arguments urged, nor, save to a very slight degree, the grounds of the decisions. And, as they are neither digested nor indexed, the Judges and advocates have only their own recollection (or, in some few cases, manuscript memoranda of others) to guide them in the search.

The only Charter which has had much effect upon the Criminal Law of Jersey is that called the Constitutions of King John. In a note at page 223 of Durell's edition, published in 1837, of Falle's History of Jersey (of which the last edition published in the author's lifetime is dated 1734), it is said that an ancient copy of these Constitutions exists in the Tally Office in the Exchequer. We have caused inquiries to be made for it there; but it has long been missing. We take the document as printed in Falle. It is entitled "Inquisitio facta de servitiis consuetudinibus et libertatibus, Insul. de Gerese et Guernese, et legibus constitutis in Insulis per Dominum Johannem Regem, per sacramentum" &c., "qui dicunt," &c. Then follows the title, "Constitutiones et provisiones constitutæ per Dominum Johannem Regem, postquam Normannia alienata fuit." The common tradition agrees with the latter title. It is believed that, after Philip Augustus had conquered the continental part of the Duchy, King John of England bestowed these Constitutions upon the Island as a reward for their adhesion to himself. Some doubt has been entertained by antiquarians as to this tradition; but, on the whole, we think the probability is in favour of its truth. We do not, however, consider it necessary to discuss this question, as it is agreed that, whatever the origin of these Constitutions, they have for many ages been treated as a Charter granted by the Sovereign and accepted by the inhabitants. The present Royal Court is mainly founded upon these Constitutions, as we shall hereafter explain; but it will be found that several of the features of the judicial organization there established have disappeared.

By the Norman Law, the Duke had supreme legislative power. The form, which this authority now assumes, is that of Orders of Your Majesty in Privy Council: and this has been the course for several centuries. The Orders in Privy Council are registered by the Royal Court, and are not binding as law until such registration has taken place. This is so settled by an article in the Code of 1771, to which we shall advert subsequently. The Orders in Council always now contain a specific command that they shall be registered. It is, however, declared by the same Code that it is competent to the Royal Court, in any case where the Order appears to be contrary to the charters and privileges of the Island, or burthensome (onéreux), to suspend the registration until the pleasure of the Crown be further taken; though, if the Crown does not withdraw the Order, it must be registered.

These Orders in Council, in many instances, merely determine questions incidentally arising from time to time, and of only temporary interest. But, in other instances, they are of more general importance, especially when they contain a recognition and sanction of Acts of the local legislature, or of Reports and recommendations issuing from Commissioners.

The local Legislation is vested in the States.

This body is presided over by the principal civil officer of the Island, called the Bailli, or Bailiff, who is appointed by Your Majesty, and holds office during Your Majesty's pleasure. The States comprehend also thirty six members, namely, twelve jurats, twelve rectors of parishes, and twelve constables of parishes, or occasionally, in lieu of these last, the centeniers of parishes when the constable is necessarily absent, or his office vacant.

It is necessary, for the purpose of explaining the constitution of the States, to describe the parochial system in Jersey.

REPORT.

There are twelve parishes in Jersey. Each of them has its own Parochial Assembly, resembling, in many respects, an English vestry. It consists of the constable of the parish, and the centeniers (subordinate officers of police), the rector of the parish (or, in his illness, the vicar), and the principaux, which name designates those who are rated at a certain amount. The amount varies in the different parishes; the highest qualifying rate is 20 quarters of wheat, the lowest is 8. The quarter of wheat is here used merely as a name for a particular sum of money, and does not vary with the price of wheat: its value is fixed by an express law of 1833, which declares that an annual income of a quarter of wheat shall be estimated to represent a capital (in argent d'ordre) of 333 liv. 6 sous. 8 den., or rather more than 20*l.* English. Besides these, the following are ex officio members of the Assembly of the parish in which they reside: the Jurats, the two law officers of the Crown, namely, the Procureur Général and Avocat de la Reine, two functionaries of the Royal Court, namely, the Vicomte and Greffier, and certain parochial functionaries, namely, the Procureur du Bien Publique, the two Churchwardens (surveillans), the two Collectors of alms (collecteurs d'aumônes), and all who have in that parish served the office of constable or centenier, so long as they reside in the parish. The police officers of a lower rank, namely the vingteniers and the officiers du connétable, are also members of the Parochial Assembly, but do not, as the constables and centeniers do, continue so when out of office.

This Assembly makes the rate, subject to an appeal, by a party rated, or omitted from the rate, under certain circumstances, to the Royal Court. Every person possessing an annual income of two quarters, answering to a capital of rather more than 40*l.* sterling, is liable to be rated.

There are twelve Jurats (Jurés Justiciers) for the whole Island. They hold office for life. On a vacancy, the successor is appointed by the votes of all the rate-payers of the Island, there being no appropriation of any Jurat to a particular parish.

The rectors of the parishes are appointed by the Crown for life.

The constables and centeniers are appointed, for three years, by the votes of all the rate-payers of the particular parish. The vingteniers and the officiers du connétable are elected for the particular parish by the Parochial Assembly. They hold office for seven years in all the parishes except St. Hélier's, which contains the principal town of the Island; in that parish they are elected for four years only. The number of the officers is: for each parish 1 constable; 4 centeniers for St. Helier's, and 2 for each of the other parishes; from 7 to 2 vingteniers for each parish; 24 officiers du connétable for St. Hélier's, 15 for St. Brélade, and 12 for each of the other parishes.

The Procureur Général and the Avocat de la Reine are appointed by Your Majesty, and hold for life.

The Vicomte is appointed by Your Majesty, and holds during pleasure.

The Greffier is appointed by the Bailiff, and holds for life.

The Procureur du Bien Publique is appointed by the Parochial Assembly for three years.

The two Churchwardens are chosen annually, one by the minister, and one by the parishioners.

The two Collectors of alms are chosen in the same way.

We shall hereafter have occasion to remark on the constitution of the Parochial Assembly; but we have described it in this place, because, as has been shewn, twenty four of the thirty six members of the States are elected by the rate-payers, and the rate depends upon the Parochial Assembly.

Besides the Bailiff and the thirty six members of the States already mentioned, the Procureur Général and the Avocat de la Reine have seats in the Assembly of the States, and a right of debate, but no right of voting. The Vicomte has also a seat, but no right of speech or vote.

One portion of the States, namely, the Bailiff and the twelve Jurats, constitutes the Royal Court, which is the only criminal tribunal in the Island. We shall speak more fully of this Court at a later part of the present Report.

We do not think it necessary, for the purpose of this Commission, to enter minutely into the details of the process of debate and enactment in the States. It seems here only essential to report that the States have the power of passing laws which, as declared by the Order of Council in 1771, to be presently mentioned, are in force for three years. They cannot, however, become law if negatived by the Governor or (in his absence) the Lieutenant Governor, officers appointed by Your Majesty to hold during pleasure. Occasionally, Ordinances of the States are renewed from three years to three years, so as to give them the effect of permanent laws. It is, however, the common practice, when a permanent law is thought desirable, to pass it in the States, and submit it to Your Majesty in Council for approbation. When this approbation is received, the law is registered by the Royal Court, and becomes permanent.

In the year 1771, the States transmitted, for the approbation of the Crown, a Code of Laws, which received the Royal Assent in Council. By the Order in Council it was declared "that all other political and written laws heretofore made in the said Island, and not included in the said Code, and not having had the Royal Assent and Confirmation, shall be from henceforward of no force and validity." There may be some doubt as to the meaning to be attached to the words "political" and "laws heretofore made;" but we presume that they cannot comprehend the customary law, for, if they did, there would be hardly a criminal law existing in the Island.

The Code of 1771, on inspection, will be found to fall far short of that which, from the language of the Order in Council, it might be expected to be. It contains but one criminal enactment, namely, a provision as to accessories of criminals, and to prison breakers and persons aiding them. Mr. Marett, a distinguished advocate now practising in the Royal Court, after mentioning an unsuccessful attempt to obtain "une Commission pour préparer un Recueil de nos Lois et Coûtumes," adds, "Nous en sommes encore à désirer la réalisation d'un projet si utile, car personne, nous pensons, ne voudra prétendre que la compilation du petit volume relié en parchemin, qu'on s'est plu d'honorer du titre de Code, en ait diminué la nécessité." (Notice sur la Vie, &c., de Mons. Le Geyt, p. xii.)

One very important change was, however, made by the Order in Council which sanctioned the Code of 1771. Down to that time the Royal Court had the power of passing Ordinances without the assent of the States. But the Order in Council provides "that no Laws or Ordinances whatsoever, which may be made provisionally, or in view of being afterwards assented to by His Majesty in Council, shall be passed but by the whole Assembly of the States of the said Island." The union of judicial and legislative power is a feature not unfrequent in the constitution of imperfectly civilized States, and is generally discovered to be an oppression and abuse at an early stage of their advance. It prevails at present in Guernsey to a much greater degree than, as far as we can trace, it ever has prevailed in Jersey, and is there highly prized by a large portion, we believe the majority, of the inhabitants, as an important constitutional privilege. But it is surprising to find it endured so late as 1771 by the inhabitants of Jersey; and perhaps it is still more strange to find that the disunion of the two powers, which was commenced seventy five years ago, has not yet been completed.

In 1845 there was published, we believe by the authority of the States, a compilation entitled "Lois et Réglemens des États de Jersey, qui ont reçu la sanction Royale, depuis 1771." Among these will be found very few enactments connected with the general criminal law.

The source of the law of Jersey, which we have lastly to mention, is the Imperial Legislature. An Act of Parliament mentioning the Island is immediately law without registration; but such an Act is registered by the States under Order in Council to that effect. It does not seem to be quite settled whether it be necessary that the Island should be expressly named in order to bring the Act of Parliament within this rule, or whether it would be sufficient if it appeared, by necessary inference, that the enactment was meant to extend to the Island: but, on principle, we conceive that a necessary inference would be enough, as the only ground for construing an Act to be applicable to Jersey must be that it appears that the Legislature intended that it should be so applicable. Indeed, the Code of 1771 seems, by its language, to extend the effect of Statutes of the realm still further. "Quant aux actes de Parlement où l'Isle est rapportée, et dans lesquels elle est intéressée, ils doivent être exemplifiés en forme, sous le Grand Sceau d'Angleterre, et envoyés en ladite Isle, et là être enregîtrés, et publiés, afin que les habitans en aient la connoissance" (not to give them validity) "pour s'y conformer, et éviter les peines des transgressions."

In many instances, where it is thought that an Act of Parliament, though not so framed as to extend to the Island, might be applicable there with advantage, the States pass an Ordinance to the same effect, mutatis mutandis, which is transmitted for the approbation of Your Majesty in Council. Some alteration is, in such a case, almost invariably necessary, as the nature of the institutions of Jersey commonly renders the provisions of the English law inapplicable in detail.

We know of no change in the Criminal Law, introduced by Act of Parliament, except some that relate to matters of Commerce, Navigation, and the Customs.

We have enumerated the only acknowledged sources of the Criminal Law of Jersey. But, upon examining into the law as it actually exists, we can find hardly a single instance in which either the definition of a crime, or the punishment which is inflicted for it, can be traced distinctly to any of these authorities, except in the cases of offences against local regulations or fiscal enactments. A practice of the Courts, arbitrary and varying from time to time, seems to have nearly superseded the ancient law, and to be itself liable to future changes, equally arbitrary and variable.

The state of the Criminal Law of Jersey was the subject of discussion and review in the year 1789. In 1786 the majority of the States passed a vote for the establishment of trial by jury, in all cases, civil, mixed and criminal. This was submitted to the Privy Council: and by an Order in Council, made on the 10th of May in the following year, the Royal Court was ordered to state its objections for the information of the Lords of Council. Accordingly, on the 5th of July, 1788, a series of observations in opposition to the proposed plan was drawn up and signed by the Bailiff and seven Jurats. The Privy Council, after consideration of the observations, and hearing counsel on behalf of the States in support of the proposition, made an Order, on 21st of July, 1789, that M. Pipon and M. Durell, then respectively Procureur Général and Avocat de la Reine, and M. Hemery, one of the Jurats of the Royal Court, and M. Dumaresq, then Constable of one of the Parishes, the last two having been appointed agents for the States in prosecuting the matters before the Committee, should "conjointly or separately prepare and lay before this Committee, a statement of the mode of proceeding in the said Island, and of going to trial in all causes, criminal, civil, and mixed, containing therein what they apprehend to be the true law of the Island, from the first commencement of proceedings, in any of the said cases, to the final judgment thereupon had and obtained." And "that the said Thomas Pipon and John Thomas Durell, Esquires, and James Hemery and John Dumaresq, Esquires, do also prepare and lay before this Committee, conjointly or separately, what they conceive to be the criminal law of the Island of Jersey, specifying the crimes, enumerated in the said law, and the punishments thereby inflicted upon the commission of each of the said crimes."

Messrs. Pipon and Durell were considered to represent the view of the Royal Court, and Messrs. Hemery and Dumaresq those of the States. Accordingly, a Statement was prepared by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, which, on the 2nd January, 1790, was interchanged with a Statement prepared by Messrs. Hemery and Dumaresq. Both these Statements are said to represent fairly the actual condition of the law.

We ourselves examined the members of the Bar, in the presence of the Bailiff and several Jurats, as to the law prevailing in respect of the principal offences which form the subject of criminal jurisprudence generally; and we made use of the Statements above mentioned for constant reference during this examination. We have already declared in general terms the result at which we arrived: but we think it right to draw Your Majesty's attention to some instances in detail.

The punishments for crime, properly so called, mentioned in the Grand Coustumier, are: death, by burning, hanging, or burying alive; loss of limb, commonly according to a sort of lex talionis; and banishment. (Gr. Coust. ch. 23., and Gloss.). Banishment was, indeed, not properly a punishment, but the consequence of contumacy in flying from justice. Of these, hanging and banishment alone remain. The others have disappeared; and the Gloss sets forth rather curiously the principle upon which the law was modified in very early times.

"Plusieurs punitions demeurent en tel cas en la raison et discretion de justice

selon lexigẽce des cas, & semble q'l debueroit estre pillorie ou puny par longue prison, & par grande amende de justice, & a partie. Et luy pourroit len bien couper loreille ou ung poing selon lexigence des cas & lestat des personnes." And afterwards: "Toutesfois justice ne doibt pas estre ainsi legiere ne incline a pyllorier pour tel cas ou semblable ung homme destat ne a le punir par peines infamables ne par destresse de prison comme une simple personne. Mais le doibt punir par grandes et grosses amendes: tant a justice q̄ a partie. Et se len demandoit pour quoy les punitions ne sont terminees en tous iceulx cas comme elles sont en crimes capitales. Len pourroit respondre que cest pour la grand mutation et variation des cas qui adviennent qui sont differentz lun de lautre et dignes de greigneure punition lun que lautre selon leur circunstance. Et pour ce ny peut on vrayment determiner aultre punition. Mais conuient auoir recours a la discretion de justice et de raison, qui doibt sur ce pourueoir: en baillant punition greigneure on mẽdre selon que le cas le req'ert."

These passages were brought before us in evidence: and, although the very able lawyer, Mr. Hammond, who was then under examination, declined to state positively that such a discretion was now claimed, he added, "the practice has been very analogous to the reasoning of the passage which has been cited." And Your Majesty's Procureur Général, shortly afterwards, expressed himself thus: "The Court use their discretion or equity. Whether it is in consequence of that passage which has just now been cited, I cannot say."

The principle upon which the discretion was exercised, according to the passage cited, was the avowed incapacity of the law to classify crimes so as to assign proper punishments to each offence and each person. And some discretion of this sort must necessarily exist, even where the classification is as nearly complete as human language permits. By the English statute law, it is very commonly left to the Courts to assign, within certain limits, the length of transportation or imprisonment, and to select between the two; and the common law, in the cases of offences punishable by fine or imprisonment, leaves an almost unlimited discretion as to time and amount. This, however, is very different from sanctioning a system in which there are absolutely no limits, in any case whatever, and in which the very nature of the punishment is itself discretionary. The effect of the system at Jersey is, that a period of no long duration suffices to make particular kinds of punishment so entirely obsolete as practically to remove them from the law altogether. The changes of law have, generally, been made in the same direction with those of the English law. Thus, breaking into a dwelling house by night and stealing therein is now never visited with death, though it was formerly capital; and so with many other offences: and a still more remarkable change has taken place, apparently in imitation of the English Law. Transportation, which in England originates entirely in Statute, has been introduced into the Law of Jersey, and has now almost entirely superseded banishment. The language of the sentence of the Court is, "La Cour les a condamnés pour punition de leur crime à être deportés à tel lieu qu'il plaira à Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil d'ordonner pour le terme de sept années." Now, if the discretion lodged in the Court really be so large as to make this legal, it is, on principle, quite competent to the Court to order that a man convicted of stealing an apple should be broken on the wheel. It was, however, suggested that, in any case of transportation, the sentence acquired a legality from the Order of Privy Council, which ensues. Strictly speaking, any punishment whatever might be inflicted by Order of Privy Council, just as in England by Act of Parliament. But, if this be the real explanation of the sentence of transportation, there is, in every instance, an illegal sentence passed by the Court in Jersey, followed up by an ex post facto law legalizing the sentence in each particular case. This explanation, therefore, can hardly be received. Further, it is very doubtful whether the Order of Privy Council can be so construed. That Order recites the Act of the Jersey Court, and that the Court "have proceeded in this matter as far as they are authorized to do by the laws of the said Island." It then sets forth that "Her Majesty in Council was pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the said A. B. and C. D. be transported out of the Island of Jersey to Van Dieman's Land, &c." The true interpretation of this Order rather appears to be that the legality of the sentence of the Jersey Court is assumed, and that the Order simply assigns the place. An attempt was made in the Court of Queen's Bench, in Easter Term, 1847, to raise the question of the legality of the whole proceeding, by bringing before that Court, under a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, two criminals who were in an English prison under the sentence. But that Court held that the return to the writ asserted the legality of the proceeding; so that the principal question could be raised only by impeaching the truth of the return, which, of course, could not be done upon a motion to discharge the prisoners on reading the return.

The passage which we have already cited from the Gloss affords an instance of the attempts made by the Norman lawyers to connect, either by implication or strained interpretation, the actual practice with the little that has been committed to writing in the Grand Coustumier. In fact, that compilation cannot properly be considered as treating of Criminal Law otherwise than incidentally. In the Statement of Messrs. Hemery and Dumaresq the following remarks occur upon this subject (p. 48). "Generally speaking, we must say, that there is no criminal law here. The Grand Coûtumier of Normandy, which the said late majority of the Royal Court, in their observations, state to be (and very properly, if confined to civil causes) the municipal law of Jersey, can be considered, in no other light, than as a civil code; for although some chapters treat of criminal suits; and others make mention of crimes and misdemeanours, the punishments are not specified in either. The plan of the work in this respect, was evidently to point out the process by which persons injured in any shape might individually obtain redress, and what tribunal was competent to hear their suit. Crimes are also interwoven, for the sake of showing how property is affected by attaints. No corporal punishment indeed short of death or loss of limb, is at all mentioned; and then it is brought in by inference, and in no part enacted as a law." The counter Statement of Messrs. Pipon and Durell contains many attempts, altogether unsuccessful as it appears to us, to deduce the present criminal law from the ancient Norman law. We shall presently have occasion to advert to them more fully. We will, however, add one more instance of this attempt at accommodation, from the old Gloss.

Under the head of Suyte de Meurdre (ch. 68. fol. 90.), the Grand Coustumier, after detailing the process by which the son, &c., of a person supposed to have been murdered may pursue his remedy against the accused party by battle, goes on to declare that, if there be no person to institute this proceeding and a party be generally suspected of the crime, he is to be put in prison for a year and a day, "a peu de menger et de boire," unless he offer to undergo the inquest of the country. On this the Gloss has the following comment. "Et iasoit ce que le texte ne declaire poinct en ce pas que len doye mettre en tourmētz cil qui est accuse de tel cas, si le y peut on mettre. et ainsi est use et garde notoirement. Et la cause pour quoy le texte nen parle, est pour la diversite et variation des questions et tourmentz qui y sont cōuenables en tel cas." "Et si peut on dire que telles destresses peuēt assez estre entendues par le texte que met, que on doibt tenir en prison cil qui est accuse de tel crime jusques a ung an et ung jour a peu de boire et de menger: lesquelles choses supposent destresse."

It is, we think, plain that the licence assumed by the Court is not a deviation from the general spirit of the old Norman law, and that it is in conformity with the same spirit that attempts are made to reconcile the practice in fact with what is found in writing.

In the Grand Coustumier, chapter 67, which treats "De querelles," we find the earliest passage which can be referred to as classifying offences: and it completely confirms the opinion expressed in the passage before cited from the Statement of Messrs. Hemery and Dumaresq, as to the absence from that compilation of any thing which can be considered a distinct account of the Criminal Law.

"Querelles" are thus described "Q̄relles sōt contendz entre celuy q̄ se plaīct & celuy de qui len se plainct." Then these querelles are divided into those which relate to persons, and those which relate to other matters. The divisions and subdivisions of the first class lead to certain heads of Criminal Law. The classification may be exhibited as follows.

Querelles appertain

I. To things other than persons.

II. To persons, which are

1. De dict.
2. De faict, which are
   - A. Simples.
   - B. Criminelles, which are
     - a. De meurdre.
     - b. Dhomicide.
     - c. De mehaing.
     - d. De tresues fraīctes.
     - e. De despucellemēt de femmes a force.
     - f. De roberie.
     - g. Dassault de charue.
     - h. Dassault de maison.
     - i. [Dassault] en la possessiō a cil qui fut assailly.
     - j. De trahison.

The Grand Coustumier adds: "Toutes telles manieres d' suytes sōt appellees de felonnie." And in chapter 75 it is laid down that, in all suytes which may terminate capitally, the offence complained of must be alleged, in the plaint, to have been committed "en felonnie & en la paix de dieu & du duc." For all these crimes the trial was by loi apparissant, which terminated in bataille when suyte was made, and, when suyte was not made, by enqueste de recongnoissant. And all might be compounded, after gages given for battle, except trahison and larçin. (G. Coust. ch. 76.) But the word felony no longer appears in legal proceedings as designating a class of crime in Jersey. It is, however, found in an Ordinance of March 7, 1842, which speaks of offences "au dessous de félonie."

According to the Grand Coustumier (ch. 67.), the appellation of "criminal" is used "pource q̄ elle nayst de tel crime dequoy len doibt et peut perdre vie ou membre." Prosecutions for these appear to constitute one class of the Pleas of the Sword. A Plea of the Sword (plet de lespee) is defined in the Gloss (ch. 53. c.) to be "proces dexces & de malefices." In another passage of the Gloss (ch. 6. l.), the words of the Grand Coustumier "pour causes criminaulx ou pour le plet d' lespee," are thus commented on: "il sentent par ce mot [le plet de lespee] pour aulcuns malefices qui ne sont pas criminaulx." As we find that, in chapter 53, prosecutions for murder and homicide are mentioned as instances of the Plea of the Sword, we conceive that the Pleas of the Sword comprehended prosecutions for all offences, but that, of these, offences of one class only, those visited by loss of life and limb, were termed criminal.

The Gloss on chapter 67 (e.) states that there are many other modes of making suyte in criminal matters, besides those specified in the Grand Coustumier, and mentions, as instances, suytes in the case of "aggresseurs de chemins publiques, de sacrileges & aultres selon les matieres des mesfaictz;" and adds, that the classification "met les plus generales manieres de faire suytes criminelles, soubz lesq̄lles peuent estre cōprinses toutes les aultres particulieres, selon ce q̄ les mesfaictz sont faictz, & que les cas aduiennēt."

In the Constitutions of King John the following exception is made from the jurisdiction of the Royal Court. "Exceptis casibus nimis arduis, et" [supposed to be a wrong reading for ut] "si quis legitimè convictus fuerit a fidelitate Domini Regis tanquam proditor recessisse, vel manus injecisse violentas in ministros Domini Regis modo debito officium exercendo." This takes away the jurisdiction for the offences comprehended under the head j. But the offences, numbered a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i, would all, where no positive enactment has interfered, be, according to the text, punishable legally by loss of life or limb. We have already mentioned the forms of punishment known to the Norman Law, and have pointed out that loss of limb is, in fact, no longer inflicted, and that the different modes of inflicting death have all disappeared except hanging.

The punishment of death is still inflicted for murder (headed a.).

As to the head b., the lawyers of Jersey now define homicide to be killing without malice. The remarks upon this part of the law, in the Statement of Messrs. Pipon and Durell, afford a very curious instance of the perpetual and fruitless attempt to reconcile the modern practice with the old and unrepealed law. "Homicide, or the killing of another without malice is not punished with death, but with such other punishment as the circumstances of the case may render proportionate to the degree of guilt; and may be extended to perpetual banishment: this distinction and degree of severity, we hold to accord with the custom first quoted above, where homicide is pointed out as an offence different from murder, and ranked among the crimes punishable by loss of life, or limb, by which it must be implied that the crimes against which those punishments are denounced, shall incur the one or the other of them, according to the degree of guilt which may have accompanied the action: and Terrien seems in his annotations upon murder and homicide book 12. ch. i. to confirm that distinction where he says, letter E. 'Some allow a difference between murder and homicide, saying, that murder is done wilfully or voluntarily and with deliberate purpose, and homicide albeit it be a general term, is understood of that which happens in rixâ, and which is done in present anger.' As the punishing by loss of limb is long since disused, and was so even at the time the commentator" (i. e. the French Gloss, already cited in this Report) "wrote upon the ancient custom, as appears in his annotations upon ch. 23. of forfeitures, letter A. where he says 'for the exposition of this question one must take notice that anciently it was usual to inflict on an offender in such case, a punishment equal to the crime by him committed, that is to say, if one put out the eye of another, by the loss of one eye &c. and this was called punishment or law, ad pœnam talionis. But at this day this law is not observed because in such case several punishments are left to the judgment and discretion of justice according to exigency; and ought to be by pillory, long imprisonment and heavy fine to the King and to the party.' It will not appear strange that the last mode is now followed that is of punishing by banishment, imprisonment or fine according to the nature of the offence and the degree of guilt." It is remarkable, however, that what follows in the Gloss distinctly shows that mutilation was not disused, although the lex talionis was no longer strictly applied. And, further, we find the following distinction between murder and homicide in the Gloss on chapter 70 (b.). "On peut dire q̄ meurdre et homicide sont en escript tout vng: mais ilz differēt en maniere de faire: car meurdre est quād aulcun est occis p'estrangler ou meurdrir ou en sēbleble maniere: et homicide est quād aulcun est occis p' playes et occisions despees, et de haches ou daultres ferremētz." Passing over these difficulties, the course of the reasoning by which it is thus attempted to reconcile the present law with the ancient custom is, as far as we can comprehend it, as follows. The custom of the 13th century prescribes, for both murder and homicide, loss of life or limb, but thus implies a distinction between the two crimes; loss of limb was in part discontinued in continental Normandy in the 16th century, and pillory, imprisonment and fine substituted. Therefore, in Jersey, it accords with the custom to punish homicide without malice neither by loss of life, nor of limb, the only punishments mentioned in the custom, but by three other methods, two only of which are substituted in the 16th century, and the third not assigned to the particular offence at all by any law alleged, in the argument, to have prevailed at either time. This distorted and contradictory argument is resorted to, apparently, from unwillingness to state plainly that the ancient law prescribed one punishment, but the tribunals of Jersey have chosen, on account of its indiscriminate severity, to substitute another.

About a century before the Statements of 1790 were interchanged, the state of the Jersey law, as to homicide, came under the consideration of the Privy Council. In March, 1689, the deputies of the States represented "the great defect in their customs of proceedings in criminal causes;" and the King in Privy Council, "in regard that there is no distinction made there betwixt wilful murder, manslaughter, and chance medley," ordered "that, if for the future it shall appeare by good evidence to the Royal Court in Jersey, upon the tryal of any persons for murder, manslaughter and chance medley, that there is no premeditated malice, and that the partys are fitt objects of mercy, the judges of the said Court do upon such occasions suspend all further proceedings against the criminal, until His Majesty be made acquainted with the state of their respective cases, and His Royal pleasure be signified thereupon." The immediate occasion of this Order was the trial in Jersey of Jean Aubin, who had slain a man, as was found by the jury, unintentionally. The Judges remanded him to prison "jusqu'à autre ordre." Application was then made to the Crown; the prisoner was discharged by Royal order; and, there having been a contemporaneous representation of the defect of the law of Jersey in this respect, the general Order was made, as above stated.

Le Geyt, the learned commentator on the constitution, laws and usages of Jersey (writing very shortly after the time of the last mentioned Order), relates this occurrence (vol. i. p. 324). He also mentions two earlier cases, which are, he says, all that he has been able to find on the subject. The first was that of André Laurans, in 1646. He was accused "d' avoir proditoirement frappé," causing death; but he alleged that he had done it in self-defence. The majority of the jury "ont rapporté à la décharge dudit Laurans." The judgment of the Court was remarkable. "Ledit Laurans a esté déclaré exempt de la rigueur des loix et peine deüe à tel forfait. Nonobstant, veu le soupçon, ledit Laurans est envoyé prisonnier au Chasteau, si" (jusqu', in the original record), "à ce que Messieurs de la Justice en ayent communiqué avec Monsieur le Lieutenant-Governeur, pour après estre procédé à son eslargissement." No liberation, however, of the prisoner appears on the Acts of the Court; but Le Geyt mentions that "quelque temps après la prison fut rompue." He observes that it is not clear what was the intention of the Court; but he considers it probable that they meant "d'en faire par là quelque exemple pour rendre le monde plus précautieux dans les querelles." He infers, however, that at that time not every homicide was considered a murder. The second case which he mentions occurred in 1666. A soldier named Wilson killed a man named Coke, by a musket-shot; the evidence showed that the event was accidental; and the law officers of the Crown abandoned the prosecution: and the Record of the Court states: "Le dit Wilson demeure partant en liberté et déchargé de la poursuite faite contre luy à raison de la mort ainsi arrivée audit Coke inopinément et par un accident que le dit soldat ne pouvoit prévoir." This, says Le Geyt, "fait voir combien peu de penchant l'on avoit alors pour ne pas distinguer l'homicide." A remarkable passage on this subject is to be found in the Gloss on chapter 75 of the Grand Coustumier, where the text contains the passage, which we have already cited, stating the necessity of charging felony in the plaint. The Gloss (d.) says: "Est pour determiner la differēce de ceulx qui sont occis ou mehaingnez daulcun par aulcune fortune on inaduertēce: et de ceulx qui sont occis ou mehaingnez a essient. Et par ce peut on dire que se aulcun estoit mehaingne par fortune ou inaduertence quil pourroit suyuir de gaige, et ne seroit pas le cas criminel" (but a civil querelle, we presume, triable by loi apparissant): "mais seroit le mafaicteur puny pour exemple, selon la discretion de justice" (besides, as we conceive, the amends to the kinsman of the party slain, or to the party maimed). "Et toutes fois fault il biē noter que lingnorance ou inaduertence du cas soit de soy excusable, et quil ny ait poinct de mal appensement." It is to be regretted that we cannot fix the date of this Gloss: it is, however, worthy of observation that the only case exempted, on the ground of the absence of malice, is accidental homicide. About twenty years after the case of Wilson followed the trial of Aubin, and the Order in Council already mentioned, with two or three more Orders nearly to the same effect.

Le Geyt complains, and we think very reasonably, of the Order in Council. It seems quite clear that a distinction between different kinds of homicide was already recognised by the Court of Jersey: and, had this not been so, the proper course would have been to introduce a fresh law, not to leave the old law to be corrected by a pardon from the Crown.

In 1699 a different view was taken by the Privy Council. It is recited, by an Order of that date, that an Order of 1698 was grounded upon a representation, formerly made to His Majesty, that by the law of the Island "the punishment was capital in all cases where any person was found guilty of the death of a man, and that there was no distinction of punishment in cases of murder, manslaughter or chance medley: and His Majesty having been since informed that, according to the law and ancient usage of that Island, the Bailiff and Jurats upon the tryall of any person accused for the death of another, unless they find the offence to be murder, do not procced to inflict capital punishments for the same, but to inflict lesser punishments, according to the nature and circumstances of the offences; His Majesty hath, therefore, thought fitt in Council to order that the said Order of the 23rd of June, 1698, for stay of execution in cases of murder, manslaughter and chance medley, until his Majesty's pleasure could be known, shall be restrained to cases of murder, and other cases where capital punishment is inflicted, and where the said Court shall think the offender a fitt object of His Majesty's mercy, and no other."

It being thus established that the Norman law, though not formally repealed, is practically abrogated in this respect, the question which next arises is, what line is drawn between murder and mitigated or justifiable homicide. In the English law the distinctions on this point are laid down with anxious and minute jealousy, producing, as has been sometimes thought, an excess of scruple and subtlety. But we find nothing of the sort in the law of Jersey. Le Geyt, who shews (as above) that the distinction between murder and other homicide had become known to the law of Jersey, is compelled, in explaining that distinction, to rely upon the analogies deduced from the Mosaic, Civil, English and French law. At present, English books are constantly cited on the subject. The learned Advocates, who gave evidence before us, did not quite agree how long this had been the practice: but it has certainly prevailed for several years. They also differed as to the degree of reliance to be placed, in this and other criminal questions, upon the English authorities. Some seemed to consider that they could be used merely as illustrations, and that, in this respect a treatise from any other system of law ought to have equal weight. But there seems to be no doubt that the English authorities are those to which by far the most frequent reference is made.

We have dwelt upon this head of crime the more fully, because it enables us to present to Your Majesty's view a very strong instance of the general principles and practice under which the present system has grown up, and because it so happens that we are here enabled to trace the transition with rather more particularity than in other cases. We have, in the customary Norman law of the 13th century, homicide classed among the crimes punishable by loss of life or limb (probably the former only), and no other punishment mentioned in conjunction with that offence. The cause of this was, we have little doubt, that the punishment was, in the earliest state of this law, considered principally as furnishing reparation to the party injured, a principle not peculiar to Normandy. In the 16th century we find Norman commentators laying it down that, in the case of some crimes, a discretionary mitigation, to be exercised according to the difference between offences and persons, was consistent with the spirit of the custom, and stating, in particular, that accidental homicide was not a felony, and therefore not properly a crime, nor punishable with loss of life or limb. In the 17th century we find that the Court of Jersey took notice of the distinction between different kinds of homicide, and inflicted death for murder only; but that this was far from being completely understood, that the punishments for the lesser grades of the offence were unsettled, and that the consequence was a series of contradictory and ill digested legislative acts by the Privy Council. At the close of the 18th century, we find a practice to prevail, closely resembling that of England, and widely differing from the Norman law, but still asserted to be deducible from the custom. At present, we find the same practice and the same assertion, with this only addition, that the conformity to English law appears to be more completely established and less scrupulously avowed.

Mehaing, or mayhem, is not defined in the Grand Coustumier. The French Gloss on chapter 74 is as follows. "Il conuiēt quil y ait sang & playe ou aultre chose q' equipolle dont il sensuyue perdition de membre, comme dun bras, ou dune jambe, ou dauoir les yeulx creues." And, shortly afterwards, "mehaing est quand aulcū est blecie en telle maniere q'l en perd aulcū membre: sicōme pied, ou pōig, ou aultre mēbre principal, come les yeulx. Et ne seroit pas mehaing comme il est prins en ce p'pos dauoir ung oeuil creue ou vng doig couppe: car les deux yeulx ne sont que vng membre principal. Et aussi ung doig nest que partie dun membre principal." Terrien says (xii. l.), "Mehaing est perdition de membre:" and it is afterwards added: "Il est ordinairement prins pour toute blessure & coup donné a sang et playe." Messrs. Pipon and Durel say: "This crime, agreeable with the foregoing explanation" (that given under the head of Homicide) "instead of being punished by the loss of member for member as anciently it was, would now be punished by fine and imprisonment with damages to the party injured proportionate to the degree of guilt attending the action, and the consequence of the hurt received; and where it was very atrocious corporal punishment might be inflicted." We are not quite certain whether they here speak of mayhem as a definite crime, or simply as a species of assault for which the law of Jersey (as will be afterwards explained) allows a mixed criminal and civil process. But it can scarcely be said that there is anything in the modern law answering to the crime spoken of in the Grand Coustumier. In lieu of mayhem, the party is charged with the specific act, and, if found guilty, is punished by transportation, or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, and with or without a fine.

With respect to the crime of Tresves frainctes, we copy the account of Messrs. Pipon and Durell. "Forfeiture of security to keep the peace by Rouillé, treues frainctes. As this security consisted anciently in the solemn assurance given in Court on oath to keep the peace, and neither do, nor procure to be done hurt to the complainant his family or possession the violation of such assurances was considered in the eye of the law as meriting exemplary punishment" (loss of life or limb, according to the Coustumier): "but at this day as this security is given upon pain of a pecuniary fine, the infringement would now go to the forfeiture of the recognizance, and to such further restraint upon the delinquent or punishment as the nature and evil tendency of the repeated violence and wrong offered might authorise. Rouillé upon this head chap. 72, letter B. lays down 'And therefore one must observe that forfeiture of securities in the manner they are taken in lay Court, is an assurance which is made by the corporal oath, that he who gives them shall not do hurt by himself or others to the person to whom given nor to his.'" It appears that a suyte for tresves frainctes, down to the time of the French Gloss, could not have been instituted without what is called a Cry of Haro, which is a formal public outcry made by a party to whom, or whose property, violence is offered. This, however, has altogether disappeared from the Criminal Law, without any enactment. And, in the Norman law, suyte for tresves frainctes could be made only where there was blood and wound. (G. Coust, ch. 76.) But this is not a requisite in the case treated of by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, which, it is manifest, in no degree represents that which the Coustumier lays down respecting this head of crime.

From the language of the Coustumier, it seems that the definition of the crime of rape was once not so wide as at present; it appears not to have originally comprehended anything besides the violation of maidens. Terrien, who is referred to by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, shews (xii. 14.) that in 1518 the law of continental Normandy inflicted a lighter punishment than death when the female was of loose character; but this he speaks of as a qualification or explanation of the Civil law. The crime in Jersey is understood to be the violation of any female; and the legal punishment is death. Thus the present law is not that of the Coustumier or even of Terrien; how or when it originated we cannot trace. It is, we think, impossible to treat the chapter in Terrien as of the least authority in the criminal law of Jersey. He mentions, under the head Rapt, the inveigling of young women into marriage without the assent of their parents or guardians; and he cites the following case. "Nous auons veu donner arrest plus rigoureux au Parlement de ce pays, par lequel vne chambriere, pour auoir attrait à son amour vn ieune homme fils d'vn riche bourgeois & marchant de Roüen, en la maison duquel elle estoit seruante, et l'auoir espousé clandestinement & au desceu des pere et mere du ieune homme, a esté condamnee à estre foüettee par les carrefours, bannie du Royaume de France, ses biens confisquez: et condamnee en quatre cens liures d'interest enuers le pere, & à tenir prison jusques au plain payment." This is clearly the Rapt de Séduction, which was unknown to the old Norman Law. This instance is one of many which shew with how great qualifications we are compelled to receive the evidence, upon this point, of one of the learned Advocates, who referred us to Rouillé and Terrien as satisfactory authorities for the unwritten law.

The definition of the crime of robbery, in the Grand Coustumier, appears from the language of the complaint: "Je me plaīg de B. qui en la paix de dieu et du duc massaillit, et me batit, et me fist sang et playe, et me tollit ma chape en roberie: pour quoy il me cōuinst crier haro." (Ch. lxxi.) The French Gloss lays down, "Il cōuient quil y ait eu sang & playe et cry de haro." This is requisite, says the Gloss, lest strong men should make false plaints against feeble men: the danger contemplated being, we suppose, the result of a trial by battle between unequal parties, which therefore was not allowed unless the robbery was characterized by manifest blood and wound. The Gloss adds afterwards, "Et p'ce que dict est sensuit que de larcin q̄ est fait furieusement" (a misprint, apparently, for furtivement), "len ne peut suyr de gaige" (and therefore no querelle criminelle). "Car les conditions dessusdictes ny sont ne peuent estre, par especial le sang et la playe: car se ilz estoient avec le haro, ce seroit roberie: et ainsi different roberie et larcin: car roberie est faicte a force et a cry de haro, et malgre celuy que on robe en sa presence. Et larcin se faict furtivement en derriere et absence de celuy a qui on emble."

The distinction is here drawn between theft with violence and theft without violence. For the latter no querelle criminelle, properly so called, seems to have been allowed, nor can we find distinctly that it was subjected to punishment merely as a public offence. It is true that it appears, from the 53rd chapter of the Grand Coustumier, that persons holding certain feudal tenures might, in some cases, entertain a suyte de larçin, whereas, in general, all suytes leading to corporal punishment (justice de corps) were exclusively in the jurisdiction of the Duke, or of those to whom such jurisdictionw as specially granted ("ceulx, a qui les princes de Normendie ont ottroye a avoir la court de telz choses,") evidenced by prescription or otherwise: but we believe that the suyte of larçin was an exception; for the Gloss on the 53rd chapter (fol. 73. f.) states that for this offence the offender might be adjudged to be hanged. The Gloss refers to the Ordinance commonly cited as the Chapitre De La Justice aux Barons, which limits the power of the feudal lords, in cases of larçin, to particular cases. We infer, on the whole, that the larçin thus spoken of comprehended larçin with violence, the capital crime.

In the 12th chapter of the Grand Coustumier "larrons" are mentioned as well as "robeurs;" but we believe the word "larron" to comprehend persons guilty of any larçin, violent or not; for, in chapter 3, the following passage occurs: "Aulcunesfois appelle len justice, la peine qui est enjoincte a aulcun par sa desserte: sicomme len dict. Je vy faire la justice du roy, dun larron que je vy pendre." And, in chapter four, it is said to be the office of the bailly "destruire les larrons;" and in that and the succeeding chapter the word is unquestionably used as descriptive of robbers, no other word for robbers occurring.

But from the 87th chapter, and the Gloss there (g.), it appears that larçin might be treated as a civil querelle de possession, to be tried, when the value of the property taken did not exceed ten sous, by loi simple (preuve de certain only, for the enqueste de droict, according to the Gloss on ch. 87. h., could not be resorted to), and by loi apparissant (bataille only, for, according to the Gloss on ch. 87. h., the enqueste de recongnoissant was here inapplicable) when the value was higher. Both these processes were in the nature of civil remedies; even the bataille was of a more mitigated kind than that waged in process properly criminal. The Gloss on chapter 87. g. appears to contemplate cases where the injured party had an election whether he would seek a remedy exclusively civil for a larçin, tending only to restitution of the thing stolen. The querelle was then only simple. We do not know whether this could take place in the case of a larçin with violence. In chapter 54 of the Grand Coustumier, it is said: "Les aultres querelles sont appellees simples" (opposed to criminelles): "pour ce que ceulx q̄ meffont en sont chastiez simplement, ainsi comme lenfant de la verge." This undoubtedly comprehended amends which the malefactor made to the party injured, upon a proceeding partly, at least, civil in its nature. But some punishment, as distinguished from mere remedy to the party injured, seems to have been awarded in cases of offences not amounting to murder, mayhem, or any thing to which the cry of haro appertained, as early at least as the date of the Gloss on chapter 12. b. Perhaps Terrien's Commentary (xii. 1.) upon the passage last cited from ch. 54 of the Grand Coustumier, represents the law correctly. "Chastiez simplement. C'est à sauoir d'amende pecuniaire enuers le Roy, et enuers la partie."

We do not pretend to speak positively as to the ancient law; and it is indeed very probable that the Gloss, though professing to explain the Grand Coustumier, lays down a law which had sprung up since its time.

Terrien (xii. 18.) speaks of robbery much in the language of the Grand Coustumier and Gloss. And afterwards (xii. 20.), referring to the passage, already cited from chapter 3 of the Grand Coustumier, which speaks of hanging a larron, he says that such rigour is not observed for the first and second offences of "simple larcin;" for that a larron is, for the first offence, merely whipped; for the second, besides being whipped, he has an ear cut off, or is branded and banished, with interdiction; and, for the third, he is hanged as incorrigible. But for a larçin "notable & qualifié" he may be put to death on the first offence: of which Terrien gives two instances, namely, for a "larçin domestique," and for cutting a purse in Court, "durant l'audience."

Messrs. Pipon and Durell treat very shortly of robbery. They define it to be "taking from a person by violence as on the highway, or from his house:" and they say that it is punishable with death; for which they refer to the Grand Coustumier. They adopt the law stated by Terrien, as to larçin which is not robbery. This law, they say, "seems deducible from that distinction made by the Coustumier between simple larceny, and the other kind styled as considerable and heinous larceny." We have, however, been unable to find the passage in the Grand Coustumier to which they here refer.

The present law of Jersey appears to be entirely unconnected with that laid down by any of the authorities which we have mentioned. The words felonnie, roberie, larçin, have disappeared. For all thefts, the word is now "vol:" and, in the charge, additional words are added to mark the aggravating circumstances, if any: as, for instance, "vol avec violence," "vol dans une maison habitée avec effraction," "vol dans la nuit." The sentence depends upon the degree of crime: but it is not easy to state the limits. At one time, vol avec effraction dans la nuit was punished by death; but this has not taken place for forty years; and it is doubted whether it would now be a legal punishment. The punishments now are transportation, imprisonment with or without hard labour, or banishment. Robbery with violence is punished in the same way, the old law being totally abrogated in this respect. And it seems to be agreed that what is laid down as to simple larçin in Pipon and Durell, if it ever was law, is so no longer, and that it would be illegal to put to death for a third simple theft.

The "vol, dans une maison habitée, avec effraction, dans la nuit," is the offence corresponding to one case of burglary, in the English law, that where the particular felony contemplated is stealing, which is effected. We were told that the effraction must be an actual breaking and not merely, as in the English law, a technical breaking; and that this would be a question of common sense. We found, however, that the learned advocates did not agree as to what would be the result of this test in a very simple case, that of lifting a latch and thrusting in the hand only. Burglary in the larger sense, breaking into a dwelling house by night with intent to commit felony, stands on a different footing from vol. The case was brought before the Privy Council in 1790. John Rival was charged with getting in at a window, convicted, and sentenced to be whipped, banished from the Island for seven years, and his personal property confiscated to the use of the king. The Court then reported the case to the Sovereign as follows. "But the Court, at the same time, considering that there is no positive law or custom in the country which decrees a punishment for the crime in question, and that the Judges are obliged, by their oath, to pronounce sentence according to the laws and customs of the Island; the Court judged that the sentence should be suspended until your Majesty's pleasure should be known." The Committee of Privy Council pronounced as follows. "The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to Your Majesty's said order of reference, have taken the said Act and proceedings into consideration, together with a subsequent letter of the 23rd of June, 1790, from the Greffier of the Royal Court, written by direction of the said Royal Court, in which it is set forth, That formerly the Royal Court did certainly order the infliction of corporal punishments without seeming to need the authority of a law, or having any fixed rule to go by, as appears by the dissimilarity of punishments inflicted for crimes of the same nature. That the Royal Court exercised also the power of legislation; laws and ordinances were as often enacted by them as by the body of the States: but of this accumulated power of legislation and jurisdiction the Royal Court were deprived by His Majesty's Order in Council, bearing date the 28th March, 1771, and prefixed to the Code of Laws; which Order expressly declares that all other political and written laws heretofore made in this Island, and not included in the said Code, and not having had the Royal assent and confirmation, shall from thenceforward be of no force or validity. Whereupon their Lordships do agree humbly to report as their opinion to Your Majesty, That, as there is no law in Jersey, for so they are informed, to make burglary a capital offence, it cannot be considered as a felony, unless the breaking of the house in the night time is accompanied with a theft; but the simple act of breaking into the house, especially if done with an intent to steal, is a very high trespass and misdemeanour, and punishable by fine, imprisonment, corporal punishment, or banishment for a certain time, according to the discretion of the Court; and they are therefore of opinion that there is no defect of law for the punishment of this offence, and the application to Your Majesty to make a law, 'ex post facto,' to punish the criminal, is highly improper. But, if the States should think it expedient to make the offence of burglary a capital offence, as it is by the law of England, they may, if they shall be so advised, propose a new law for Your Majesty's consideration, in order to be enacted and confirmed by Your Royal sanction, after Your Majesty shall have signified your allowance to have such a law enacted. Upon this ground the Committee think it may be advisable, if Your Majesty so please, to order the Royal Court to carry their own sentence into execution."

If this is to be understood (as was assumed in the evidence before us) to authorize the Court to visit any act which may appear wrong and mischievous (though not a breach of any definite law, written or other) with a punishment, at their discretion, stopping short of capital punishment, it follows that the discretion, which we have found to be exercised as to visiting a defined crime with arbitrary punishment, is extended to an enlargement of the range of punishable crimes.

Two of the species of assaults mentioned in the Grand Coustumier as punishable by loss of life or limb (headed above as g. h.) are spoken of in the same treatise, in chapter 75, and classed with two others, "Assault de Chemin," and "Assault de Champ." The nature of these, and, we assume, of the third mentioned in the Grand Coustumier (headed i.), appears from the language of the plaint: "Je me plaing de P. qui en la paix de dieu et du duc me assaillit felonneusement a ma charue en aguet pourpense, et me fist ce sāg et ceste playe que ie monstre a la iustice."

The passage respecting these offences in the Statement of Messrs. Pipon and Durell, is as follows. "Assault of the Plough, This ranked by Rouillé among the crimes punishable with the loss of life or limb, would be deemed punishable by fine and perhaps imprisonment according to the guilt the action bore, but not capitally, except it was accompanied with robbery. Assault on the house, or possession of the person assaulted. This would be punished with more or less severity according to the heinousness of the offence, at the discretion of the Court, except such an assault amounted to robbery, burglary or arson, in which cases the criminal might be punished with death; Rouillé, in the 4th chapt, de justicier says thus 'the Bailly is called the justicier of the land who is appointed by the Prince or by the Duke and has power of exercising justice and judging the people submitted to him, for he is appointed to keep the peace, to decide quarrels, to destroy the thieves murderers and house-burners, and other evil doers.' And again upon the cry of haro chap. 54, he gives the text as follows 'Because it ought not to be cried but in criminal cases, as in that of fire, larceny or homicide, or for some other apparent danger.' And Terrien in book 3. chap. 5. speaks in the same words as Rouillé in his 4. chapt." All that Terrien does is to cite the passage.

It seems to us that Messrs. Pipon and Durell have not, in respect either of the nature of the offences or the species of punishment, identified the assaults, spoken of in the Grand Coustumier as crimes, with any thing known to the modern law of Jersey.

We have now discussed the offences spoken of as crimes in the 67th chapter of the Grand Coustumier. We do not feel confident that we have fully understood the law found there; but it is sufficient to shew that the criminal law cannot be extracted from that work in a definite form; and that, even if it can, it will be but ill adapted to the present state of society. We purpose next to notice the other offences treated of in the Statement of Messrs. Pipon and Durell.

Arson is punishable with death, and appears to have been so in early times. This appears by implication in different passages of the Grand Coustumier. In chapter 4, it is said that the bailiff is appointed, besides other purposes, "pour destruire les larrons, les homicides, les ardeurs." In chapter 12, the duty of the Duke is described to be to search out, by the bailiffs, and put in prison, "les larrons, les robeurs, les ardeurs, les homicides," &c., "tant quilz en ayent receu leurs souldes." In chapter 54, it is laid down that haro ought not to be cried "fors pour causes criminelle: Sicõme pour feu, ou pour larcin, ou pour homicide, ou pour aultre euident peril: Sicomme se aulcun court seure a ung aultre le cousteau trait." It is possible, however, that this passage may relate generally to the case of fire, not particularly to malicious burning. In chapter 69, the law is expounded as to summoning and challenging jurors in criminal cases; and it is said: "Ainsy doibt lẽ faire de ceulx qui sont cõmunement blasmez dhomicide, darson, de larcin, ou daulcũ aultre crime de quoy il nest aulcun qui les suyue."

It seems that the offence is only that of burning a house. Burning a stack would not be considered a capital crime, but would be treated as an offence against property, and punishable at the discretion of the Court.

Forgery, in the time of Messrs. Pipon and Durell, was punishable by pillory. The Gloss on chapter 23 (a.), among cases in which an offender would be punished by his hand being cut off, mentions "se vng homme auoit faict vne faulse lettre." We do not precisely know the meaning of this; nor are we aware of any other evidence of the state of the ancient law. The crime, as now understood, consists in counterfeiting any writing for the purpose of effecting a fraud upon property. It was, not long ago, punished by the pillory, scourging, banishment, and cutting off the lower part of the ear. At present, we presume that the Court would punish by transportation or imprisonment, using its discretion as to the degree of severity.

Perjury, according to Messrs. Pipon and Durell, is punishable like forgery. They do not point out any trace of this in the ancient law. It does not, however, seem clear what the punishment would now be: no modern instance of trial for the offence is recollected.

Frauds are thus spoken of by Messrs Pipon and Durell. "Other frauds, such as are cheats of various sorts, are punishable by fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the Judge, according to the circumstances of each case." No more is said on this subject: but the law of Jersey appears to comprehend under this head a very great number of offences. Such are, obtaining money or goods under false pretences, embezzlement, uttering bad money knowingly. One species of fraud, the concealment of his property by a debtor, has been the subject of specific enactment An Ordinance of the States, confirmed in Privy Council, inflicts imprisonment, for three months at the least, and two years at the most, on any one who, being imprisoned for debt or having placed his property in the hands of the law, shall cause the deterioration of such property. Any one aiding is subject to the same punishment, and to the payment of damage to the extent of the loss. Punishment to the same amount is imposed on any person who shall damage his heritage when he is about to lose it by a judgment, and upon such as aid him.

The offence of "selling by false weights or measures, or with weights or measures not marked or stamped by the Viscount or Sheriff," is noticed by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, who refer to the Grand Coustumier and the Gloss. It was anciently punished by fine and imprisonment, being considered analogous to a simple larceny. The Code of 1771 contains regulations on the subject, which are enforced by fines of ten livres for breaches of the several rules: and it seems to be understood that this has by implication repealed the customary law.

Adultery is punishable in Jersey by imprisonment and hard labour. Messrs. Pipon and Durell refer for this to Ordinances made by Royal Commissioners in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. These Ordinances, however, are not law in Jersey, as they never were sanctioned in Council: and the law on this head seems to have been created by the Court. No trace of it in the ancient law was pointed out to us. From a passage in Terrien (xii. 14.) it would appear that the customary law at one time punished adultery if the injured husband or wife preferred the complaint, but not otherwise. This accords with both the ancient and modern French law: whether Terrien had any other authority for inserting such a principle in the Norman custom we cannot tell.

Messrs. Pipon and Durell state that bigamy or polygamy, when without excuse, is punishable by death. This law they merely take from the manuscripts of their predecessors; and they suppose it to have been adopted from some writers on the reformed custom of Normandy, "strengthened by the statute of 1 James I." No instance of any punishment for the crime was known to those writers, nor to the gentlemen who gave evidence before us.

Incest, which is defined to be a criminal connection between parties in a direct line, or between brother and sister, is said, by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, to be punishable by death. This law, also, they consider to have been adopted from commentators on the reformed custom: and they refer also to the Mosaic law. They add: "We find by an ancient act of the Royal Court in 1586, as though this crime was then held to be punishable by the stocks, and whipping on three days repeatedly; but this might be considered to be adequate, when the crime was committed by persons in a remoter degree of affinity." This leaves the offence and punishment quite undefined. The evidence given to us appears to shew that, when the offence takes place in the direct line, it is still, in strictness, punishable by death; and that it would be punished, but more lightly, even if it took place between uncle and niece. In 1823, a man was found guilty of having had criminal intercourse with two step-daughters: he was imprisoned for six months, for the last eight days of which he was to be kept to bread and water, fined 50*l.* sterling, with costs, and banished for five years from the termination of the imprisonment.

Unnatural offences are said, by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, to be punishable by death. The writers refer only to the commentators on the reformed custom and the Mosaic law. The offence is now punished under a law of the States confirmed by an Order of Council of 1799, by which the offender "sera puni de mort, et souffrira le même supplice, les mêmes confiscations et forfaitures de ses biens, que la loi inflige présentement sur ceux qui sont convaincus de quelque crime capital."

The 80th chapter of the Grand Coustumier, referred to by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, speaks of "recepteurs q̄ receptent les foriurez les forbanis, et les dānez, & ceulx qui se defuyent a venir a la paix du duc qui ont este appellez." "Ils doibuēt p'dre to' leurs meubles a la volunte au duc et au bailly. Et se ilz nont meuble, ilz doibuent estre chastiez p' longue prison." And, afterwards, in the same chapter: "Les consentantz aux larrons en leurs larcīs, & ceulx qui les receptent doibuēt estre punis en aultre maniere, car silz en sont attaintz, ilz seulent en Normēdie emporter telle peine comme les larrōs mesmes: et aussi tous leurs parsonniers & consentans de leurs mesfaictz." An Order of Council on this subject, dated 1635, confirmed by the Code of 1771, inflicts the punishment of fine and imprisonment on accessories to murder, on such as, after the commission of felony ("en felonie après le crime commis"), receive or favour criminals before their conviction, or aid in the escape of criminals after proclamation for their apprehension, or break prison, or assist such delinquents.

It is usual, in the act of accusation, to charge the party in the alternative, that is, with having committed the offence or assisted in the commission; a practice which appears to us preferable to that prevailing in the English law, this latter (according to modern practice) discountenancing the double charge, and thus not unfrequently failing to attain the justice of the case.

For the law as to self-murder, Messrs. Pipon and Durell refer to ch. 21 of the Grand Coustumier, which inflicts forfeiture to the Sovereign of the chattels of such as kill themselves, or die excommunicate or "desesperez," that is, who, having been dangerously ill for nine days or more, refuse to confess and communicate. The forfeiture is still the legal result of self-murder; and the body is not to have Christian burial. But this head of law is practically extinct, as the jury on the levée de corps (answering to our coroner's inquest) invariably find madness.

Usury was formerly punished by forfeiture of the chattels of the offender to the Sovereign. (Gr. Coust. ch. 20.) This offence, as Messrs. Pipon and Durell point out, consisted in taking any profit for the use of money or other things lent. The penalty, however, was inflicted only, as we understand the chapter referred to, after the death of the usurer, and then not unless he had committed the offence within a year and a day before his death. The writers cite Terrien (xii. 22.) to shew that, afterwards, it was not an offence to take reasonable interest: but we doubt whether Terrien is speaking of the Norman custom. They add that, in their own time, usury would consist in taking more than 5 per cent., and would be punished by cancelling the usurious contract, and by fine according to the circumstances of the case. The code of 1771, confirming a law of 1714, fixes the maximum of legal interest at 5 per cent. In a recent case, the Court annulled the debt. The present law is evidently quite unconnected with what we find in the Coustumier.

For the law on slander, Messrs. Pipon and Durell refer to the 86th chapter of the Grand Coustumier; which, however, is much more full upon the subject than would appear from the passage which they cite. The "q̄relle qui naist de mesdict" is a personal querelle arising from dict as opposed to faict. These querelles arise from the "laidenges" which one man utters of another. They are either criminal or simple. Criminal are those where, if the slander had been true, he of whom it is uttered would have deserved to lose life or limb. When the party complained of confesses or is convicted, "la iustice luy doit faire grefuemēt amender par le chatel: et si doibt faire amēde a celuy q'l a laidenge: si que il se prēne p' le bout du nez, et die De ce q̄ ie tay appelle larron ou homicide ou de ce dequoy il est attaint, ie ay menty: car ce crime nest pas en toy. Et de ma bouche dont ie le dis ie suis mēsongier. Et ce doibt estre faict en assise ou en pletz, ou en eglise a jo' solennel: affin que il appaire que le vice que il luy mist sur: ne soit pas en luy: pource q̄ celuy q̄ luy dist sen recōgnoist a mēsongier." The Gloss (b.) adds that the party so declaring becomes infamous and inadmissible "a tesmoignage." For simple laidenge, the punishment appears to have been the same, except that the amends to the party complaining was made by the slanderer saying "sīplemēt q̄ la villanie q̄ il luy dist p' folie, nest pas en luy." In the case of the laidenge criminal, it was open to the defendant to offer to prove the truth of the slander, if he would have been entitled to make suyte for the imputed crime, as if the imputation were that the plaintiff had murdered the defendant's father.

Messrs. Pipon and Durell state, as to libel, merely that it is "punished with greater severity, as by fine and imprisonment, with damages to the party injured."

The modern law, in cases of slander, is very analogous to that which we find in the Grand Coustumier. The proceeding is by a cause en ajonction, which is of a mixed criminal and civil kind. We shall describe it more fully hereafter: at present it is enough to state that the satisfaction sought is double, a punishment as between the Crown and the defendant, and damages as between the parties.

A libel against a public functionary is also the subject of a cause en ajonction, of rather a more formal kind, in respect of the nature of the process, than a cause en ajonction for slander. But it is singular that for a libel against a common individual a proceeding en ajonction never takes place; and it is doubted whether it can do so legally, though for mere words spoken it may. A party always resorts to a purely civil action for libel; and he may do so for words spoken.

The amende to the party is now made by way of pecuniary damages; that by way of confession of the falsehood is seldom or never asked. If granted, it would probably no longer be in the form prescribed in the Grand Coustumier. It was, however, so inflicted, as late as 1719, in the case of a man named Piton, who had spoken injurious words of the Lieutenant Governor. The Court condemned him, "considérant l'énormité du fait, à démander pardon à genoux à Dieu, au Roy, à la Justice, et à la partie offensée, et à se prendre par le nez, et à reconnoître qu'il avoit malicieusement menti, ce qu'il a effectué, et est de plus, le dit Piton, condamné à une amende qualifiée, qui sera applicable à la réparation de la prison, et en outre à retourner en prison pour être là détenu, les fers aux jambes, l'espace d'un mois, au pain et à l'eau, pour être ensuite libéré."

It does not appear that a purely criminal proceeding is allowed for either private slander or private libel.

Messrs. Pipon and Durell, after enumerating the offences above mentioned, refer generally to prohibitory laws imposed by the code of 1771, by other Orders in Council, or by Act of Parliament. These are generally enforced by pecuniary penalties. We do not think it necessary to describe them more particularly; they relate for the most part to local or fiscal regulations, and, having been the subject of express enactment, are sufficiently definite.

We shall enumerate some other offences, which are not expressly mentioned, in the Statement of Messrs. Pipon and Durell.

Piracy is not punished as a specific crime; but it would almost necessarily comprehend some other crime punishable by the law of Jersey.

Assaults, with intent to commit particular crimes, are not classed as in the English law. The intent is specified in the act of accusation, and is there, in legal effect, a description of circumstances aggravating the assault. When the intent is very heinous, the proceeding is criminal, and may subject the criminal to transportation, as in the case of attempt to murder. In cases of slighter assaults, there may be a cause en ajonction of the more formal kind. But the line of distinction is very indefinite: and there is also the purely civil remedy for assault. Other offences, specifically distinguished by the English law, are here merely species of assault, as forcible abduction and forcible entry.

Other offences are cognizable under a power, which the Court seems to assume, of punishing generally whatever appears to be in its nature offensive or criminal. To this, it seems, we are to refer the law on coining (which has been punished here only since it has ceased to be treason in England), sedition, misconduct of officers, returning from transportation or banishment, provoking a breach of the peace, nuisances, brothel-keeping, indecency, unchasteness, solicitation of chastity. For these the Court imposes punishments in its discretion, varying from transportation to imprisonment and fine.

Prison breach is punishable, under the clause of the Code of 1771, already cited, by fine and imprisonment.

Tumultuous assemblies, to the number of twelve or more, are punished by a fine of 200 livres, under a law of the States passed in 1797, confirmed by Order in Council.

We may mention, in concluding this summary, that the more serious offences are now called "crimes," and the less serious "délits." The line between the two is not drawn very strictly. Offences against express enactments are commonly called "contraventions."

The result of this examination into the present state of the Criminal Law of Jersey appears to us to be that, except in the case of those lighter offences, and the few more serious ones, which have been the subject of specific enactments, neither the definition of crimes nor their punishment rests upon any authority which can be deemed permanent for the future, or even certain for the present. The offences now punished are scarcely in a single instance classified according to the ancient law; nor have there been substituted for this, either direct legislative provisions, or new practical principles capable of being distinctly ascertained or possessing any assured stability. In other countries, where the penal system has not been reduced to a code, the definitions of offences, and the punishments by which they are visited, have become perfectly known from a long course of precedents, carefully recorded, constantly referred to, and furnishing a system as well understood, if not as scientifically arranged, as can be constructed by a formal code. Law so laid down is fixed till a change is made by the legislative power, openly announced, and asserting an equally positive rule. But, in the law of Jersey, the practice which innovates on the custom introduces in its stead nothing which is not equally liable to change. The evil is not mitigated, but aggravated, by a nominal reference to the works which are the supposed depositories of the ancient law. For, wherever the law, as there exhibited, differs from the law as practised, a reference to it amounts in effect only to the recognition of an additional disturbing force. The practice, which is now constantly prevalent, of referring to English legal works and precedents as authorities, seems indeed to have become almost the only practical mode of introducing fixed principles into the criminal law of the island.

We think it not difficult to point out the causes which have produced this state of things.

In the first place, the Royal Court, till within the last eighty years, possessed the power of legislation. The Order of Council of 1771 expressly put an end to this power. It has, indeed, been suggested that the variations of the law may have been produced by express enactments of the Royal Court, made at times before the fire of 1503 which destroyed the records. We think this very unlikely. We find no important changes of this sort introduced during the three centuries for which the records are preserved; and, as to some changes, we know that they are much more recent. But it is probable that, while this legislative power existed, the members of the court would not feel very strongly the necessity of adhering to the actual law in particular cases, when they knew that the general law itself was fixed only as long as they chose to permit, and that they might at any time introduce an absolute change. When the same body is judicial and legislative, the natural consequence is that no strong sense is entertained of the importance of adhering, in the administration of law, to principles more settled than those which regulate its enactment. We may venture to point out that a similar result may be observed in the Courts of Westminster Hall, where rules are the least constant within the limited province in which the Courts are compelled to create a law for themselves; for instance, on questions of mere practice, and on applications for a criminal information, or for a mandamus. Now, this laxity of principle having been once admitted into the habits of the Royal Court of Jersey, a removal of the original cause would have little effect in changing the practical principle, especially in the case of a numerous tribunal, the members of which were replaced successively and repeatedly, at distant intervals of time.

Next, we have no doubt that the popular nature of the tribunal has contributed to unsettle the law. The Jurats are chosen under a system of election in which the suffrage is very widely extended; and, as members of the States, they are expected to take an active share in the struggles between contending parties. The persons thus selected have, therefore, seldom received any legal education; other requisites are more valued. It results almost inevitably that they must often be prompted to act upon their own individual notions of justice, instead of ascertained rules of law. A strong instance of this occurred lately upon a conviction for murder, when two of the Jurats, avowedly from a dislike to capital punishment, proposed to pass a sentence of transportation for life, though no punishment of this crime other than capital has ever been recognized by the law of Jersey. Indeed, the changes in the law have, for a long time, been almost invariably from more to less severe. One exception, the introduction of transportation, is less strong than at first sight it appears to be; for transportation is often inflicted in cases where formerly the sentence would have been, not banishment, but loss of life or limb. The tendency of the law in this direction, though honourable to the feelings of those who have administered it, is nearly conclusive evidence that the cause which we are now pointing out must have been one materially contributing to the variation and inconstancy of the practice. Nor is it reasonable to expect that individuals, called upon to act judicially without previous training by legal study or habits, should not be more keenly alive to what may appear to them the expediency in the particular case before them than to the paramount importance of acting on fixed principles of law.

REPORT.

Another cause of the unfixed state of the law is to be found in the rarity of recorded precedents. The law now, as we have shewn, rests almost exclusively on the modern practice of the Royal Court; but the number of decisions is small; and these, as we have mentioned, are not reported so as to furnish adequate means of instruction in the principles recognized by the Court. The annual number of offenders tried by the Royal Court, on an average of ten years, is only 137, of whom 50 submitted in the first instance. There is a record of every cause; and occasionally this contains the ruling on some disputed point. But the grounds of the decision never appear otherwise than by a very brief and technical recital of the view which the Court takes; no detailed judgment, showing the reasoning which has led to this view, appears; nor are the arguments of counsel set forth. It is almost impossible that decisions, so few in number, so slightly reported, and not published at all, can afford a foundation for a fixed system of law.

The inhabitants of the Island have, we think, a right to ask that this state of things should not remain. And it appears to us that it may be remedied with little difficulty, and without any innovation so great as to produce any serious or durable inconvenience, or shock any feelings or even prejudices.

A definite system of penal law ought undoubtedly to be laid down: the question is, what that system should be. The history of codes teaches us generally that no language can anticipate the variety of cases to which the law is to be applied, and that a course of precedents, more or less copious, must be passed through before the system acquires a practical certainty and precision. We have already pointed out that precedents in Jersey are not numerous or well recorded; and we see no reason for expecting any material change in this respect. The proposed alteration should therefore, if possible, be one which will furnish the Criminal Court with authoritative decisions, and enable them to appropriate to themselves the experience of tribunals of more extensive practice. For this purpose, the most efficient means appears to be the adoption, with such modifications as may be thought advisable, of the general criminal law of some larger country. The French Criminal Code has already been in action for a considerable period of time, and has been explained by numerous decisions which are easily accessible. But an objection to adopting it in Jersey seems to arise from its dissimilarity to the present, and even ancient, law of Jersey, and from the comparative rarity of occasions in which it has been cited in the Royal Court. The English criminal law is abundant in reported decisions: but it is not reduced to the form of a code. It is, however, well defined by practice: and that practice is now constantly referred to in Jersey.

It appears to us, therefore, that the States, if so inclined, might easily take a step which would at least place the criminal law of the Island on as steady a foundation as that of England. An enumeration might be made of the felonies and misdemeanors cognizable by English law which it was thought fit to punish in Jersey. These would comprehend every offence not provided for by specific enactment. Each might be strictly defined by the words to be found in any approved digest of English criminal law; and it would be understood, without direct enactment, that all the authority and reasoning upon which such definitions had been founded, or by which they had been explained, might be referred to in the Court of Jersey exactly as in the Courts of Westminster Hall. To avoid any doubt on the subject, the new code might recite that the language and provisions of the old Jersey criminal law had in many instances become obsolete, and that the more modern criminal law, so far as not introduced by express enactment, was not sufficiently defined for the purposes of justice, and that it therefore became advisable to lay down the law in language conformable, as far as possible, with the language used in the Courts of England. Care would of course be taken that no expression was used rendering any authority binding on the Court in any stricter sense than that in which authorities are held binding in our own Courts. And, where any law noticed in the English books appeared not conveniently applicable to the Island, it might be omitted. The punishments might be the same in kind as those in the English law, but more or less severe in the particular cases, as the States might think advisable. The new law should distinguish between offences which are triable by the enquête and those which may be disposed of summarily.

We are persuaded that a law of this kind, sufficiently definite for all practical purposes, might be drawn up in a few hours. The innovation, we believe, would not be felt. And we think it highly important that this improvement should come from the States themselves.

If the labours of the learned persons intrusted by Your Majesty with the revision of the English criminal law should terminate in the compilation of a criminal code, it might be adopted, in whole or in part, by the States in framing a criminal law for Jersey. But we do not think that the possibility of this result suggests any reason for delaying the proposed change. The criminal law of Jersey may easily be constructed on the language of the English criminal law, as now existing: and, if an English code should be afterwards produced, it would probably be, for the most part, a digest of the existing law; and a new Ordinance of the States might, in a few sentences, adopt its provisions, so far as was thought right, without any embarrassment being produced by their former Ordinance.

We reserve to a later part of this Report the suggestions which we have to offer with respect to the tribunal which is to administer the criminal law, and at this place will merely remark that we consider the present Court unlikely, from its nature, to conduce to the stability of any system of law which may be introduced.

We now proceed to state the result of our inquiry into the constitutions and powers of the Tribunals and Authorities charged with the execution of the Criminal Laws in Jersey. This part of the inquiry necessarily comprehended an investigation into the course pursued in the prosecution of offences, or what is ordinarily termed the Criminal Practice.

It is remarkable that the details of the practice have retained more of the features of the ancient customary law than can be traced in the laws themselves. We think it, however, unnecessary to offer a minute account of the ancient practice, but, upon this point, shall confine ourselves to a short abstract of the ancient suyte de meurdre, which will, we believe, be sufficient to show the general nature of the old system.

From the 68th chapter of the Grand Coustumier, and from the Gloss there, the ordinary course appears to have been that of a complaint by the son, or a near relation, of the murdered party. "R. se plainct de T. q̄ a meurdry son pere felōneusemēt en la paix du dieu & du duc que il est prest de prouuer & de luy faire congnoistre en une heure de jour." On denial by T., and his offering his gage, gages were taken, first of T. (le defendeur) and then of the accuser (l'appelleur): and each gave pledges to carry out the law ("de mener la loy;" that is, according to the Gloss, "de poursuyr et soustenir la loy;" according to the Latin translation, "de lege deducendâ"). The two were then kept in prison, but might be bailed to sufficient keepers, who should produce them, dead or alive, on the day appointed for the combat. On that day the parties appeared immediately before noon, and the words of battle (the issue joined) were recorded by the authorities ("par la justice"); and these were to correspond with the words of charge and denial taken when the gages were given. Four knights attended. The ban du duc, or proclamation, was made against aiding either party. The champions having declared their christian names, and professed their belief in the Trinity and the faith held by the Church, then swore to their words of battle, and that they had not prepared themselves with sorceries. Their arms were then given to them; the ban du duc was again proclaimed; and the combat ensued. The defendant had the victory if he could maintain himself till the time of the stars appearing, which time was to be ascertained, according to the Gloss (k.), by the artificial, not the natural, day; the words of the appelleur "en un heure de jour" were in that case not made good. The Gloss adds that, when either combatant yielded or was vanquished, he was sent to the gibbet.

This suyte could be made only where certain indicia (enseignes) of the murder were discovered.

If there were no one to make suyte of murder, and a party was commonly suspected, he was to be seized by "la justice" (the name still used to designate the authorities conducting criminal process), and put in prison for a year and a day, with little to eat and drink, unless, in the meantime, he consented to undergo the enqueste du pays. At the end of that time, he seems to have been liberated, according the law of the Grand Coustumier. But the Gloss, probably treating of an altered state of things, adds that, while under arrest, he might be tortured, more or less in proportion to the clearness of the proof against him, his bodily strength, and with regard to his reputation. This, however, is described as not a part of the ordinary criminal process, but as extraordinary. If the party confessed, judgment passed: but, according to the Gloss, he could not demand the enqueste as a matter of absolute right; for la justice might, at discretion, refuse the enqueste and continue the process by torture: and, at the end of the year and day, he was not necessarily to be released, the language of the Grand Coustumier meaning only, as the Gloss interprets, that he was not to be released before that time.

If he submitted to the enqueste, la justice was to summon such as were deemed likely to know anything of the murder, from whatever place they came; and they were to come suddenly and without notice of the cause of summons, lest they should be tampered with. These persons, called the men of the enqueste, were to be called separately, by the bailiff, before four knights being free from suspicion; they were to enquire diligently whether the prisoner had committed the murder; and what they said was to be taken in writing. The prisoner was then brought before them, and was asked whether he would challenge any. If he showed good cause for challenging any, no account was had of those who were challenged: a challenge without cause shewn had no effect. After the opinions, separately taken, were duly recorded, the whole number were called together, the record read to the accused, and they were then to acknowledge what they had sworn: "ilz doibuent recongnoistre q̄ ainsi ont ilz jure." What twenty agreed upon was taken as fact not to be contradicted. This was called the "enqueste du pays," or "enqueste de recongnoissant." (Gloss on Gr. Coust. ch. 87. e., h.) After the acknowledgment, judgment was awarded. The Gloss adds that the knights were to be subjected to challenge, as well as the men of the enqueste. The enqueste was to be by twenty four lawful men, not suspected of favour or hatred; and the sergent was to summon "les plus preudz hommes & les plus loyaulx quil pourra trouuer en lieu ou le mesfaict fut faict. et ceulx que len croit mieulx quilz sachent la verite du cas & comme il est aduenu." But the Gloss adds that it was not necessary that all the twenty four should be of the parish in which the murder was committed, and that in fact the usage was to take them from that parish and two others, of which one was ordinarily, but not necessarily, the parish whereof the party accused was a native, and the other was chosen "selon la discretion de justice." The Gloss also adds that, in spite of what the text lays down as to the necessity of the concurrence of twenty, the usage was that a bare majority could convict, which supplies a very strong instance of the changes made in the Norman Law between the time of the compilation of the Grand Coustumier and the year 1539. In the Stille de Proceder (fol. 70.) it is said that twenty men must agree on the guilt, in order to convict.

The Gloss on the 69th chapter of the Grand Coustumier points out the distinction between the men of the enqueste du pays, called also "jureurs," and the witnesses, or "tesmoings," who appear in the "preuve de certain." The course, on the enqueste du pays, was first to ask the jureurs whether they knew anything certain, and, if they answered that they did not, then what they believed; "cestassauoir de certain ou de credẽce." It seems clear that, down to the time of the compilation of the Gloss, no witnesses were called before the enqueste du pays: and this agrees with what is known of the early history of juries in England.

It appears, therefore, that the ancient criminal proceeding which was set in movement by the public functionaries took place when there was strong suspicion of crime, but no suyte by a private party. The functionaries to whom it appertained to act upon such suspicion were certain sworn officers of the Duke.

In the 4th chapter of the Grand Coustumier it is said that there were two classes of Justiciers, the higher and the lower. The higher comprehended the Masters of the Exchequer and the Bailiffs, the lower those who were under the Bailiffs. Of the higher class the Masters of the Exchequer were superior to the Bailiffs, the latter having no jurisdiction out of their several bailiwicks, and their proceedings being subject to the correction of the Masters of the Exchequer. The lower class comprehended those who were below the Bailiffs. The Bailiff was called the Justicier of the country: his duty was to do right to the people, to keep the peace, to determine disputes, to destroy thieves, homicides, burners, and persons guilty of other misdeeds. He and all the lower justiciers were sworn to the faithful performance of their office. One duty of the justiciers was to arrest and put in prison parties who were denounced as culpable, either by common fame or the testimony of persons worthy of belief, which parties were afterwards to be submitted to judgment ("en apres par jugemēt doiuēt estre traictez"). These lower justiciers comprehended vicontes, serjeants of the sword, and beadles ("bedeaulx").

In the 5th chapter it is said that the viconte was to enquire diligently and in secret touching malefactors, as murderers, thieves, and those who did violence to maidens; touching treasons and other crimes; and those whom he should find, by the oath of unsuspected persons, to be guilty, he was to keep in prison to abide the enqueste, or till they were delivered by the law of the country; and the Gloss (b.) adds, that he might make informations and administer the question by torture. So, again, the serjeants of the sword, "doibuent justicier vertueusemēt a lespee & aux armes, tous les malfaicteurs & tous ceulx q̄ sont diffamez daulcun crime, et les fuitifs." The beadles performed duties of the same kind, but of a lower class. The Gloss (d.) adds that, of these justiciers, the Bailiffs and Vicontes alone were called Juges Justiciers, having certain judicial functions.

From the duties assigned to these officers, we collect generally the nature of the proceedings which, when the prosecution was in the hands of la justice, and not of a private party, preceded that stage at which the party might be subjected to the enqueste du pays. The sworn justiciers, including all the officers charged with criminal functions, were to seize and put in prison such as they found, from common fame or credible testimony on oath, to be guilty.

We shall now describe the present Criminal Court and its mode of proceeding, which appears to us to exhibit most of the features of the ancient form, though singularly changed in spirit.

We have already, in describing the Parochial Assembly, mentioned the Royal Court. We shall now speak of it and its various functionaries more fully, and, in some instances, must repeat what has already been said. It is the only criminal court in the island. It consists of a Bailiff and twelve Jurats, called Jurés Justiciers. The Bailiff (Bailli) is appointed by the Crown, and now holds during pleasure. He may name one or more persons to be Deputy Bailiff. He has a salary of 300*l.* with other fees. The twelve Jurats are elected for life from the natives of the island, by the rate-payers of the whole island. They must be possessed of property in land, producing rather more than 30*l.* per annum, in English money; and they may not be brewers, bakers, butchers or tavern-keepers. They may resign by leave of the Crown, or, in case of misconduct, be dismissed. This Court has, under different names, civil jurisdiction. In its character of a criminal court it either consists of the Full Court (corps de la cour), at which there must be at least seven present, besides the Bailiff or his deputy, or the Inferior Number (nombre inférieur), at which two at least, besides the Bailiff or his deputy, must be present. The Court sits for two terms, namely, April term, from 11th April to 5th July, and September term, from 11th September to 5th December: but, whenever a party is imprisoned, the Court will, if required, proceed with the case out of term.

This Court originated in the constitutions of King John, who (by sect. 1) "Constituit duodecim coronatores juratos, ad placita et jura ad coronam spectantia custodienda." By sect. 3, "Ii debent eligi de indegenis insularum, per ministros Domini Regis et optimates patriæ; scilicet, post mortem unius eorum, alter fide dignus, vel alio casu legitimo, debet substitui." It has been made a question whether this sanctions an election upon so broad a principle of suffrage as is now in use. Sect. 5 confers the criminal and civil jurisdiction: "Ipsi duodecim in quâlibet Insulâ, in absentiâ Justiciariorum, et unà cum Justiciariis cum ad partes illas venerint, debent judicare de omnibus casibus in dictâ Insulâ qualitercunque emergentibus, exceptis casibus nimis arduis, et" (or rather ut, as before pointed out) "si quis legitimè convictus fuerit a fidelitate Domini Regis tanquam proditor recessisse, vel manus injecisse violentas in ministros Domini Regis modo debito officium exercendo." The Justiciarii here spoken of are the Justices in Eyre, who formerly visited the Islands periodically. In the 7th section it appears to be taken for granted that, where the Justices did not act with the Jurats, the Bailiff would preside; and, in the 2nd section, the Bailiff is directed, in certain civil questions, "per visum dictorum coronatorum placitare." The presidency of the Criminal Court is not expressly given; the effect, however, of the constitutions has always been understood to be, that the Court, consisting of the Jurats presided over by the Bailiffs, has the same jurisdiction in criminal matters which the Bailiff alone had before the constitutions were granted.

Two Law Officers of the Crown, the Procureur Général and Avocat de la Reine, who respectively answer nearly to the Attorney General and Solicitor General in England, and are often called by those names, attend the Court; which, indeed, cannot act unless one of the two be present. They are appointed by the Crown, and hold for life. The Procureur Général has an annual salary of 100*l.* besides official fees, which may amount to as much more. He has a secretary called the Autorisé du Procureur Général, who has an annual salary of 12*l.* The Avocat de la Reine has an annual salary of 50*l.* Neither receive any fees for conducting criminal causes; but each may act for private parties in civil causes.

The other avocats of the Court, or barristers, are six in number; and no more can be appointed. They are named by the Bailiff, as vacancies occur. No qualification is required. In case of their non-attendance at certain seasons, the Bailiff has, it seems, the power of suspending or dismissing them: but this is not very clearly ascertained.

The Court has no regular attorneys: but persons called écrivains are from time to time appointed by the Bailiff, who perform certain functions in the Criminal Court, which will be presently described, and which give to the écrivains, when so acting, rather the character of subordinate clerks of the Court than of attorneys acting for parties.

The Viscount (Vicomte) is appointed by the Crown, and holds during pleasure. His office in many respects resembles that of the English sheriff. He may, and frequently does, act by deputy. He has an annual salary of 100*l.*, with considerable fees of office. The description of his office in the Grand Coustumier (ch. 5.) shows that this functionary had formerly much more extensive powers and duties than at present, both judicial and as a principal officer of police. The constitutions of King John have probably diminished them in the former respect; and, in the latter, many duties that once belonged to the Viscount are now exercised by the constables.

The Clerk, or Registrar, of the Court, called Greffier, is appointed by the Bailiff for life. He has under him a clerk, or Commis au Greffe, who is also appointed by the Bailiff.

The two Dénonciateurs, or officiers de justice, act under the Vicomte. They are appointed by the Bailiff.

There is also an usher, "huissier," appointed by the Bailiff.

The Police may be considered, in some sense, as officers of the Royal Court. Each parish has one constable, elected for three years by the rate-payers of the parish. Under him are in St. Hélier's 4, and in each other parish 2, centeniers. who are also elected for three years, by the rate-payers. These are subordinate to the constables. Each parish is divided into districts called vingtaines. The number of these varies in the different parishes. There are 7 in St. Hélier, 6 in St. Ouen and St. Sauveur, 5 in St. Laurens, St. Pierre, St. Martin, and La Trinité, 4 in St. Brélade and Grouville, 3 in St. Jean and St. Clement, and 2 in Ste. Marie. To each of these vingtaines belongs a vingtenier, who is of an inferior grade to the centeniers. He is elected by the Parochial Assembly, and holds office for four years in St. Hélier's, and for seven in the other parishes. There are also, in each parish, officers of a grade inferior to the vingteniers, called officiers du connétable. These also are elected by the Parochial Assembly. There are 24 in St. Hélier's, 15 in St. Brélade, and 12 in each of the ten other parishes. Certain criminal functions also belong to a summoning officer called the Prévôt, who is furnished in each parish by the tenants of the Royal fees or manors of the parish. In St. Ouen's and St. Clement's there are no such tenants; and the duties are there performed by the Prévôts of St. Mary's and Grouville. In some parishes an officer called the Sergent de la Reine is furnished by the same tenants: he is an assistant to the Prévôt.

The criminal cases which are brought to the Royal Court are either purely criminal or of a mixed criminal and civil kind. Of those which are purely criminal, some are prosecuted by the intervention of a jury, and some without it; the former of these two classes comprehends all the heavier offences, the latter those which are considered sufficiently light to be disposed of by a summary proceeding. The line between the two is not very definitely drawn; but it may be said generally that, in all cases where capital or corporal punishment, transportation, hard labour, or lengthened imprisonment, may be inflicted, the case goes before a jury: the summary process is applied in cases of the less grievous assaults, breaches of the peace, and the like.

We shall first describe what takes place when the case goes before a jury.

The first step, upon an offence being committed, is regularly taken by the Police. The constables and centeniers may act throughout their own parishes, the vingteniers only in their own vingtaine, or in the case of their witnessing the commission of an offence; the officiers du connétable only where they witness the commission of the offence. But both vingteniers and officiers de connétable may act in aid of the constable, whether they have seen the offence committed or not. The constable or centenier collects all the information which he can, arrests the accused party, and lays a Report (through the Procureur Général) before the Court, bringing in the prisoner at the same time. According to the Grand Coustumier and Gloss (ch. 6, q.), the regular course is to bring the arrested party before the Bailiff within a day. This, however, is in practice frequently postponed for several days. The prisoner is brought in at a sitting of the Inferior Number, in what is called a Cour de Samedi, as it more ordinarily sits on the Saturday. The Report contains all that the officer has heard, including often much which is hearsay and otherwise not strictly fit evidence for a jury. Sometimes, the Report being placed in the hands of the Procureur Général before the prisoner is arrested, that officer (except where he is represented by the Avocat de la Reine, which he may be in all cases, if absent) lays the Report before the Cour de Samedi, and requires its order for compelling appearance. The order is then granted of course. It is of three different kinds, according to the nature of the offence. In the most serious offences a Décret de prise de corps issues, empowering all parties to seize the accused, and forbidding any from sheltering him. In less grave cases an Acte de saisie issues, under which the vicomte or a dénonciateur arrests the offender, or takes security for his appearance. In light cases a signification issues, which is a mere summons, and is served by the same officers. This last, however, is seldom or never resorted to in cases which are brought before a jury. On some very rare occasions the Procureur Général acts without a Report, and demands the order ex officio. In strictness the police have no power to take an accused party to the public prison without the warrant of the Bailiff or certain of the Jurats whom the Bailiff authorizes to grant such warrant; and therefore, in default of such warrant, the prisoner regularly would be in the private custody of the officer. But a common practice is to place the party in the prison and obtain the warrant afterwards. The constable or centenier sometimes takes bail for the appearance of the party arrested; but this is apparently an exercise of authority not strictly legal. The advice of the Law Officers of the Crown is sometimes taken as to whether the case is one in which bail should be allowed. When bail is taken, the fact is mentioned in the Report of the constable; and, in default of appearance, the Court, on reading the Report, condemns the bail to pay the penalty. The parties who are bail must possess real property in the island. Sometimes the prisoner is allowed to deposit a sum of money as a security for his appearance, instead of bail being taken: but his own recognizance is not formally taken.

On the appearance of the accused before the Cour de Samedi, the Procureur Général reads the police officer's Report (if there be one, which is almost invariably the case) and the order (if any) under which the prisoner has been taken. He then puts in his own accusation, which has been framed entirely on the Report of the police officer, previously furnished to him. This answers to the English indictment, though the rules as to its framing are somewhat less precise and more reasonable than those of our law. The act of accusation gives the prisoner rather more information than our indictment, and, at the same time, is not fettered or embarrassed by such minute technicalities. After the act of accusation has been put in it cannot be altered. The prisoner is then called on to plead. If he cannot afford to employ an advocate, the Court selects one for him, who acts gratuitously; and this duty, as we had the means of personally observing, is discharged with great zeal and ability. But, if a party choose to pay for his own counsel, he may do so, and may have as many as he pleases; only one, however, is allowed to speak. The prisoner then pleads under the advice of his counsel. If he pleads Guilty ("coupable") the plea is recorded, and the Procureur Général states his conclusions, that is, his view as to the law and proper judgment. The prisoner is then sentenced, unless the offence be of so grievous a kind as to make it fit that judgment should be given by the Full Court. On his appearing before the Full Court, when the case has been referred to them, the sentence, after the conclusion of the Procureur Général, is passed; but the plea of Guilty may be retracted at any time before sentence. If he refuse to plead at all when charged in the Cour de Samedi, a plea of Non coupable is recorded. If he plead Non coupable, he is "constitué prisonnier," or else bailed by leave of the Court; and the Procureur Général has leave to produce witnesses, "d'informer." In some few cases the prisoner denies the legal propriety of the accusation and demurs, when the objection is discussed. If the objection fail, the prisoner may still plead Not guilty. The whole of the proceedings in any of these cases are recorded.

The Inferior Number of the Court afterwards sits to receive the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution, called Informateurs. The prisoner and his counsel are present. The witnesses are sworn; and their evidence is taken down in writing by the écrivains appointed for the purpose. The counsel for the prisoner cross examines; and the result is also taken down in writing by the écrivains. When the Procureur Général has called as many witnesses as he thinks necessary, the witnesses for the prisoner are called, examined by his counsel, and cross examined by the Procureur Genéral. The evidence is taken down in writing as before. Every question and answer, on each side, is read aloud after it is taken down; and either party may object to the way in which it is recorded. On such objections the Court decides. Finally, the witness signs the examination, after which no alteration can be made. The evidence, as taken down, is expressed in the third person, and thus does not precisely represent what is said. At each examination, the prisoner repeats his plea of Not guilty. The witnesses on each side are summoned at the instance of the Procureur Général, by the Vicomte and his officers. Either party is entitled to introduce fresh witnesses, "innover," indefinitely. At the close of each sitting, the whole proceeding is recorded. Several of these sittings often take place, until neither party has more witnesses to call. At the close of each sitting the prisoner is remanded, and the Procureur Général has leave "d'informer plus outre," if there are more witnesses to be called, and the prisoner is remanded. The proceedings of each day, including the evidence given, are recorded. If any witness is about to leave the Island, or unable to attend the Court, the Vicomte, at the instance of the Procureur Général, is ordered to take the evidence forthwith. This is done in the presence of the parties. The evidence so taken then stands on the same footing as that taken before the Inferior Number. If witnesses who have been summoned fail to appear, they are fined; and the Vicomte is ordered to seize them and detain them in custody, unless they give security for their appearance.

If any question of law arise, upon these sittings of the Inferior Number, the party dissatisfied with the decision of the Court has the right of appealing to the Full Number.

The evidence being closed, the Procureur Général directs his warrant to the constable of the parish in which the offence has been committed, directing him to summon a sufficient number of the officers of the Police of his parish to form an enditement, "pour passer comme hommes d'enditement à la charge ou décharge de A. B." This enditement is in fact a jury of thirteen, made up entirely of the Police. Formerly the enditement was taken from the parish to which the prisoner belonged. One of the thirteen is the constable, or in his absence, a centenier; and he acts as president or foreman. It is understood that no police officer who has been a witness, or actively concerned in the proceeding against the prisoner, should serve on the enditement. The Full Court sits, the Bailiff or his deputy presiding. In all proceedings, both of the Inferior Number and the Full Court, questions which arise for the ruling of the Court are decided by a majority of the Jurats. In case of difference of opinion, the majority decides; if the opinions be equally divided, and then only, the Bailiff has a vote. According to the present practice, the Bailiff, unless asked by the Jurats, which rarely takes place, does not even offer to them his opinion upon questions of law; but, in this respect, the practice appears to have varied at different times. The enditement appear before the Court, but are not sworn, it being understood that they are acting under their oath of office. The prisoner may challenge any for good cause. The Report of the constable, the accusation, and the evidence are read to them; they do not see the witnesses. They then are addressed by the counsel for the prisoner, and afterwards by the Procureur Général. The Bailiff then sums up the evidence. The enditement then retire, accompanied by the Viscount, who takes with him the written evidence. If they agree, they return into Court, and the foreman pronounces the verdict. If they disagree, the Bailiff and Jurats receive, separately and secretly, the opinion of each, and the Bailiff pronounces the resulting opinion of the majority, a bare majority sufficing to acquit or condemn. The form of the verdict is, that the party is Plutôt innocent que coupable, or Plutôt coupable qu'innocent. The prisoner, if acquitted, is immediately discharged. If he is found Guilty, he is said to be "criminellement endité." He may then demand the benefit of the grande enquête; in which case he is remanded. If he submits to the verdict of the enditement, the Procureur Général states his conclusions; the counsel for the prisoner is heard in mitigation; and the Court decides on the punishment. The Bailiff then pronounces the judgment; which is to be entered by the Viscount. In the case of a capital sentence, time is allowed, before execution, to enable the prisoner to apply to the Crown for mercy; and transportation, as before shown, cannot be carried into effect without an order from the Privy Council.

The origin of this strange mode of trial sufficiently appears, we think, from what is known of the old mode of proceeding. It is manifest that, when the prisoner is criminellement endité, the proceedings have reached the stage corresponding to that at which, in ancient times, the prisoner was committed to prison for the year and day, unless he demanded the enqueste du pays. The constable and his enditement, consisting of police officers, answer to the vicomte and the sworn bas justiciers; and, in criminally indicting a man on the evidence of sworn witnesses, they act as the bas justiciers formerly acted. This shows why they are not sworn in the particular case, but are understood to act only under their oath of office, and why they are presided over by their constable or centenier. The whole of the examinations having formerly been understood to be conducted by the Police, a formal attendance of the witnesses would not be required for enabling this branch of "la justice" to decide upon committing the suspected party to prison; and this is probably the reason why the enditement now only hear the record of the evidence previously taken. The whole spirit of the proceeding is, however, changed, by this preliminary proceeding having come to be considered in the light of an actual trial of the guilt or innocence of the party charged. He is therefore now sentenced, unless he demands the grande enquête, instead of being left for a year and a day in prison, or tortured, as in the later Norman law. The same change in the view taken of the proceeding accounts for the introduction of the right of challenge, and for the enditement never acting except upon the evidence of sworn witnesses, whereas the bas justiciers might (as we understand the old writer) proceed upon suspicion or common fame; and this change has apparently introduced the practice of requiring the attendance of twelve of the sworn officers, besides the presiding officer. The progress of the change may, to a certain degree, be traced. Le Geyt (vol. i. p. 251.) refers to a record of 1563, where it is stated that "six hommes sermentez rapportoyent que deux accusez étoyent plustost larrons que loyaulx." In this instance, as the Avocat de la Reine pointed out to us, the evidence was taken out of Court, and the arrest took place on the report of the enditement. In another instance, which Le Geyt gives, in 1611, the constable and "six sermentez" not being unanimous, the case was postponed; and, in a later entry of the same year, it is said, "que si les sermentez varient, il en faut douze pour enditer." Le Geyt himself, on examining the record, comes to the conclusion that "les sermentez sont des espèces de surveillants pour le magistrat civil." He adds, "Il se trouve une infinité de sentences et d'enquestes criminelles où l'on ne void aucune trace d'enditement. Les enditements ne sont que pour les cas douteux, et c'est aujourd'huy quelque chose de plus que ce n'étoit autrefois. L'endite n'étoit, pour ainsi dire, qu'une accusation d'office, et c'est à présent une espéce de sentence et de jugement de crédence sur toutes les preuves que la partie publique et particulière, s'il y en a, peuvent avoir produites. L'enditement passe après l'information, et l'enditement étoit ci-devant comme le premier pas d'un procès criminel, du moins au dé faut d'un accusateur." Although the learned author does not himself suggest the analogy between this process and the ancient practice, the history of the proceeding seems to us to be established beyond doubt by the conclusion to which he comes, and even by the language which he has been led to adopt. We need not point out the many corresponding features of the English Grand Jury.

If this be the correct historical theory of the present practice, it will appear that the absurdities which now prevail are the result, not of forgetfulness or abandonment of the ordinary principles of justice, but of an attempt to carry them out, by introducing into a proceeding which was merely preliminary a character and principles properly belonging only to the final enquiry upon the guilt or innocence of the accused party. The same historical solution, and consequently the same excuse, seems to us to be applicable to the proceeding which we are next to describe, that before the grande enquête.

When a prisoner, upon being criminellement endité by the enditement, has demanded the benefit of the grande enquête, or, as the records call it, the grande enquête du pays, the Procureur Général summons, from the parish in which the crime was committed and the two adjoining parishes, a number of persons selected by himself, somewhat exceeding twenty four, to provide against challenges or absence. This is done by sending his warrant to the prévôt in each parish. Conformably with the principle laid down in the Grand Coustumier, the summons is made on the evening before the trial. The trial takes place before the Full Number of the Court; twenty four, if not challenged for cause, are sworn; there must be eight from each parish. The proceedings which follow are in all respects like those before the enditement, except that, unless twenty concur in finding the prisoner guilty, he is acquitted. In a recent instance the Court permitted a fresh witness to be called before the enquête; but the prevalent opinion seems to be that this was an innovation.

The reason why no witnesses are heard before this enquête, which, according to the original constitution, is the proper tribunal for deciding upon the disputed fact of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, appears to be that, in ancient times, as we have pointed out, they themselves comprehended such witnesses as could be obtained. Since it has been understood that juries are to decide only on evidence produced at the trial, and not from their own previous knowledge, the evidence has been supplied by laying before the enquête all that had been laid before the enditement. Indeed, as the enquête in ancient times might decide, not simply from what they knew, but also from what they believed, it is very probable that the circumstances of suspicion, or the evidence upon oath, which had led the bas justiciers to commit the accused to prison, were ordinarily brought before the enquête du pays. The vestiges of the ancient course are, perhaps, still traceable in the oath of the men of the enquête, who are sworn, not to give verdict according to the evidence, but "que bien et fidellement vous rapporterez à la Cour ce que vous pourrez croire en votre conscience." The four knights have disappeared from this proceeding; it has been conjectured that it was intended by the Constitutions of King John to replace them by the jurats. The entry on the finding of the enditement is now in the form following: "Partant le dit prisonnier demeure endité criminellement; et il a été renvoyé en prison jusqu' à ce que la dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine fasse convenir la Grande Enquête du pays, dont il a demandé le bénéfice." But, so late as 1646 (and perhaps later), the form was, that the prisoner, "pour purgation du dit crime, se submet à l'enqueste du pays de 24 homes, de sa vie ou de sa mort." The change in the form is sufficiently accounted for by the history of the proceeding.

We proceed to describe the proceedings which take place, in cases purely criminal, where the Court acts without the intervention of a jury.

In these cases the accused party is brought before the Inferior Number, in the Cour du Samedi, as in the proceedings before described. The case goes on in the same way, down to the plea of the accused. If he plead Not guilty, the cause, on the motion of the Procureur Général, is sent to proof ("envoye en preuve"). Upon the Court sitting to receive proof, a list of the witnesses on both sides is given in, and inserted by the Greffier in the record. No witnesses can be afterwards added, on either side. All the witnesses summoned must be present when the cause is heard, unless the party summoning consent to their absence. In general, the witnesses are heard vivâ voce, and, if possible, all in the same day. When the Court sentences the accused to a fine higher than 5*l.*, there is an appeal to the Full Court.

It should be mentioned that, when the offence which is brought before the Inferior Number is created by a legislative act, the accused party is brought before the Court by an acte de saisie, or signification, issued on the application of the Procureur Général, if the punishment be, wholly or in part, imprisonment, or if it be a fine at the discretion of the Court: but, if it be a fine fixed by the law, the accused is served by the prévôt with a bill or summons from the Procureur; and, in this case, if he make default in appearance twice, he is condemned. The signification, and, if it is disobeyed, the acte de saisie, is the ordinary process in the case of offences not created by positive enactment, which are to be tried by the Inferior Number.

Another proceeding, purely criminal in its nature, is the levée de corps, which corresponds to the coroner's inquest in England. In the case of death under circumstances of doubt or suspicion, a report is usually made by the Police to the Bailiff, who issues his order to the Viscount. Should the Police not act, the Bailiff would issue his order at the instance of the Procureur Général. The Viscount selects a jury of twelve, who meet and are sworn. The Procureur Général attends. The jury view the body and hear witnesses; but these latter are not sworn. After the witnesses have been heard, the jury deliberate in private upon their Verdict, or Report, which is determined by the majority. They are afterwards called before the Inferior Number, and deliver in their Report. The Report, however, does not, as in England, form the foundation of a prosecution. For instance, if the verdict were Wilful Murder, the Court can still proceed only in the ordinary mode, already described, at the instance of the Procureur Général.

The cause en ajonction is a proceeding of a mixed civil and criminal nature, the Procureur-Général being joined, "ajoint," to the civil party. It is either by bill or remontrance.

The proceeding by bill takes place in cases of slander (not libel). The Attorney General, on being applied to, signs the bill as a matter of course. If he declined to do so, the Avocat de la Reine might sign it, and, in that case, the Procureur de la Reine might act as counsel for the defendant; and, when the Procureur Général signs the bill, the Avocat de la Reine may be counsel for the defendant. This is regulated by an order of Council of 1771. The bill is a summons to the defendant. The defendant appears and puts in his plea; and, if he denies the charge, the case is sent to proof. The causes en ajonction take precedence of civil causes, but in other respects are tried in the same way, before the Inferior Number. The plaintiff may regularly retain, as his counsel, the Crown officer who has signed the bill; and the Crown officer would then appear in a double character, that of advocate for the Crown and advocate for the party. But, latterly, the Crown officer who is ajonct has declined acting for the plaintiff as a private party in these causes, and the party employs another advocate. The sentence of the Court gives a fine to the Crown and damages to the plaintiff. When the damages exceed 5*l.*, there is an appeal to the Full Court. If the Court consider that there was no sufficient ground for the proceeding, it pronounces it an "ajonction frivole;" the consequence of which is that the plaintiff has to pay all the costs except those of the defendant's legal advisers, and also a fine of 12*s.* 6*d.*

The cause en ajonction by way of remontrance is resorted to in cases of libel against a public functionary, and of assault. The plaintiff presents a remontrance (or petition) to the Court, praying for the ajonction of the Procureur Général. The Procureur Général is heard: and the Court then grants or refuses the ajonction. If the ajonction be ordered, the Court directs that the defendant be arrested: he then either gives bail or is imprisoned. In other respects, the proceeding is the same as by bill.

It appears to us that scarcely any part of the criminal proceedings which we have described is such as to suit the present condition of the inhabitants of Jersey.

We have shown that the functions of the Police, in bringing a party before the grande enquête, are of a character entirely different from that which they formerly bore. The whole organization of the Police is, in fact, altered from that which formerly existed. The parochial system has taken the place of the regular system of subordinate officers which we find described in the Grand Coustumier; and we think that this change has been for the worse.

The first objection which presents itself is, that the functions of the Police are so distributed that the authority of the several officers is confined to districts unnecessarily small. The area of the whole Island is less than that of the smallest English county; and no reason appears to exist for confining the authority of any police officer to the particular vingtaine or even parish.

The next objection is, that the Police is made up of persons whose principal business is not the discharge of the duty imposed by their character of police officers, and who do not act under the constant superintendence essential to a well organized system. The constables in the parishes are generally gentlemen belonging to the higher ranks of society. In the most important parish, St. Hélier's, which contains nearly all the principal town, the constable is Mr. Le Sueur; in the adjoining parish, St. Sauveur's, which contains the rest of the town, the constable is Mr. François Godfray; both these gentlemen are advocates in constant practice. It cannot be expected that persons in this rank of life will devote themselves undividedly to the superintendence of the police force. Even the advantage which might be derived from the legal knowledge of these gentlemen is lost by the imperfect organization of the system. The centeniers, who are the officers next in rank to the constables, ought to consult with and report to their superiors; but this is very commonly omitted. The centeniers themselves are, for the most part, persons who follow callings requiring much of their time, and who cannot possibly have acquired a competent knowledge of their duty as officers of police. Some strange results have occurred. In one instance, a centenier of St. Hélier's had in his hand a forged bank-note, which had been traced to a party who said that he had received it of a person whom he did not know. The centenier proposed to this party that he should pay the amount to the holder, and that the note should be destroyed; and, this being acceded to, the centenier himself burnt the note in the presence of the two. We do not attribute this extraordinary action to any deliberate intention on the part of the centenier to prevent the detection of crime, but to an absolute and perfect ignorance of his duty. He did not, upon being examined by us, appear to have understood that there was other than a pecuniary question between two parties; and the importance of preserving evidence of the crime had, as far as we could judge, not suggested itself to him. This officer, nevertheless, had been centenier for three years, and a police officer of a lower rank for many years. A centenier of St. Sauveur's took upon himself to search the house at which a woman lodged, without any charge of theft having been made, merely because the son of a man, with whom the woman had been living, complained of his father having kept company with the woman. The constables were not consulted in either case; and it is scarcely possible that, if they had been, this conduct could have taken place; and indeed, in the latter case, the woman having been afterwards lodged in custody in the parish of St. Hélier's, Mr. Le Sueur, the constable of that parish, directed that she should be released for want of a proper charge, believing that the whole proceeding had been instituted with the view of preventing a marriage between the woman and the father. It is obvious that a better system is not likely to prevail in parishes where the constables have not the legal knowledge possessed by Mr. F. Godfray and Mr. Le Sueur. Another consequence of the defective organization of the system, and of the functionaries not being exclusively devoted to the duty, is, that the Police is almost wholly inoperative as a protective force. This is peculiarly important in St. Hélier's, a parish containing probably 28,000 inhabitants, about 25,000 of whom live in the town. The town itself is a port of very large commerce, frequented by persons from different nations, and much resorted to by individuals who have fled from their own countries for crime. There is no official watch at all; the streets at night are entirely unprotected, except by certain watchmen who are hired for particular districts by private subscription, who have no legal authority, and who, as Mr. Le Sueur pointed out to us, and as, indeed, might be expected, are inadequate to the prevention of crime. In some instances the police officers are tavern-keepers; thus exercising a calling which is positively inimical to the proper performance of police duties. In case of a breach of the peace, actual or apprehended, the party who is injured or endangered often does not know where to find an officer. The time required for a constant attention to the duty is, in fact, that which the present officers cannot spare, or reasonably be expected to spare. Mr. Chevalier, a centenier of St. Hélier's, who stated himself, as we believe quite truly, to be a very active officer of police, told us that he had occasionally been obliged to leave his house seven times in a night, which he appeared justly to consider a very severe tax upon his time and rest. But no one who was merely a police officer would feel his duties press sorely upon him in this respect: the officers appropriated to the preservation of the peace by night would, of course, not retire to rest during their hours of duty. Another result of the imperfect organization of the system is, that there are no places appropriated to the temporary confinement of persons apprehended. By law the parties cannot be placed in prison without a magistrate's warrant; the consequence is, that the police officers have now only the alternative of violating the law or of themselves providing proper places of custody.

Another objection to the present system of Police appears to us to arise from the character which the superior officers assume. The word "constable" conveys to English lawyers the idea of an authority much inferior to that which the constable, and, as acting for him, the centenier, constitutionally possesses. These officers have functions partly resembling those of our police magistrates. They may, in certain cases, take bail from a party arrested where the offence does not amount to felony; they can also bind parties to keep the peace. In numerous cases they assume the exercise of a discretion which in England would not be thought compatible with the duties of a police officer. In the case of an assault, the constable considers it part of his duty to inquire whether the assault has not been provoked by libel or slander, if that is alleged. In some cases they consider themselves authorized to decide as to whether a Report shall be presented, that is, in effect, whether a prosecution shall go on. We do not consider that any of this latitude of authority arises from usurpation; for it seems clear to us that the whole is in the spirit of the ancient institutions, which imposed on the bas justiciers the duty of searching out crime and committing such offenders as they thought proper objects of prosecution. But we believe that this confusion of functions now produces very serious evils, especially when connected with the objection to which we shall next advert.

This objection arises from the officers being, by the very constitution of the system, so much involved in what are in this Island called political disputes. It is not to be understood that this expression relates to disputes upon any of the constitutional or national questions to which, in other countries, the word political is appropriated. Little is heard, we believe, of such questions in Jersey: but the inhabitants of the Island are divided into two parties, which contend with the utmost vehemence, and, we are compelled to add, the utmost virulence, for the possession of power in the States and in the Parochial Assemblies. With these parties the Police are inevitably mixed up. One third of the States, the only part which is renewed by periodical popular election, consists of the constables. The Jurats, who constitute another third, are elected for life by the rate-payers; and the rate is fixed by the Parochial Assembly. Of this Parochial Assembly, as we have shewn, the Police constitute a necessary part. Besides this, the Parochial Assembly itself elects the vingteniers and the officiers du connétable, and the rate-payers elect the constables and the centeniers; thus producing, to a certain extent, a circle of self-election. It is true that many of the Police who are entitled by their office to form a part of the Parochial Assembly would do so merely in virtue of their property; but their official presence in the Assembly necessarily makes them the nucleus of a party. In St. Hélier's, for instance, the most important parish, there are (according to a return with which we have been furnished by Mr. Gardner, the Secretary to the Lieutenant Governor) 340 members of the Parochial Assembly, who vote by virtue of rate, and hold no office; 31 police and ex-police officers, who vote ex-officio, but would not vote by virtue of rate; and 11 police officers, who are entitled to vote both ex-officio and by virtue of rate: so that about a ninth of the Assembly consists of police officers, and this without reckoning the ex-police officers who are entitled to vote by virtue of rate. In country parishes the case is much stronger. In St. Ouen's the whole number of members is only 48, and 26 of these consist of police officers. In every parish but one there is a strong police and anti-police party. The elections of the officers of Police are the occasions of eager party conflicts. The rating itself furnishes matter for party dispute, it being alleged that the predominant party in the Assembly assesses the rate so as to include as many friends as possible within the amount which makes Principaux of rate-payers, and either to exclude adversaries from the rate altogether, or assess them at the highest rate which would not make them Principaux, or, if they are Principaux, to assess them in a sum unduly large in comparison with that at which the Principaux of the opposite party are assessed. The appeal to the Royal Court is unsatisfactory. That Court, from its constitution, does not escape the imputation of party motives; and a person excluded from the rate can obtain redress only by being assessed at half his actual property, while it is notorious that the assessment throughout the Island is universally much lower. The elections of constables and centeniers may likewise be disputed before the Royal Court: but this again is too apt to assume the character of a party contest. In St. Hélier's, Mr. Le Sueur, the constable of the parish, as might be expected from his activity and acknowledged ability, has earned the confidence of his own party. But we cannot look upon a circumstance of this sort as other than unfortunate so far as regards the working of the police system. In most of the parishes, in St. Hélier's, perhaps, most conspicuously, the performance of the functions of the Police is continually subject to the imputation of political partialities or antipathies. Much evidence on this point was produced: and we were compelled to adopt the conclusion that these feelings often do, with some of the offiers, vitiate the performance of the duty, and often, which is an evil only one degree less, are unjustly suspected to do so. Mr. Le Sueur urged strongly upon us that the efficiency of the Police was more moral than physical, and that the moral efficiency was seriously diminished by the results of party animosity The soundness of this opinion was put beyond all question by the evidence produced before us.

One consequence of the party spirit which has entered into all discussions connected with the Police is, that the magnitude of the evil is itself a matter of dispute. But the dispute is only as to the degree; for that there are evils in the present system appears not to be questioned at all. There is, necessarily, much difference of opinion as to the extent and nature of the remedy to be applied: but no one seems to suggest that things should remain as at present.

Mr. Le Sueur, whom we may consider as the ablest representative of the party most adverse to extensive changes, suggests three remedies: these are, an improvement in the law of rating, the appointment of a magistrate for the immediate adjudication upon minor offences, and the institution of a paid night-watch. The mode of rating is fixed by a law of 1833, at which time the majority in the States was in the hands of the party opposed to that which has now the majority, and which latter is the same as the present police party in St. Héliers. In the recital of that Act it is stated, "que souvent ceux qui formaient la majorité dans les Assemblées de Paroisse, abusant du pouvoir que la loi leur a confié, ont, à la veille d'une élection, dans la vue de favoriser leur candidat, obtenu une rectification du Rât Paroissial, et y ont fait inscrire des personnes qui ne possédaient aucune propriété, et en ont fait retrancher qui avaient les moyens de contribuer aux taxes publiques, et que ces abus de pouvoir ont donné naissance à une foule de procès, et servent d'autant plus à alimenter l'esprit de parti et à soulever des passions haineuses, qu'ils restent le plus souvent impunis par le défaut de la legislation actuelle; que la plupart des Assemblées de Paroisse ne répartissent point les taxes publiques en proportion de la fortune des contribuables, et ne suivent, pour ainsi dire, d'autre règle que leurs caprices." The law, however, which was then introduced, has not removed these abuses. But, even if a perfect system of rating could be devised, the only result would be that the prevalent party in the Parochial Assembly would have less power to oppress or exclude their adversaries: the spirit of party would not the less attach to the police system: nor do we think it possible that this can be prevented so long as the choice of the officers is a subject of party contest. We therefore do not suggest any alteration in the constitution of the Parochial Assembly, nor in the mode of rating. Such alterations may or may not be desirable in themselves: but, as we think it necessary to do away altogether with the connection between the Police and the Parochial Assembly, we consider that the question as to the mode of rating and the constitution of the Assembly ceases to be a subject within the compass of our inquiry.

It appears to us that there can be no doubt as to the propriety of the second measure proposed by Mr. Le Sueur, the appointment of a magistrate before whom persons may be brought without delay. At present, prisoners are sometimes kept in custody for four or five days before they see a magistrate: and, when they do, it may happen that the offence charged has either not been committed, or has been one which would have been adequately punished by a shorter confinement. It sometimes happens that the officers, to avoid the risk of this injustice, allow offences to pass with impunity altogether. The appointment of such a magistrate would also be important in another point of view, to which we shall advert when we speak of the constitution of the Court.

We also agree altogether in the propriety of adopting the other measure proposed by Mr. Le Sueur, the institution of a paid nightly watch.

It has been suggested, in many quarters, that this ought to be carried further, and that there should be, not only a paid nightly watch, but a paid Police, acting throughout the island. This is a point upon which the most vehement conflict of opinion exists. We believe, but with some doubt, that a numerical majority of the inhabitants is opposed to such a plan. The minority, if it be one, which supports it, is at least equally vehement in the expression of its feelings. Mr. Le Sueur himself is decidedly opposed to this enlargement of his plan; and, as he may be considered the head of the present police party in St. Héliers, we proceed to discuss his objections, which were urged with much force and distinctness.

He thought it, in the first place, important that the unpaid functionaries of the Police should still, ex officio, form a part of the Parochial Assembly, in order to countervail the influence possessed by the paid functionaries, such as the Procureur Général, who also take their places there ex officio. If it became necessary to enter into this question, we should have to compare the numbers of the different kinds of ex officio members, and to estimate how many, in the two cases, would have been in the Parochial Assembly independently of their office. But this we need not do, because the proposed change would not vary the constitution of the Assembly in this respect. If there is to be a paid Police, we should propose that the constable, centeniers, vingteniers and officiers du connétable should be elected as at present, and in the same numbers, retaining even the same names. The duties connected with the Criminal Law would be entirely taken away from them; their other duties would remain. The constable would still be the representative of the parish in the States, and the centeniers his deputies in case of absence. There are also some trifling duties which are exercised by the vingteniers; they consist in the collection of certain fines, which produces a small remuneration, and that of the parochial rates, which is gratuitously performed. The officiers du connétable might still be elected, and take their place in the Parochial Assembly, as assisting, if that be necessary, in counteracting the influence of the paid ex officio members. Nothing of this would be lost by taking away from all the present police officers the whole of the duties connected with the preservation of the peace and the enforcing the Criminal Law. They would be relieved from duties which are extremely onerous, and for which they are not paid; and the distinction which their election confers upon them would be, to say the least, not impaired. This would not even, according to Mr. Le Sueur's view, diminish their political power; for that gentleman is of opinion that those duties are never executed with the intention or the effect of promoting any party object. The reverse is, indeed, asserted by the advocates for the change; but, as these would object to party power so supported, the practical result is the same. The state of parties, for all purposes, at least for all avowed legitimate purposes, would be unaltered.

Mr. Le Sueur's other objection does not admit of so easy an answer. It arises from the probable expense. At present, the whole of the duties of the Police are performed gratuitously: the remuneration looked to is the power and distinction which, under the existing system, is conferred by the election to the offices. This motive will cease to act, when the appointment no longer is connected with political power. We were, indeed, assured by one of the most active of the centeniers that he served from the love of his country: but it will not be reasonable to calculate upon the prevalence of such a motive in general, as an inducement to undertake the duties of a police officer. It cannot be doubted that a large expense must be incurred if the change is to be made.

We have had the advantage of communicating with Captain Hay, who, under the direction of Your Majesty's Government, visited Jersey for the purpose of making inquiries on this subject. He estimates the expense of a change as to which there seems to be little or no difference of opinion, the introduction of a sitting magistrate and a night police, to act in the town of St. Hélier's, at 1560*l.* 4*s.* By making this a day police as well as a night police, the expense, he calculates, would be increased to 1972*l.* 4*s.*; and to 2746*l.* by extending it over the whole Island. The difference of expense between the least and most extensive of the schemes is therefore that between 1560*l.* 4*s.* and 2746*l.*, or 1185*l.* 16*s.*, upon which sum the practical question turns. Mr. Le Sueur suggested that the more contracted scheme might be paid for partly from the States and partly from a tax upon houses. Mr. Gardner (whose estimate of the probable expense was rather higher than that of Captain Hay, namely, 3097*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*) recommended a tax upon tobacco, at 4*d.* per lb. This, he calculated, would produce 3942*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*: but his calculation makes no allowance for any diminution in the consumption consequent upon the imposition of this tax. The tax could, however, hardly raise so little as the 2746*l.*, at which Captain Hay estimates the whole expense. A large revenue would fall in if, instead of the real functions of the Governor being executed, as now, by a Lieutenant Governor, the Governor were to act in person, and receive only the remuneration which the Lieutenant Governor receives at present. But, upon any view, the proposed change will involve some increase of expense: the inhabitants of the Island of course are not willing to incur additional taxation; and, if the money were supplied from Great Britain, we believe the arrangement would please neither country.

Mr. Le Sueur pointed out to us that the prosperity of the Island is, in a great degree, attributable to the absence of local taxation. This is clearly the case. The question, however, still remains, whether the evil state of the law, which manifestly derogates from the prosperity of the Island in the most extensive sense of the word, does not do so even as far as concerns its mere wealth. At any rate, the choice is to be made between an additional expense and the continuance of a system like the present. We have only to say that to us the latter appears much the greater evil. Upon the best judgment, therefore, which we have been able to form, we recommend that the police functions of the present officers should entirely cease, and that a paid police force be organized, independent of the Parochial Assembly, having power to act indiscriminately throughout the Island. That this would, at first, be disliked by a large part of the population we think highly probable; but we believe that the dislike would be temporary, and that the inhabitants would very speedily feel the advantage of seeing, in the place of officers created by, and forming a section of, a party, mere public servants devoted to the particular duty.

We proceed to offer the opinion which we have formed as to the present constitution of the Royal Court. It has been seen that the twelve Jurats are elected for life, and form a third part of the legislative body. One of these gentlemen had been at the bar; another had been an écrivain in very extensive practice; most of them had served in the offices of constable and centenier; very few had received anything like a legal preparation for the office. We think it scarcely necessary to state our opinion that a Court so constituted is unfit, from want of legal knowledge, to administer the law. The Bailiff is, and of late years has generally been, a regularly educated lawyer; but his legal knowledge is never available unless there be a difference of opinion among the Jurats, and an equality of votes for each opinion. Even then, he can vote only for one of the opinions which the Jurats support: and it has happened that he has been compelled to support an opinion at variance with his own, because, of the two opinions held by the Jurats, neither accorded with his view of the law.

The incapacity of this tribunal does not constitute the only, perhaps not the greatest, objection to it. By the nature of the election of the Jurats, they are constantly put into office from party views. A very common introduction to the office of Jurat is the having served in the offices of centenier and constable, a circumstance which tends strongly to generate party feelings before the election to the Juratship. After such election, the functions which the Jurats are called upon to discharge in the States necessarily operate in keeping party feelings alive. The result is, that this tribunal does not possess the confidence of the inhatants, and, we think, does not deserve it. One only argument was suggested to us in support of this part of the system. It was said that an inhabitant would possibly attach more weight to the opinion of the Bailiff, if that were confirmed by the voice of Jurats whom the inhabitants had concurred in electing. But we cannot feel the force of this. First, as Mr. Advocate F. Godfray reminded us, there is a minority in every contest as well as a majority; and an inhabitant who had voted against a Jurat might think so much the worse of an opinion for its having the sanction of a Jurat whom he deemed not fit for the place. But, next, the Jurat's vote must either agree with that of the Bailiff or differ from it. If it differed, the probability would be that the Bailiff, a lawyer, was right, and the confidence in the Jurat would be misplaced. If it agreed, any additional confidence occasioned by that circumstance would be erroneous, as being grounded on the circumstance of a competent opinion being supported by an incompetent one. We consider that the judgment of the Jurats, except in the few accidental cases where a lawyer has been elected, must be superfluous where it agrees with that of the Bailiff and mischievous where it differs. There is little chance of this being remedied by a general determination, on the part of the rate-payers, to elect only competent lawyers to the office; and such a determination would not be desirable, as it would continually exclude valuable members from the legislature, and would create a criterion very ill applicable to legislative functions. We think it unnecessary to add to these considerations the arguments ordinarily urged against a multiplicity of judges, and will merely state that, as this tribunal is constituted, the evils which are usually attributed to a numerous bench seem to us to be aggravated, and the benefits to be excluded.

We therefore, without any hesitation whatever, recommend that no member of this branch of the legislative body shall form part of the judicial body. We will hereafter suggest what appears to us a better mode of constituting the tribunal.

The present mode of preparing a case for the judgment of the grande enquête appears to us altogether faulty. Mr. Le Sueur urged upon us the impropriety of leaving it exclusively to the discretion of the law officer of the Crown, whether a case should be brought forward or not. It is not indeed quite clear that the Court cannot compel a prosecution where the Procureur Général refuses to prosecute; but this, in practice, is not done. We concur with Mr. Le Sueur in this view: and we believe that the exercise of the discretion by the Procureur Général has occasionally been made the subject of attack by political antagonists of the particular functionary, and exposed to the imputation of party motive. The constitution of the enditement is, we believe, objected to by every individual who has expressed an opinion on the subject.

We propose that there should be appointed from time to time, by the Crown, three paid Judges; a Judge for cases of summary jurisdiction, a Judge for preliminary proceeding, and a Judge for trials by the enquête. That none of these should vacate office during life, except by resignation, or by order of Privy Council after a hearing and enquiry. That these three should at fixed periods sit together, and form a Criminal Court of Three. That the individuals filling these places should be selected from the present Bailiff and Jurats, but not from Jurats to be hereafter elected, and from the present and future Bar; but this rule of selection should not be, we suggest, a matter of positive law, but simply, as in England, a matter of understood ordinary practice. That the three individuals so appointed should discharge indiscriminately the different offices; provided that the Judge who tries by the enquête should never be the Judge who has presided over the preliminary proceeding in the particular case. That, if a Member of the States or Advocate accept the office of Judge, his office of Member or Advocate should be thereby ipso facto vacant, and that he should be incapable of reelection or reappointment so long as he holds the office of Judge.

That the ordinary course of instituting criminal proceedings which are to terminate in an enquête shall be, for the Police to bring before the Judge for preliminary proceedings a party charged, and proper evidence. That such Judge shall sit every day, and that a police officer shall detain the party charged in custody in a station house only till he can be brought before such Judge. That such Judge shall then hear evidence upon oath, and discharge the prisoner, or commit him for trial, or to prison for reexamination, or bail him. That copies of the depositions so taken, when complete, shall be sent to the officer of the Criminal Court of Three, the law officer of the Crown, and the prisoner or his legal adviser. That all the three Judges shall have the power to issue warrants for the apprehension of a party. That any neglect or misconduct by a police officer shall be an indictable offence. That, when the party is finally committed or ordered for trial, the Procureur Général shall frame the accusation. That the prisoner, having a certain number of days' notice of the acccusation by receiving a copy, shall be brought before the Judge for the trial by the enquête, who shall sit at fixed intervals; and the prisoner shall there plead, and, if he plead Guilty, shall be sentenced by such Judge, or, if he plead Not guilty, be tried, and, if found Guilty by the grande enquête, be sentenced. That such Judge shall have the power, at his discretion, to postpone the trial, or to adjourn it after it has commenced. The absence of material witnesses, or the apparent fitness of producing fresh testimony, may, among other cases, furnish proper opportunity for the exercise of such discretion; though we think that, in the latter case, it should be very rarely and cautiously exercised. That it shall be competent to the prisoner or the Procureur Général afterwards to apply to the Criminal Court of Three, either to have the judgment stayed or reversed for illegality, or to have a new trial ordered in case the Court be satisfied, by affidavit or the report of the Judge who has presided at the trial, that there has been a failure of justice at the trial. That, in any case where a party has been ordered for trial by the Judge for preliminary proceedings, the law officer of the Crown shall be entitled to quash the proceedings at any stage. That he shall likewise have the power, ex officio, to demand a warrant for the arrest of any party, and bring him to trial, and frame an accusation on his own responsibility; it being understood that this is done only in cases where he is of opinion that there would be, or has been, a failure of justice in the Court for preliminary proceedings. That, where he does so, he shall himself examine witnesses on oath, and furnish the prisoner or his legal adviser, and the officer of the Criminal Court of Three, with the copies of depositions and of the accusation. That the trial shall then proceed as before. That, where the Judge for preliminary proceedings has refused to send to trial, or where the law officer of the Crown has quashed the proceedings before trial, it shall be competent to any party to bring the case by affidavit before the Criminal Court of Three, who, if they think fit, shall direct a prosecution by the law officers of the Crown, or, if they refuse, shall appoint a commissioner to take the depositions, which shall be transmitted like the depositions in other cases; and the Court shall appoint an advocate to frame the accusation and conduct the prosecution. That, where a private party intends to pursue this course, he shall be entitled to apply to any of the three Judges for a warrant to arrest the accused, which Judge shall issue or refuse the warrant at his discretion.

We think that these three methods of proceeding will suffice to secure the public against negligence or partiality in keeping back prosecutions; and, further, we think that the prisoner will thus come before the enquête, not, as now, with a verdict recorded against him upon the same evidence which is to be before the enquête, but only with the opinion of the magistrate, or law officer, or Court, that, upon ex parte evidence, there is a case for inquiry. We do not agree with Mr. Advocate F. Godfray, who considers that this would prejudice the enquête against a prisoner more than a verdict upon the identical evidence. Nor do we think that the experience which this country has had of the working of the system of Grand Juries is such as to furnish any reason either for retaining in the law of Jersey, or introducing into it, any proceeding analogous to the method of finding indictments in England.

The depositions will not form evidence in the cause. The witnesses at the trial should be all heard on oath, in the presence of the enquête. The prosecutor and defendant should each have the power to summon witnesses, by a warrant from the office of the Criminal Court of Three, to be served by the prevôt. The present method of taking the testimony of witnesses who are unable to attend, by means of the Viscount, should be continued; but the Court at the trial should, before such testimony is read, require proof of the inability of the witness to appear in person. Either party should be entitled to produce the depositions (which for that purpose should be transmitted to the Judge, by the officer of the Criminal Court of Three), not as evidence of the facts there sworn to, but as merely evidence, if it become material, that the witnesses gave such testimony before, which will become material on the trial only in few instances, as where a witness contradicts or enlarges his former testimony. The witnesses before the enquête need not be confined to those whose depositions have been taken, nor need those who were examined appear before the enquête; but the addition or subtraction of witnesses will, of course, always furnish matter of comment to the jury. The present mode of reading the constable's report to the enquête we hold to be very objectionable, especially as it generally comprehends hearsay, and other matters which are not legal evidence. The law officer of the Crown and the counsel for the prisoner concur in urging the jury not to notice what is not evidence; but it should not be heard at all. We hardly think it necessary to point out the impropriety of the present mode of taking the evidence in writing in the absence of the jury, and reading it to the jury without their seeing the witnesses. But we must advert to an opinion expressed by Mr. Advocate Marett on this subject; and the more so, because this gentleman has devoted much thought and labour to the subjects brought before us, and has addressed himself to the inquiry with perfect freedom from party feeling. Mr. Marett, though alive to the importance of letting the jury hear the evidence given, was of opinion that the enquête would not gain so much by this, as they would lose by not having the evidence taken down in writing and handed to them for consideration and comparison. We do not agree in this opinion; and we think that the Judge's notes of the evidence given, which ought to be read fully to the jury, would supply the want of the written evidence. But, if this be not so, we think that the two methods might be combined, and that the evidence, though given before the enquête, might still be taken down and read over to the witnesses, and the writing handed to the jury. It is possible that our English habits lead us to underrate the advantages insisted upon by Mr. Marett. The objection to combining the two methods would be the increase of time occupied in the trial, an objection which cannot countervail the advantage, if it be one. We recommend, further, that, if the evidence is to be taken down fully by the officer of the Court, the very words of the question and answer should be taken, and the present mode of substituting the third person for the first and second be discontinued.

Another objection was urged to the hearing of vivâ voce evidence by the jury at all. It was suggested that the experience and ability ordinarily possessed by the law officers of the Crown would give them an advantage in cross-examining witnesses, which would prejudice the case for the defence in the eyes of the jury. We think the risk of this much less when the cross examination takes place in the presence of the jury, than under the present method. An apparent contradiction may appear very serious when the evidence is seen only as written, which, if the jury had heard and witnessed the tone and manner of the question and answer, might be fully accounted for.

It will be observed that the plan which we propose gives, in ordinary cases, only one trial by jury, and does not entitle the prisoner to claim a second. The double trial is considered by some persons, though not by the majority of the bar, as a feature of the present system which ought to be preserved. Mr. Advocate F. Godfray, whose great experience, as a defender of prisoners, entitles his opinion to much deference, argued very earnestly against a change in this respect. He considered this part of the present system valuable, not simply as giving the prisoner a better chance of escape, but as increasing the probability of arriving at the truth, whether the prisoner was guilty or not. If this be a correct view, the end would be more properly attained by entitling the prisoner to demand a second trial by the enquête, than by the present method. And it should seem that, according to Mr. Godfray's view, the prosecutor ought to have the same power in the event of an acquittal. Nor do we understand where the argument stops, or why, if two trials should be allowed on account of their increasing the probability of arriving at the truth, there should not be three, or more. We are, however, of opinion that the risk of injustice on one trial will be sufficiently guarded against by requiring, in the first instance, the exercise of the judgment of the magistrate who sends to trial, and entrusting the Criminal Court of Three, after one trial, with the power of ordering a second, if necessary to the ends of justice.

The proceeding before the Judge of summary jurisdiction requires little explanation. A summons, and, on disobedience, a warrant to arrest, might be granted by any of the three Judges. The witnesses should be heard vivâ voce, as now; but it need not be required that all should be present at once; and the Judge should have the power of postponing or adjourning the hearing. This Judge should also have the power to order that a case brought before him should be taken before the Judge for preliminary proceedings.

Mr. Advocate F. Godfray informed us that, some years ago, he proposed to do away with the twelve Jurats as Judges, and to substitute two paid Judges elected by the people from practising lawyers, but that the scheme was so unpopular that it was abandoned. We think that the advantages of popular election do not extend to the selection of Judges; and we therefore have proposed that the Judges should, as is the case in countries quite as jealous on behalf of popular rights as Jersey, be named by the Crown. This, however, will not add to the popularity of the change in the first instance. On the other hand, Mr. Godfray is of opinion, that the unpopularity of appointing paid Judges would be at this time, to a certain extent, diminished.

This leads us to recommend another change. Mr. Godfray's proposal, as we understand, was that the selection should be made from the Bar. The Bar consists now of nominally eight persons, including the law officers of the Crown; and two of the eight have discontinued attending the Court. There would thus be only six to select from; for which reason we have also suggested that the present Jurats, who have had some experience, be added to the Bar, as a body from which to select. Further, however, we think that the Bar should be no longer confined to this number. Business has occasionally been suspended from the difficulty of finding advocates to act. And the arbitrary power of appointment, now lodged in the Bailiff, should be done away with. We recommend, therefore, that the number of advocates be unrestricted. And we would suggest that the power of admitting them should be lodged in the Criminal Court of Three, and that this Court should form some rules for ascertaining and securing the qualifications of applicants. We offer no positive advice as to what these rules should be; but one negative recommendation we must make, namely, that to be a member of the English bar, or to have kept a certain number of terms in England, should not, unless the system in this country be greatly altered, be allowed to be, either wholly or partially, a qualification for admission to the bar of Jersey.

We have defined the duties of the three proposed Judges, so far only as regards the administration of criminal justice. The proposed plan would not create a heavy demand upon the time of the persons holding these offices, especially as the state of business might be often such as to allow one of the Judges to dispose of the cases in two Courts, the only restriction being that no Judge should try with an enquête a case which he himself had ordered for trial. But it would be easy to distribute among the three Judges other duties which they might conveniently perform. If, for instance, a plan was carried into effect which, to a certain point, has received the sanction of the States, namely, the establishment of a Court for the recovery of small debts, this Court might be presided over by any of the three Judges. And, should any general change be made hereafter in the method of trying civil causes, the three Judges might be called upon to take part in the new system: for we think it a great advantage that the persons who adjudge upon criminal cases should be familiar with the law upon civil questions.

The proposed plan takes away from the rate-payers the power to elect by their suffrages the criminal Judges. We believe the possession of such a power to be, not essential to the maintenance of popular rights, but inconsistent with it. Still, if so great a change is to be made respecting offices hitherto filled by popular suffrage, it may deserve consideration whether that suffrage is allowed its due effect in other respects. At present, two thirds of the Members of the States sit for life: the responsibility to the electors extends to one third only. If the constables are no longer to exercise the duties of the Police, they become purely politicial functionaries; and the question suggests itself, whether the proportion which they bear to the members who sit in the States for life be sufficiently large. Another question will be whether, as the President of that Assembly, in the proposed plan, will no longer be a judicial officer, the office ought to be filled by the appointment of the Crown or by the States themselves. We do no more than indicate these questions, as they do not come directly within the scope of the inquiry with which we are charged: and we allude to them now merely for the purpose of suggesting that, if changes are to be made in the constitution of the States, it might be well to make them contemporaneous, or nearly so, with the proposed changes in the criminal tribunals.

We have next to remark upon the constitution of the Grande Enquête. Conformably with the ancient Norman institutions, the members of this body are chosen by a legal functionary, at present the law officer of the Crown, and summoned a few hours before the trial. This is altogether inconsistent with modern principles, and is universally objected to. It is agreed that the duty of selection has been exercised with perfect fairness by the individuals upon whom it has fallen: but the present character of individuals is only a temporary guarantee; and, even assuming that the duty will always be as fairly discharged as at present, it can hardly be doubted that in cases producing much excitement there will be risk of suspicion and imputations being suggested, which may seriously impair the public confidence in the administration of justice.

In January, 1846, a projet de loi for the amendment of criminal procedure was referred to a Committee of the States. No report had been presented at the time of our inquiry. It was drawn up by the very learned and able person who now fills the office of Avocat de la Reine. We find many of our views anticipated in this valuable document: but at present we refer to it only for the plan there laid down for the constitution of the enquête. The plan, in substance, is that a list be annually prepared and revised of persons, with exceptions in certain cases of exemption, rated to a certain amount, and that names from these should be taken by lot for the juries. We concur altogether in this recommendation: and, for the details, we refer to the project itself. There may be some doubt whether the present number of twenty four be not inconveniently large. If the demand made upon the time of the rate-payers be not complained of, there need be no alteration in this respect; if any alteration be made, we recommend that the number should be twelve, and that the prisoner be acquitted unless ten of the twelve pronounce him guilty, thus preserving the present proportion: or the number might be eighteen, the concurrence of fifteen being made necessary for the condemnation. We are not disposed to recommend a change to the English principle of requiring unanimity: the law of Jersey, besides being sanctioned by practice, appears to us by far the more reasonable of the two.

The opinions of those whom we examined appeared to be unanimously in favour of the entire abolition of the causes en ajonction. In this we altogether concur. If the case be one in which the public is interested, no private person ought to have any control over the prosecution: if it be not, it ought to be treated as a cause exclusively civil.

Having stated our views upon the general system, as regards both the classification of crimes and punishments, and the process of enforcing the law, we shall conclude with some suggestions on certain points, connected with the administration of criminal justice, but not finding a convenient place in our preceding remarks.

The extent of the local jurisdiction of the Island seems to be not very clearly defined. If a mortal wound were given at sea, on board a Jersey ship, by one inhabitant of Jersey to another, and the ship put first into Jersey, and the death occurred there, it appears to be agreed that the Criminal Court of the Island could take cognizance of the case. But it is not clear how many of those conditions, without the others, are enough to give the jurisdiction. This ought to be settled; and for this purpose an Act of Parliament will be necessary.

It is not clearly settled at what age responsibility to criminal law commences, nor what is the proper mode of proceeding when the supposed criminal is insane at the time of the trial or was so at the time of the alleged crime: and the law does not provide sufficiently for the proper custody of lunatics charged with criminal offences. There is also no determinate rule as to whether any, and if so what, length of time from the commission of a crime exempts the criminal from punishment. These points ought to be settled by an enacting or declaratory Ordinance.

The present law, which takes away from the Criminal Court all jurisdiction in cases of treason and violence committed upon the servants of the Crown in the execution of their offices, may be reasonable. But the proper mode of proceeding in Jersey, in such cases, is not settled; nor has it been, so far as we know, actually decided that the English statutes as to treasons extend to the Island. Upon general principles, we presume that all such statutes would have force in Jersey: but we consider that an Act of Parliament would be useful for the purpose of putting an end to these doubts.

Should the revision of the laws, which we have recommended, take place, it may deserve consideration whether the law of forfeiture to the Crown ought to remain. All the higher offences now involve this penalty: but the income accruing to the Crown must be utterly insignificant, even if the right of the Crown were uniformly insisted upon: and, in that case, the result would scarcely be consistent with the humane spirit of modern legislation.

The levée de corps, if a proper system of police were introduced, would become entirely useless; at present it is so, except in case of the neglect of the Police; yet, in the great majority of cases, we believe that it is only in consequence of notice from the Police that the proceeding does take place. The finding of the jury does not, as in England, constitute an accusation; the Procureur Général always proceeds on the constable's Report in these as in other cases. The proceedings, therefore, appear to be altogether superfluous, except in the case of suicide, where the finding of the jury would be necessary for securing the forfeiture. But we have already mentioned that the jury always find the fact of insanity, so that this case never arises; and, further, if forfeiture be abolished, it never can arise. In the projet de loi, of which we have spoken, it was proposed that the verdict on the levée de corps should be sufficient of itself to send the accused party to trial. The proceeding would thus be brought into conformity with the English law; but, to the best of our judgment, this is a point in which the English law does not deserve imitation. If the levée de corps is to continue, some regulation ought to be made as to the expenses. On this subject there are disputes pending between the States and Your Majesty's Receiver.

The law of evidence requires revision in many respects.

Certain degrees of relationship have, from early times, been sufficient to exclude witnesses from giving testimony, except in particular cases. A recent Ordinance of the States, which was intended to define the law in this respect, has not placed it on a satisfactory footing. The exempted cases are not intelligible; and the restrictions appear to us very unreasonable.

Some movements have been made towards the establishment of a law for the case of witnesses who object to take an oath. In consequence, however, of the English statute being inapplicable to the mode of proceeding in Jersey, and of the legislative enactment of the States not having been sanctioned by Privy Council, grievances have occurred to individuals, and must continue to occur, from time to time, until the law on this point is satisfactorily laid down.

By the present practice of the Courts, evidence may be given against the character of a witness; and, for this purpose, proof may be made of particular acts done by him, as to which acts negative proof may be given, including fresh evidence against the character of witnesses brought to prove the acts, which last mentioned evidence may itself consist of proof of particular acts, and so on without limit. Evidence in favour of the character of accused parties may also consist of proof of particular acts; and this may produce the same latitude of proof.

The Courts appear to have retained an ancient principle requiring two witnesses to a fact. This seems latterly to have been so far modified, that there need not be two witnesses to an insulated fact, although still there should be, in strictness, no conviction if only one witness be heard in the case. This difficulty will very rarely occur: but the state of law on the point seems to us unreasonable.

If a required witness be out of the Island, the Court has no means of obtaining his evidence. To remedy this inconvenience, which has been frequently felt, an Act of Parliament seems necessary.

Persons nominated by the Bailiff as écrivains perform certain duties, in some respects analogous to those of English attorneys: among these is included the taking down the evidence: but no regular training or qualification is prescribed. We think it would be expedient that the Criminal Court should determine upon some mode of ensuring the proper education for this profession, and that the admission should be formal and public. Further, we think that such a duty as that of taking down evidence which is to be recorded ought to be performed by a regular officer of the Court.

It has been suggested to us that the proceedings ought to be carried on in English, and not, as now, in French. It is probable that this will be necessary at a time not far distant. Mr. Gardner calculates that the number of persons who, for practical purposes, may be considered English, amounts to half the population. On examining the elements of his calculation, it appears to us that the proportion is not so large: but unquestionably the English part of the population does form a very considerable part of the inhabitants, especially in St. Hélier's, which produces the greater number of criminal cases. This proportion will become continually larger, if we are right in thinking that the influx of persons who are not natives is the principal source of the increase of the population and of crime. Besides this, throughout the Island the English language is rapidly gaining ground. In St. Hélier's it is not common to meet with a person who cannot converse in English; and in the rural parts of the Island the children can do so almost universally. Probably, in another generation the English language will be at least as familiarly known as the French. We are, nevertheless, not prepared to recommend a total change. If the necessity should arise, the change will be universally called for, which is certainly not the case at present. But some modification of the present system is necessary. The offenders, brought before the Court in the ten years which elapsed from the end of 1835 to the end of 1845, were in number,—

| English, Irish, and Scotch . . . . . | 1264 |
| Inhabitants of the Channel Islands . . . | 670 |

So that much the larger part of the persons who have been subjected to the criminal law of Jersey have been ignorant of the language in which the proceedings have taken place. This becomes very important in the case of a trial; for the accused party, unless he understands the language used by his advocate, is unable to offer information or suggestions which may be brought to his mind by the speech of his counsel. We should recommend, therefore, that the Court should have the power, at discretion, upon a request to that effect from the prisoner or his legal adviser, to order that the proceedings should take place in English. This order should be made before the Jury is selected, as ignorance of the language in which the proceedings are to take place should be a good ground of challenge.

The order in which the counsel now address the Court and Jury appears to us not the most convenient or fair. After the evidence is read, the counsel for the defence is heard, and then the Law Officer for the Crown, who is counsel for the prosecution. No other address is made until after the verdict is given. It would, we think, be better that the counsel for the prosecution should always open the nature of the case and the evidence to be produced: it furnishes a fair matter of comment when the evidence produced shows that the counsel for the prosecution has been misled as to the case. For the same reason, the counsel for the accused ought, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, and before the evidence for the defence is given, to address the Jury. At the close of the whole evidence (including the evidence, if any, given in reply), both counsel should, we think, be again heard, the counsel for the defence last. This seems to us, on the whole, the fairest arrangement: it will be seen that it differs from the English practice, as well as from that of Jersey. Further, we see no advantage in the present practice of following up the verdict by the conclusions of the counsel for the prosecution.

A custom prevails, which we think very objectionable, of allowing parties charged with trifling larcenies and other offences to quit the Island instead of undergoing prosecution. Their passage is then paid, either to Guernsey or England; in the latter case, ordinarily to Southampton. When a party is so sent out of the Island, a term is generally fixed, within which the party is not to return, under "telle péine qu'il appartiendra." This is seldom done in the case of natives.

We were told that, when paupers in Jersey, who are not natives, apply for relief, they are generally sent back to their settlement; but, upon further inquiry, it appeared that settlement meant the place of birth only, and that the sending back consisted in dispatching the pauper to the port in England to which he could most readily be sent, the passage being so far paid. Complaints are made in Jersey of the carelessness with which paupers are sent from England to the Island, on the supposition of their being natives.

The whole of this subject seems to be one requiring the attention of Parliament.

The last point to which we have to advert is the power exercised by the Governor of sending persons, who are not natives, out of the Island. The Island is nearly in the condition of a garrison town; and unquestionably the Governor, who is responsible for the military defence, ought to have a power of this kind. It is, however, liable to abuse; and, in one case which was brought before us, the order of the Lieutenant Governor had manifestly been obtained for the purpose of correcting or regulating the domestic relations of a family. The proper remedy seems to be that, wherever the power is exerted, the Governor should be required to report the case, with the special circumstances, to Your Majesty's Secretary of State.

In closing our Report on the Criminal Laws and Tribunals of Jersey, we are bound to state to Your Majesty our conviction that some of the changes which we propose will be displeasing to a numerous part of the inhabitants, and that to another part it will appear that we have not gone far enough. So strong are the feelings of the extreme reforming party, that it was urged upon us to recommend measures which would stop little short of an absolute adoption of the English law, and an annexation of the Island to an English circuit. We cannot believe that this is necessary, and are persuaded that, until after the failure of every attempt to secure to the inhabitants the preservation of peace and the due administration of justice by a modification of their own institutions, so violent a change ought not to be attempted. Its unpopularity, though not a slight objection, is yet one less strong than the danger that generations may pass away before a system entirely new can be brought into working order and become adapted to the feelings and habits of the population. On the other hand, there is a very numerous party, to whom the mere fact of a change conveys a suspicion of an intention to subvert the constitution of the Island, or, at the least, to favour one party at the expense of another. Between these there are two parties: the one anxious for a reform of existing evils, but unwilling to see them too astutely, and keenly alive to the risk of violent changes; the other anxious to preserve what is free from evil, but unwilling to make allowances for a presumption in favour of what exists, and keenly alive to the mischief of actual abuses. From these two parties last described has proceeded the greater part of the evidence given to the Commissioners. We have endeavoured, to the best of our power, to avail ourselves of the caution of one and the zeal of the other. The general feeling which we entertain, both as to the principles upon which a reform ought to be based and as to the difficulty of forming our own judgment, we cannot describe better than in the words of a gentleman, in whose opinions we have not uniformly concurred, but to whose intelligence, learning and industry we have been much indebted throughout the inquiry. M. Marett, in his notice of the life and writings of M. Le Geyt, thus speaks of the failure of a former attempt at reform. "L'art de faire des lois, toujours difficile dans les circonstances même les plus favorables, devient bien autrement embarrassant lorsque celui qui l'exerce se trouve placé en dehors de la sphère qu'elles doivent régir. Car, pour qu'une loi soit sage, une réforme salutaire, il ne suffit pas que le principe en soit juste, la théorie parfaite, il faut aussi qu'elle s'accommode au génie du people pour lequel elle est faite, qu'elle convienne à leurs besoins et ne choque point leurs préjugés. Elle ne doit pas non plus se trouver trop en contradiction avec le système des lois déjà établi, mais être de nature à s'y incorporer facilement,—à s'y unir comme une greffe à sa souche; autrement, languissante et sans vigueur, elle ne porterait jamais de fruits. Pour bien remplir ces conditions, il faut que le législateur considère avec attention les mœurs de ceux auxquels il veut imposer des règles de conduite, et qu'il connaisse leur état social. Leur histoire lui doit être familière. Il doit avoir approfondi leurs institutions. Mais comment fera-t-il tout cela s'il ne vit au milieu d'eux ?"

Our attempt has been to overcome these difficulties by an anxious and not hurried consideration of the materials placed in our hands. The inhabitants of the Island are not only quick and ardent in their feelings, but prompt to learn and comprehend; and they are devotedly attached to the British Crown. We trust that the prejudices against change, so far as they are extravagant, may be temporary, and may even be conciliated in the first instance, if those upon whom the innovations are to operate shall be convinced of that which we will take upon ourselves to assert, that no alteration has been suggested, except with the single purpose of rendering the Criminal Law of Jersey, and the Tribunals by which it its administered, better calculated than they now are to suit the condition and promote the well-being of the inhabitants.

Office of the Channel Islands Criminal Law Commission, 10, King's Bench Walk, Temple.
July, 4th, 1846.

SIR,

I AM directed by the Commissioners for inquiring into the Criminal Laws of the Channel Islands to send you a Copy of their Commission, from which you will learn, generally, the objects of the Commission and the proposed subjects of inquiry.

I am further directed to inform you, that it is the intention of the Commissioners to visit the Channel Islands at a future stage of the inquiry, Before doing so they wish to be put in possession of information as full and accurate as can be obtained by written communications. They propose, therefore, to forward to those most likely to be conversant with the Criminal Law of the Channel Islands a series of questions. The first set of the series accompanies this communication; and the remainder will be sent with as little delay as possible.

I have to request your earliest attention to the questions now sent, especially as the Commissioners hope that the information furnished to them in answer to each set of questions will materially assist them in framing those which are to follow. You will perceive, therefore, that the value of any assistance you may afford to the Commissioners will be much increased by their receiving it early.

I have to request, that you will be so good as to send your answers to me to the above address.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient humble Servant,

CHARLES CLARK,

Secretary to the Commission.

COMMISSION APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE STATE OF THE CRIMINAL LAW IN THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

Office of the Commission,

QUESTIONS PROPOSED BY THE COMMISSIONERS.

Series No. 1.

Questions.

1. Will you state what opportunities you have had of becoming acquainted with the criminal law of ?

2. What tribunals exercise criminal jurisdiction in that island? How has their jurisdiction originated, and over what offences does it extend?

3. What are the authorities principally relied upon in the discussion of questions arising upon the criminal law?

4. When it is suspected that a party has committed an offence, what is the step first taken for the purpose of bringing him to justice?

5. Does the Court or officer before whom the accused is brought, in any, and, if so, in what cases, exercise a summary jurisdiction?

6. Where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, what preliminary proceedings take place before the accused party is put upon his trial? What steps are taken for securing his appearance before the Court which ultimately takes cognizance of the offence?

7. Where the jurisdiction is not of a summary kind, before what Court is he tried? How is the Court constituted? Are the functionaries who have sent the party to trial capable of acting as members of such Court?

8. By whom are the proceedings against the accused party instituted? What power has any functionary, at any and what stages, of causing the proceedings to be abandoned? What effect has such an abandonment upon future accusations?

9. At what stage, if any, is the charge against the party accused put into a definite form, written or otherwise? How far is it competent to the accuser to vary the form or substance of the charge? And, if at all, at what stage or stages may this be done? And, when this is done, what power has the party accused of remodelling or otherwise improving his defence?

10. What is the form of proceeding, if the party charged admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy to support the charge?

11. What is the form of proceeding, if the party charged simply denies the facts alleged against him?

12. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, is he thereby concluded as to the facts?

13. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the facts, is he thereby concluded as to their relevancy?

14. Is the party charged entitled to the assistance of counsel and other legal advisers? If so, of how many? By whom are the advisers selected? Where the party accused is unable to defray the expenses of legal assistance, has he any and what means of obtaining it?

15. What means has either the accusing or accused party of compelling the production of evidence, oral or documentary, at any and what stages of the proceedings?

16. At what stage in the above series of proceedings is evidence first received? And in what mode and in whose presence is it taken?

17. When is the party accused allowed to hear the evidence produced against him?

18. When is the party accused allowed to produce evidence to meet the evidence produced against him?

19. When, and to what extent, respectively, is the party accused allowed to question the witnesses produced against him?

20. Is there any and what stage, earlier than the actual judgment, after which fresh evidence may not be produced either for or against the party accused?

21. How much of the evidence received at the respective stages of the proceeding is taken down in writing?

22. How is the evidence which is taken down in writing afterwards used? Is it allowable, either against or on behalf of the accused party, to give proof that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to? If there are any distinctions in this respect between evidence taken at one stage of the proceedings and evidence taken at another, be pleased to point them out.

23. What are the privileges of the counsel of the party charged, as to being heard on questions of fact or law, and examining witnesses?

24. Has the party accusing or the party accused the privilege of being heard last?

25. What are the functionaries deciding the law, and what the functionaries deciding the fact?

26. By whom is judgment awarded?

27. Has the Court the power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings at any and what stages, and for what cause or causes?

28. Be pleased to detail, as circumstantially as possible, the incidents to accusation and trial, so far as they may not have been brought forward by the answers to the preceding questions.

29. What power of appeal has either the accusing or accused party in any and what forms of criminal proceeding? If any, be pleased to detail the incidents to bringing and deciding upon the appeal, following, as nearly as possible, the course indicated by the preceding questions.

30. If judgment be finally against the accused party, what are the steps taken to carry it into effect?

31. Be pleased, as far as it is in your power, to furnish the Commissioners with the forms used at the various steps of the proceedings which are the subject of the preceding questions: and state the oaths, if any, taken by the witnesses and the members of the Court respectively.

32. What are the modes of appointing the several functionaries mentioned in the answers to the above questions? For what length of time do they officiate? How, if at all, are they removable?

33. You are requested to give any information, not already disclosed by the answers to the preceding questions, respecting the criminal law of , which may appear to you important for the purposes of the commission.

34. You are requested to point out any defects which appear to you to exist in the present system, and to suggest such improvements as may occur to you.

Series No. 2.

1. Is there any and what age before which a person is not considered responsible to the criminal law? Is there any distinction in this respect between different offences?

2. What course is pursued if, at any stage of a criminal proceeding, it appears that the party charged was of unsound mind at the time of the offence? What is considered to be the test of such unsoundness of mind as to prevent a party from being responsible to the criminal law?

3. Are there any and what cases in which a married woman is considered not to be responsible to the criminal law?

4. Is there any case in which a party, otherwise responsible to the criminal law, is relieved from such responsibility by having acted under the control of another party?

5. When a party is charged with an offence, what is the result if it appear that he was

(1) Not the actual perpetrator, but present at the time of the offence, and assisting the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching, or otherwise?

(2) Not present, but that he instigated or assisted, by counsel or otherwise, the actual perpetrator before the time of the perpetration?

(3) Not present, but that he, after the perpetration, assisted, by counsel or otherwise, the actual perpetrator

(firstly) in attaining the end aimed at (as, for instance, by disposing of property stolen) by the actual perpetrator?

6. In the several cases supposed in the last question, can the party so instigating or assisting be charged with the principal offence? Is he in any, and what, cases chargeable with a specific crime as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence?

7. In the several cases above suggested, can the party participating be charged alone, or must he be charged together with the actual perpetrator? If he can be charged alone, is it necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been convicted previously?

8. Is there any and what distinction, in this respect, as to different offences?

9. In the cases severally contemplated in the fourth and following questions, what is considered to be legally the limit of actual or constructive presence?

10. Can more than one person be charged in a single prosecution? If so, what takes place if that which is charged as a joint offence is proved to have been an offence in which one of the accused parties did not participate?

11. May different offences be charged in a single prosecution against the same party? If so, may an offence committed by the party alone be charged in the same prosecution with one committed by him jointly with another person?

Questions.

12. Is there any, and what, limitation as to the time, reckoned from the commission of an offence, within which a prosecution must be instituted? Is there any, and what, distinction, in this respect, between different offences?

13. In what place or places must an offence have been committed, in order to subject the offender to a prosecution by the criminal law of ?

14. Is there any, and what, distinction, with respect to apprehension, trial or punishment, or any of the incidents thereto respectively, between offences committed in different places within the territory subject to the criminal law of ?

15. Does the law of recognise any classification of offences with respect either to the punishment to which they subject offenders, or the incidents of procedure and trial? If so, what is the technical nomenclature by which the different classes are respectively designated.

SERIES No. 3.

1. When a witness is produced against or for a party charged with an offence, must the evidence be given by the witness in the presence and hearing of the prosecutor and accused party, and of the tribunal which has to decide on the charge? Is there any and what difference made, in this respect, at different stages of the proceedings?

2. Is the evidence of such a witness given in writing, either by way of statement or in answer to written interrogatories, or orally, on questions put to him at the time on the part of the prosecution and of the party charged? Is there any and what difference made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings?

3. Is it required by the law of that all evidence relating to a criminal charge shall be given under sanction of the oath of the witness? Is there any and what difference made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings?

4. Is there any, and if so what, age before which a person cannot give evidence?

5. Can a person be excluded from giving evidence, for or against a party charged with an offence, on the ground of want of religious belief?

6. Does conviction of any, and if so of what, crimes render a person incompetent as a witness for or against a party charged with an offence?

7. If so, can the competency of such person as a witness be in any, and if so in what, manner restored?

8. Is a party charged with an offence capable of being a witness either for or against another party charged with the same offence?

9. If so, is it in the discretion of the Court to direct whether a party so charged should or should not be permitted to give evidence for or against another party charged with the same offence?

10. If such evidence is admitted, is it necessary that the testimony of such a witness should be confirmed by extrinsic evidence, and, if so, to what extent?

11. What effect has marriage upon the admissibility of the husband or wife as a witness, where either of them is charged with an offence? Can the husband, under any, and if so what, circumstances, be a witness for or against the wife, or the wife for or against the husband?

12. Does any incompetency arise from the affinity or consanguinity of the witness with the accuser or the party charged? If so, to what degrees of affinity or consanguinity does it extend?

13. Is it competent to the prosecutor or to the Court at any, and if so at what, stage of the proceedings to question the party charged touching the offence with which he is charged, or in explanation of the evidence given by any of the witnesses produced in support of the charge or for the defence?

14. Are the statements of the party charged, or his conversations with third persons before or after he has been charged with the offence, admissible in evidence either for or against him?

15. If such statements have been made by the party charged under the influence of a promise or threat, does this render them inadmissible in evidence?

16. Is the confession of a party charged with an offence conclusive evidence of his guilt? Or is he, notwithstanding such confession, permitted on his trial to adduce evidence in proof of his innocence?

17. Is the examination of a witness, whether against or in favour of the party accused, confined to those facts which the witness knows of his own knowledge? Or may he be examined as to what he has learned touching the matter in dispute from declarations, written or oral, of third parties? Is there any, and if so what, rule, in this respect, peculiar to the case of a person who, at the time of his making a declaration, believes himself to be dying?

18. Will a witness be permitted to state in evidence the contents of a written document without producing it, or showing to the satisfaction of the Court that it has been lost or destroyed, or otherwise accounting for its non-production?

19. If either the accuser or the accused seeks to give evidence of the contents of a written document which is in the hands of the opposite party, can the party in whose possession it is be compelled to produce it? If so, by what means? If not, does his refusal to produce it authorize the introduction of other evidence of the contents? If so, what are the rules of practice by which the fact of refusal is established?

20. What proof is required of the execution of any written instrument? When there are attesting witnesses to the execution of the instrument, must all or any of them be produced? In case of the death of all or any of the attesting witnesses, is proof of their hand-writing required? Does the age of the instrument make any, and if so what, difference in the mode of proof? Is there any, and if so what, period after which execution of the instrument is presumed without proof?

21. Are there any, and if so what, rules peculiar to the proof of acts of Courts of Justice, or of other bodies or persons acting in the execution of any specific authority?

22. Can evidence of the character of the party accused be given for or against him? If so, at what stage of the proceedings? May such evidence be contradicted? Can evidence of particular acts of good or bad conduct be given in proof of character?

23. Can a witness refuse to answer a question put to him on the ground that the answer may subject him to criminal liability? Or that it may subject him to civil liability? Or that it may discredit him?

24. Can evidence be given of the bad or good character of a witness? If so, is such evidence confined to general reputation, or may it introduce particular facts? To what extent is such evidence, if given, allowed to be met by opposite evidence?

25. Can a witness be asked, with a view of impeaching his present evidence, what he has formerly said? If so, can evidence be given to contradict his answer?

26. Are there any general rules as to the number of witnesses necessary for the establishment of a particular fact?

27. Are witnesses paid for the expense to which the inquiry has put them? Or for their time? If so, from what fund?

ANSWERS TO THE FIRST SERIES OF QUESTIONS.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Sir J. de Veulle, Kt. 25 July, 1846.

1. In reply to the first question proposed by the Commissioners, it may be sufficient to state that I am bailiff or chief magistrate of the Island of Jersey, having had the honour to be nominated to that office by letters patent from His late Majesty, dated in February, 1831. I had previously been an advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, and afterwards one of the Jurats of the said Court; to which charge I was elected, without opposition, in the month of September, 1827.

2. The only tribunal exercising jurisdiction in criminal cases is the Royal Court. It is composed of the bailiff or judge, who receives his appointment by patent from the Crown, and twelve jurats, "jurés justiciers," or sworn justices, who are elected by the general body of rate-payers throughout the island, and hold office during their lives. The Royal Court, as at present constituted, derives its jurisdiction from a charter granted by King John, which has been confirmed by successive sovereigns; amongst others, by Henry III., Henry VII., Elizabeth and Charles II. By the fifth article of that charter, its jurisdiction extends over all crimes and offences whatsoever, except high treason and laying violent hands on the Queen's Ministers whilst in the exercise of their office, which are reserved to Her Majesty in Council.

3. Although the authorities principally relied upon in the discussion of questions arising upon the criminal law are generally English authorities, the criminal law of the island is derived from, and based upon, the ancient laws of Normandy, as cited in Rouillé, Terrien, &c.; to which may be added Orders in Council, Acts of the States, and Precedents of the Royal Court.

4. When it is ascertained or suspected that a party has committed an offence, the constable or other police officer collects all the information he can obtain, and arrests the party accused or suspected. It is his duty immediately thereupon to apprise the chief magistrate, or some other magistrate authorised by him to grant committals, of the arrest having been made, and all the circumstances of the case, together with the nature of the evidence to support the charge; and, if the magistrate see sufficient reason, he makes out a warrant or order of committal, which is taken by the police officer to the gaoler, into whose custody the accused is received. He is then said to be "mis à la garde du géolier de la prison." If the chief or other magistrate should not deem the offence of a nature to warrant the detention of the accused, he orders him to be liberated. He may also order him to be admitted to bail, to appear before the Court when called upon. In some cases the Court, on the information of the Attorney General, orders the seizure of a party accused or suspected.

5. The Court exercises a summary jurisdiction in offences of a trifling nature, such as breaches of the peace, assault and battery, infringement of prohibitory laws, keeping disorderly houses and the like; also where a party accused admits the truth of the charge made against him. In the latter case, if the offence be of minor importance, the inferior number of the Court, after described, passes sentence at once; but, if the accusation be of a grave character, the accused is ordered to be brought up again on a future day before the superior or full Court, also after described in reply to Question 7.

6. There is no preliminary proceeding beyond what has been described in answer to the 4th question. On an early day (usually the first of its sitting), the party arrested is brought before the Court, consisting of the bailiff and two jurats, on a written report of the constable or police officer who made the arrest, detailing all the facts of the case, the grounds of suspicion, &c. This report, having been previously submitted to the Attorney General for his perusal and approbation, and to enable him (if he see occasion) to prepare an act of accusation or indictment, is read by that officer to the Court in the presence of the prisoner and his counsel. If the case is dealt with summarily, or is of trifling importance, the matter is disposed of upon the report, without a formal accusation; but, if the crime be of a more grave nature, the prisoner is called upon to plead to the act of accusation or indictment, framed by the Attorney General, which is now read to the Court, and to which the prisoner puts in such plea as he may be advised by his counsel; or the Court will grant time, and remand him to consider his plea. If the plea be one of "Not Guilty," the Court makes an act permitting the Attorney General "d'informer," the effect of which is, to enable him to give evidence in support of the charge, and the prisoner to call witnesses to establish his defence. The prisoner is by the same act remanded to prison or admitted to bail, as the case may be.

7. As already stated, there is but one Court having jurisdiction in criminal cases, namely, the Royal Court. The bailiff or lieutenant bailiff, and two jurats, constitute an inferior number of the Court; and the bailiff and at least seven jurats are generally necessary to form a superior number, or Court of Appeal, from the lesser number. In cases where the Court exercises a summary jurisdiction, the matter is usually disposed of by the inferior number: and in all other prosecutions the testimony of witnesses, &c., is taken and reduced into writing by attorneys of the Court in rotation, before the inferior number. When the whole of the evidence is complete, and the case ready for trial, a jury, called the "Enditement," which is composed of the constable and twelve police officers, who have not been heard as witnesses against the accused, is convened: and in this stage of proceedings a superior Court, consisting of the bailiff and seven jurats, must be assembled to constitute a Court. The chief or other magistrate who may have ordered the accused, on the report of the police, to be placed in the custody of the gaoler, as also those jurats who have been present at the hearing of the witnesses, are capable of acting as members of the Court.

8. In all criminal cases, or such as partake of that character, without exception, the Attorney General is, ex officio, public and only prosecutor, by whom all proceedings against a party accused are instituted and conducted. The Attorney General alone, also, has the power of abandoning the proceedings; and this may be done at any stage of them, if he should think there is occasion for it; although, when the Attorney General does abandon such proceedings, he usually obtains an act of the Court for that purpose. I know of no instance, where such abandonment has taken place, of a second prosecution for the same offence.

9. When the accused is brought before the Court, upon the report of the constable or other police officer, as stated in reply to the 6th question, the charge, act of accusation or indictment, is then put into writing in a definite form by the Attorney General, who thenceforth has no power to vary the form or substance of the charge.

10. If a party admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy, the Court, after hearing his counsel and the Attorney General for the Crown, decides upon their relevancy, and gives judgment accordingly.

11. A denial of the facts is a plea of "Not Guilty;" and, in reply to the 6th question, the course of proceeding consequent upon such a plea is described.

12. If a party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, he is not thereby concluded as to the facts.

13. A party charged by a denial of the facts is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy. In fact, it may be stated, generally, that the utmost latitude is given to the accused in his defence.

14. From time immemorial an accused has been entitled to the assistance of counsel, and such other legal advice as he may need. He may have as many counsel as the limited number of the Bar will permit him; but only one can plead, the same rule applying in civil as well as criminal cases. The accused selects his own counsel; but, where there is any difficulty in his doing so, the chief magistrate selects one for him. The members of the Bar act for an accused party gratuitously; and the inability to defray the expense of counsel never, therefore, prevents his obtaining that assistance.

15. All the witnesses, both for the Crown and the prisoner, are, free of any cost to the latter, summoned by an officer, called the Viscount, at the instance of the Attorney General, to whom the accused or his counsel gives a list of such witnesses as he may wish to call. Should a witness when called not appear, or not produce any document which may be necessary for the prosecution or defence, the Court makes an act for the attachment of such witness, or orders the production of the document, as the case may be, and, in default, may order the party refusing to produce such document to be seized and brought before the Court. This may be done at any stage of the proceedings, previously to the actual trial of the accused.

16. When the written charge has been made against an accused, and he has pleaded to it, as before stated, he is remanded to prison. An early day is afterwards appointed for taking the depositions of witnesses. The evidence is always taken in the presence of the prisoner and his counsel, and reduced into writing, except where the Court acts summarily, or upon the report of the police officer, without a formal act of accusation or indictment, when the evidence is heard vivâ voce, and the case disposed of by the Court without the assistance of a jury.

17. The party accused is allowed to hear all the evidence against him. Not a single witness can be heard in his absence, or that of his counsel; and the whole of the proceedings are public.

18. The evidence for the prosecution is usually taken first; but the party accused may produce evidence at any time after the charge has been put in proof.

19. The party accused is allowed to cross-examine the witnesses produced against him, immediately after the Attorney General has examined them, to such extent as may be useful and relevant to his defence. He may also have them recalled.

20. As a rule, fresh evidence cannot be received after the trial or hearing before the enditement; though, as matter of favour and indulgence to the accused, where, from some cause, a witness could not sooner be produced, fresh evidence has been received after a verdict of the Enditement, and before the case has been submitted to the Grande Enquête to be hereinafter explained.

21. Where the proceedings take place on an act of accusation or indictment, the whole of the evidence is reduced into writing at the time the witnesses depose.

22. The evidence so taken down is read to the Enditement, or Grande Enquête, on the trial of the accused; and is used for the purpose of his conviction or acquittal. The evidence having been taken in the presence of the Court, the Attorney General and the accused and his counsel, its correctness cannot be impugned on the trial, unless the defect should appear on the face of the depositions, as in the date, name of the witness, &c., &c.

23. The counsel of the party accused may be heard on questions of law or fact, or examine witnesses, at any state of the proceedings. In this respect all reasonable latitude is permitted him.

24. The Attorney General is always heard last.

25. The Court decides the law, and the jury the facts; though, as the jury in all cases render a general verdict and never a special one, they may be said to decide both law and fact.

26. The Court awards judgment at the instance of the Attorney General.

27. The Court has the power of adjourning from day to day, either to continue the hearing of the witnesses whose depositions have been begun, or for receiving fresh evidence. When a jury has been empannelled, I know of no instance where an adjournment has taken place, the trial never having lasted over the day: but doubtless the Court has power to adjourn.

28. The ordinary course of proceeding on a trial of the party accused, up to the time of sending the case before an enditement or first jury, is set forth in answer to preceding questions. In the progress of the trial a variety of incidents may occur, such, for instance, as to the propriety of admitting a co-accused to be heard as evidence for the Crown, questions as to the regularity of the procedure, the admissibility of evidence, the competency of witnesses, &c., &c. These points are usually discussed before the inferior number of the Court, and reproduced before the superior number; and upon the fate of them may sometimes depend the question whether or not the case shall go to a jury. It is not easy to detail all the incidents that may arise in the progress of the proceeding.

29. When the evidence is complete, the case goes before the enditement, consisting, as before stated, of the constable and twelve police officers, before whom the evidence is read, and the accused by his counsel, and the Attorney General, are heard. The members of the enditement are not sworn, as they act by virtue of their charge: they may, however, be challenged for cause. A majority of seven may acquit or find guilty, either of the whole or part of the charge. The Attorney General cannot appeal in case of an acquittal: and indeed, in strictness, there is no appeal: but, if the accused be found guilty of any part of the charge, he is then said to be "endité criminellement," and may demand the benefit of the Grande Enquête, or jury of the country, consisting of twenty-four rated inhabitants, one-third of whom are taken from the parish where the offence was committed, and the remaining two-thirds from the two adjoining parishes in equal proportions. The members of the Grande Enquête are selected and summoned by the Attorney General. They are sworn: but, before being sworn, the prisoner may challenge any of the number for cause, &c., the admissibility of such challenges being decided by the Court, which must now consist of a full number, or the bailiff and seven jurats. It is necessary that twenty of the Grande Enquête should concur to find a prisoner guilty, five dissentients being sufficient to acquit or modify the verdict.

30. If judgment be finally given against the party accused, the viscount, an officer of the Crown, is authorised or directed to carry, or to see carried, into execution the sentence which may be passed upon the prisoner. In capital cases it is the practice to give sufficient time for the party condemned to appeal to the mercy of the Crown.

31. Having been informed by the greffier of the Royal Court that he has already supplied these forms, I do not think it necessary to trouble the learned Commissioners with them again.

32. The bailiff, attorney or procurator general, the viscount, and advocate or solicitor general, hold their offices by patent from the Crown. The jurats are elected by the rate-payers throughout the island for life. All these officers are amenable to Her Majesty in Council. The constables and centeniers are elected by the rate-payers of each parish for three years.

The police officers are chosen by the members of parish assemblies for four or seven years, according to the parish. The last named functionaries may be removed for misbehaviour, &c., by the Court, on an information by the Attorney General.

33. The learned Commissioners having addressed to me a series of questions, and as in all probability others will follow, it may be more convenient to reply to this general inquiry at some future time.

34. The defects in the present system are twofold. One is the want of a true and certain guide as to what is really the criminal law of the island, or for its application; the other relates to the mode of procedure. The remedy for the first will probably be the adoption of a code of criminal jurisprudence wherein offences shall be defined, and the nature and extent of the punishment to be inflicted pointed out. With regard to defects of procedure, those consist, first, in the want of some formal examination of witnesses upon oath, before a magistrate, prior to the committal of an accused party. For, although the bailiff or magistrate use as much circumspection as is possible, so that a party may not improperly be committed, still no evidence on oath is taken to warrant any such committal. Another defect is the mode of taking the evidence, and in which the witnesses are heard. Frequently several witnesses are examined before the Court at the same time: and, although their depositions are reduced into writing, many inconveniences must and do arise from this system. It has been suggested, that the witnesses should be heard vivâ voce in the presence of the jury: but I doubt whether it would be expedient to make any alteration in this respect, beyond adopting a more certain and expeditious method of proceeding in taking down the evidence. It must not be forgotten that two languages are in use in Jersey, and that one of them is only imperfectly known; and having the testimony in writing greatly facilitates the understanding of it. Besides, it is convenient, because it is important that the same evidence should be produced before the enditement and Grande Enquête; and, moreover, that, in the event of an application to the Privy Council by a prisoner, the whole case may be properly laid before the Crown. I think the present system of inquiry before the enditement anomalous, as it appears to me improper that any part of the police who have, or ought to have, been instrumental in discovering the accused should sit as jurymen on his trial. Another objection to the system is, that the members of the enditement are always known beforehand; also, that they are not sworn. I think, at any rate, this jury ought to be indifferently chosen.

Answers of Edward Leonard Bisson, Esq., one of the Jurats, and Lieutenant Bailiff of the Royal Court, in the Island of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. That he has been 14 years one of the Jurats of the Royal Court of Jersey, having been elected, without opposition, in the month of May, 1832; and is also Lieutenant Bailiff, to which office he was appointed in September, 1839, and in which capacity he has frequently presided the Court and States in the absence of the Bailiff.

2. There is but one Court, called the Royal Court, which has jurisdiction in all cases, civil and criminal. Its jurisdiction, in its present form, derives its origin from the constitutions of King John, consisting of 18 articles, by which 12 jurats are to be chosen for life, to sit with the bailiff to try all offences—high treason, and laying violent hands on the bailiff and jurats when in the execution of their judicial duties, excepted.

3. The custom of Normandy, Orders in Council, Acts of the States, and precedents of the Court; though for modern distinctions and decisions English authorities are usually cited.

4. On information being given to the constable, centenier or other police officer, of a crime having been committed, he makes inquiries into the facts of the case, and arrests the accused. The constable then lays the matter before the bailiff, or one of the other magistrates named by him to receive such information, who, after hearing the case, grants a committal to authorize the gaoler to receive the prisoner into his charge. Should the magistrate think the accused ought not to be detained, he liberates, or directs the police officer to take bail for the appearance of the accused before the Court.

5. The inferior Court, consisting of the bailiff or his lieutenant, and two jurats, exercises a summary jurisdiction in cases of minor importance; and, when the offender freely and voluntarily confesses his guilt, the Court proceeds at once to give sentence. If, however, the case is a serious one, the accused is remanded and brought up on a future day before the full Court, consisting of the bailiff and seven jurats, to receive sentence.

6. The proceeding to arrest an accused has already been described.

On an early day after his arrest the party accused is brought before the Court. The accused having selected an advocate, the Attorney General reads the report and the act of accusation or indictment which he has prepared upon such report, and the accused is required to plead. If his counsel put in a plea of Not Guilty, the Court makes an act permitting the Attorney General "d'informer:" and witnesses are afterwards called by him to prove the charge, and by the accused to establish his defence. By the same act the accused is sent back to prison or admitted to bail.

7. The evidence is taken down in writing by attorneys of the Court, and signed by the witnesses, in presence of the bailiff and two jurats. As soon as all the evidence is complete, the constable, and 12 of his parish officers, who together form a jury, are called at the instance of the Attorney General: and in their presence and that of a full Court, consisting of the bailiff and seven jurats, the whole of the evidence is read, and the advocate of the accused and the Attorney General are heard. If a majority of the jury declare the accused innocent he is discharged: but, if they find him guilty of the whole or any part of the charge, and he submits, the Court proceeds to pass sentence. He may, however, demand the benefit of the Grande Enquête, composed of 24 men, called by the Attorney General. Twenty out of the number must concur to find the prisoner guilty.

8. By the Attorney General, ex officio, who may abandon the prosecution when he thinks fit. I am not aware of an instance of a second prosecution for the same offence.

9. When the offender is presented, upon the report of the police, the act of accusation is put into a definite form, and cannot afterwards be altered in form or substance. The prisoner can at all times remodel his plea.

10. The Court decides upon the relevancy of the facts.

11. The facts must be established by the Attorney General if they are denied.

12. The accused is not concluded as to the facts by a denial of their relevancy.

13. Nor by a denial of the facts as to their relevancy. Every latitude is given to the accused.

14. The accused may select his own advocate, and may have one or more, at his option, though only one can plead.

The members of the bar act gratuitously.

15. All witnesses, as well for the Crown as for the accused, are summoned by the viscount, free of expense as regards the accused. Should the witness not appear, or not produce a necessary document, the Court has power to compel by attachment.

16. Evidence is taken on an early day, named by the bailiff, after the accused has put in his plea, in the presence of the Attorney General, and the prisoner and his advocate.

17. No evidence is taken in the absence of the accused and his advocate. All the proceedings are public.

18. After the accused has pleaded the Attorney General calls his witnesses. The accused may also bring forward his witnesses; but he seldom calls them until the case for the prosecution is closed.

19. The accused party may cross-examine the witnesses produced against him, after the Attorney General has examined them to such extent as may be useful to his defence.

20. As a matter of favour to the accused, fresh evidence has been in some cases received after the hearing, before the enditement or first jury: but these cases are exceptions to the rule.

21. The whole of the evidence is reduced into writing.

22. The evidence is read at the trial, to establish the guilt or innocence of the accused. Its correctness cannot be questioned unless some defect appear on the face of it.

23. All reasonable latitude is given to the advocate of the accused, in being heard on questions of law and fact, and in examining witnesses.

24. The Attorney General is heard last.

25. The Court decides the law, and the jury the fact.

26. By the Court, at the instance of the Attorney General.

27. The Court has power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings at all stages of them.

28.

29. The Attorney General cannot appeal; but, if the accused is found guilty by the enditement, he may claim the benefit of the Grande Enquête already described.

30. The Viscount carries the sentence of the Court into execution.

31. I have ascertained that these forms have been supplied to the Commissioners.

32. The Bailiff, the Attorney General, the Viscount, and the Advocate or Solicitor General, are nominated by patent from the Crown: the jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers of the island. These functionaries are amenable to Her Majesty in Council. The constables and centeniers are elected for three years by the rate-payers of their respective parishes: the police officers for four or seven years by the members of parish assemblies. These officers are all removable by the Royal Court, on the information of the Attorney General.

33. I propose replying to this query hereafter.

34. Several measures relating to the criminal law being under consideration of the States, I beg to reserve my opinion until they have been disposed of.

Answers of Philip Le Maistre, Esq., Jurat of the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

Philip Le Maistre, Esq.

1. By having since the year 1804 discharged the several municipal offices of the parish wherein I reside, comprising that of constable or mayor, which entitled me to a seat in the States, or Legislative Assembly of the island; and, finally, from a strict and assiduous attendance to the duties of the office of jurat of the Royal Court, to which I have been elected by the voice of my fellow citizens, and which I have now held fourteen years.

2. The Royal Court, which is the only tribunal of the island. Its jurisdiction was instituted by Royal Charter, granted by King John; the Royal Court has jurisdiction over, and takes cognizance of, every offence or crime originating in this bailiwick, save that of high treason.

3. The ancient law of Normandy, as contained in the Grand Coutumier, and the Commentaries of Terrien and Rouillé. The Commentaries of Lieutenant Bailli Le Geyt are also appealed to, as well as other authors both French and English.

4. The accused party is taken into custody by the police, and lodged in gaol with the sanction of the bailli or one of the jurats of the Royal Court. A report is afterwards drawn up by the officer who has effected the arrest of the offender, and presented by the chief constable, together with the party accused, before the Court.

5. If the offender is charged with a minor offence, such as a breach of the peace, or disorderly conduct, and his guilt is clearly established, the case is summarily disposed of; the punishment being in every case adapted to the nature of the offence, such as a fine or imprisonment for a short term, &c.

6. The Attorney General then becomes the public prosecutor, and prefers an indictment against the prisoner, founded on the report of the constable; after which the accused, if he pleads "Not guilty," is remanded to prison until a future day, when the Attorney General calls him up again, to hear evidence in support of the prosecution: after this is gone through, the accused party has the privilege of calling as many witnesses as he pleases, to establish his innocence, or to depose to his former good conduct; then he is sent back to prison until the Crown officer deems it expedient to put him upon his trial before the petty jury or Enditement.

7. Before the Royal Court, composed of the bailli and twelve jurats. Those members of the Court who have sent the prisoner to trial are deemed competent of acting as members of such Courts.

8. By the Attorney General, who has the power of abandoning the proceedings at every stage of the case, provided the evidence does not warrant any further proceedings in the matter. The prisoner is then liberated by and with the consent of the Court. Such an abandonment can have no effect upon any further accusations.

9. The charge is contained in the act of indictment (acte d'accusation), which cannot be varied after it has once been officially recorded; but the prisoner may alter his plea at any stage of the proceedings, and as often as he may think it necessary for his defence.

10. The form is precisely the same: the Court decides both questions, that is, the facts and their relevancy.

11. The case is sent to proof.

12. If the party charged confines himself to the simple denial of the relevancy of the charge, he is supposed to admit the facts: he is therefore concluded as to the facts.

13. When the party charged confines himself to the denial of the facts, he does not thereby admit their relevancy: but the Court frequently, though not always, concludes him as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged has an undoubted right to the assistance of counsel. He selects him himself; and the party so selected pleads gratuitously.

JERSEY.

SERIES I.

Philip Le Maistre, Esq.

15. All witnesses, for and against the prosecution, are summoned by the "Vicomte": they are compelled to attend to give evidence, both oral and documentary, at any stage of the proceedings.

16. After the party charged has put in his plea, the witnesses are summoned to attend on a future day. Their evidence is taken down in writing, in presence of the Court, by the scriveners ("écrivains,") duly appointed to do that duty. The Attorney General is always present, or in his absence the Solicitor General, in order to watch the proceedings, and to see that everything connected with the trial be conducted in a proper manner.

17. At all times, he being always present when the case is heard.

18. When the evidence of the prosecution is at an end.

19. At all times, to any extent, and at every stage of the proceedings.

20. Witnesses may be heard for or against the prosecution, up to the moment previous to his being put upon his trial before the petty jury or "enditement."

21. The whole of the evidence is taken down in writing.

22. After the witnesses have deposed, they are requested to sign their respective depositions, which are afterwards "lodged au greffe" until the trial comes on, when they are read by the Crown officers to the members composing the jury. No proof can be adduced against their correctness, the witnesses having deposed upon oath and attested their veracity by their signature. If, however, such a question was ever mooted, the Court, I have no doubt, would give its most serious consideration.

23. The greatest latitude is afforded to counsel as to being heard on questions of fact, or law and examining witnesses.

24. The party accusing is invariably heard last.

25. The facts are decided by the jury; the law is expounded by the Attorney General, and afterwards decided by the Court.

26. Judgment is awarded by the Royal Court.

27. The Court has the power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings at every stage of the case, for want of time to proceed further, or in order to summon other witnesses, or through other similar causes, save and except when the trial is being heard by the jury.

28. The incidents to accusation and trial have, I think, been anticipated by the foregoing answers.

29. The accusing party has no power of appeal in criminal proceedings. The accused party alone has a right of appeal from the petty to the grand jury ("Grande Enquête"), whose verdict is final. Still, in every case where capital punishment is awarded, the culprit obtains a certain delay (about three weeks) for the purpose of imploring the Royal clemency, in mitigation of the sentence passed upon him.

30. The "Vicomte" or sheriff is bound, ex officio, to see that the sentence of the Court be carried into execution.

31. Here I would humbly suggest to Her Majesty's Commissioners the propriety of their applying for the forms used at the various steps of the proceedings, as well as for the oaths administered to the parties concerned, to the "greffier" or clerk of the court, in whose custody they are kept.

32. The Bailli, the Attorney General, the Vicomte, and the Solicitor General receive their appointment from the Crown, and hold office only during Her Majesty's good pleasure. The jurats are elected for life by such of the inhabitants as are duly qualified to vote in public elections. The "greffier" and the advocates are nominated by the bailli, and hold their office for life. The policemen composing the petty jury are chosen by the parish assembly ("Assemblée des principaux et officiers de la paroisse"): their term of office is limited, in town to three and four years, and in the country parishes from four to seven years. They are removable before the expiration of the term of their office for malversation only.

It may be well to observe that the petty jury is taken from the parish wherein the crime is alleged to have been committed.

33. I am not aware that it is in my power to give any further information respecting the mode of proceeding in criminal cases in this island, which, it must be admitted, is rather intricate, owing to the want of statute or written law adapted to the present age, to guide the several public functionaries in the discharge of these respective duties: but, should the Royal Commissioners deem it expedient to point out any deficiency in the foregoing answers, I will most cheerfully endeavour to supply it to the best of my knowledge and abilities.

34. As a member of the States or Legislative assembly, I have always yielded my warmest support to every law (projet de loi) which had a tendency to improve the actual laws of the island, both civil and criminal, but especially to an extensive and elaborate projet prepared by Her Majesty's Solicitor General, and presented before the States some few years ago: but I regret to state that it has not yet received the sanction of that body, as I believe it would, with a few modifications, very materially tend to simplify the mode of proceeding in criminal cases, affording at the same time every desirable guarantee, both to the accusing and accused parties before the Court. In my opinion the Solicitor General's "projet de loi sur la procédure criminelle" embraces, in a great measure, the improvements which have so long been the great desideratum of all persons anxious to witness a reform in the mode pursued with respect to criminal proceedings in the Island of Jersey.

SERIES I.

Philip de St. Croix, Esq.
8 August, 1846.

Answers of Philip de St. Croix, Esq., Jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. Those afforded by sitting on various trials, first as member of the "Grande Enquête," and subsequently as Jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey, to which office I was elected in the year 1833.

2. The Royal Court is the only tribunal exercising criminal jurisdiction in Jersey. The jurisdiction of this court originated in the Charter of King John, confirmed by several successive Sovereigns down to Charles the Second. It extends over all crimes and offences, excepting high treason and laying violent hands on the bailiff or jurats, which are specially reserved to Her Majesty in Council.

3. The authorities principally relied upon in the discussion of questions arising upon the criminal law are English authorities: but our criminal law is derived from the ancient law of Normandy.

4. When it is suspected that a party has committed an offence, it becomes the duty of the constable or other police officer, to whom information thereof is given, to inquire into the matter, and, if he think it necessary, to apprehend the party suspected: he then states the particulars of the case to the bailiff, or to a magistrate authorized by the bailiff, who, if he see sufficient grounds, grants a warrant for the prisoner to be given into the custody of the gaoler. The bailiff or magistrate orders the accused party to be liberated, if the proof should appear to be insufficient; or he may direct the police to take bail for the appearance of the prisoner before the Court.

5. The Court exercises a summary jurisdiction in the following cases: breach of the peace, assault and battery, keeping disorderly houses, and other minor offences, and also where the accused party owns himself guilty of the offence with which he is charged.

6. There are no further preliminary proceedings than those stated in the answer to the 4th question. The accused party is brought before the Court on an early day after his arrest, the written report of the police is read to the Court, by the Attorney General, in the presence of the accused party, who is then informed by the presiding magistrate that he may choose a counsel, if he have not already done so; the act of accusation is then read by the Attorney General, who calls on the prisoner to plead thereto: if he plead "Not guilty," the Court remands him to another day, or admits him to bail, according to the nature of the offence, leave being given to the Attorney General, and to the prisoner, to call witnesses.

7. Where the jurisdiction is not of a summary kind, he is tried by a jury in the presence of the Royal Court, composed of the bailiff and not less than seven jurats. The functionaries who have sent the party to trial are capable of acting as members of such Court.

8. The proceedings against the accused party are instituted by the Attorney General, who has the power, at every stage of the proceedings, of causing them to be abandoned. Such an abandonment has the effect of protecting the accused party from any further criminal proceedings for the same offence. I am not aware of any instance to the contrary.

9. The charge against the party accused is put into a written definite form at the commencement of the proceedings. The Attorney General, who is, ex officio, the accuser, cannot afterwards vary the form or substance of the charge. The party accused has the power of remodelling or otherwise improving his defence until the "enditement," or first jury, is empannelled.

10. If the party charged admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, the Royal Court hears the counsel for the accused, and the Attorney General in reply, and afterwards decides upon their relevancy.

11. When the party charged simply denies the facts alleged against him, the Court allows the Attorney General to call witnesses in support of the charge.

12. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, he is not thereby concluded as to the facts.

13. He is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of counsel: he may have as many as he pleases; but only one is allowed to plead for him: counsel is chosen by the party accused, or, if he declines to select any, then by the chief magistrate. Where the party accused is unable to defray the expenses, a member of the bar is obliged to undertake his defence gratuitously.

15. The prosecutor and the accused party are entitled by law to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the production of documentary evidence at any stage of the proceedings, previously to the "enditement," or first jury, being empannelled.

16. Evidence is first received on an early day after the committal of the prisoner; it is taken down in writing by attorneys of the Court in the presence of the bailiff and two jurats, and in that of the Attorney General, of the accused party, and his counsel.

17. The accused party is allowed to hear all the evidence produced against him: no evidence can be taken in his absence.

18. At any stage of the proceedings after the case is sent to proof, the accused party may produce evidence in his behalf; but this is seldom done until after the evidence for the prosecution has been taken.

19. The party accused is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him, after the Attorney General has examined them, and to the utmost extent useful to his defence.

20. The Court has, in some instances, allowed fresh evidence for the party accused to be produced at the very last stage of the proceedings, previously to the "Grande Enquête," or second jury, being empannelled.

21. The whole of the evidence is taken down in writing, in the mode stated in the answer to question No. 16.

JERSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Philip de St. Croix, Esq.
8 August, 1846.

22. It is read to the Court, and to the jury, by the Attorney General. The evidence having been taken down in writing, and signed by the respective witnesses, in the presence of the Court, the prosecutor, the accused party and his counsel, its correctness cannot afterwards be questioned.

23. The counsel for the prisoner has a right to be heard on questions of fact or law: all reasonable latitude is allowed in examining witnesses.

24. The Attorney General, who is the accusing party, is heard last.

25. The Court decides the law, the jury the fact.

26. Judgment is awarded by the Court.

27. The Court has the power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings, at any time until the evidence on both sides is closed, for the purpose of allowing fresh evidence to be produced, or of finishing that which is commenced. The Court never suspends or adjourns its sittings when once the jury is empannelled, except for a short space of time, seldom so much as an hour, and that only during very long trials.

28. With regard to the incidents to accusation and trial, I have not anything to add to the preceding answers.

29. The accusing party has no power of appeal if the accused party is acquitted by the "enditement," or first jury, composed of thirteen members of the police, a majority of whom can acquit or condemn: but, if found Guilty by that jury, the accused party has the right of appeal to the "Grande Enquête," composed of twenty-four respectable men from three parishes of the island, eight from each parish, twenty of whom must agree to a verdict of "Guilty," as five are a sufficient number to return a verdict of "Not guilty:" the members of the "Grande Enquête" are convened by the Attorney General, and may be challenged by the accused party for causes the propriety of which is decided by the Court.

30. If judgment be finally against the accused party, it becomes the duty of the Viscount to carry it into execution: but of late, when sentence of death has been passed, a sufficient delay has been granted by the Court to enable the convict to implore the Royal clemency.

31. The forms used in the proceedings are explained in the preceding answers: for the oaths taken by the members of the Court and the witnesses, respectively, I beg leave to refer to the code of laws for the island of Jersey, confirmed by His Majesty in Council on the 28th day of March, 1771.

32. The Bailiff, the Attorney General, the Viscount and the Solicitor General are appointed by the Crown. The jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers of the whole island. The above mentioned functionaries are amenable to the Sovereign in Council. The constables and centeniers are elected for three years, by the rate-payers of their respective parishes, and are removable by the Court on the prosecution of the Attorney General.

33, 34. The States of this island having appointed a committee to revise the criminal law, I am not at present prepared to suggest any improvement thereto.

No. 5.

Philip W. Nicolle, Esq.
12 August, 1846.

Answers of Philip W. Nicolle, Esq., Jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. As jurat of the Royal Court since 1837.

2. The Royal Court, composed of the bailli, or chief magistrate, and twelve jurats. Its jurisdiction extends to all crimes and offences, high treason and laying violent hands on the Queen's representatives or ministers in the island excepted, which are specially reserved to Her Majesty in Council. It derives its origin from the charter of King John, confirmed by several successive sovereigns.

3. The criminal law is based on the ancient Norman law: but, as that of England has become less sanguinary, it is now chiefly followed; and the English authorities, Blackstone and others, are now followed, being cited and used by the prosecution for the Crown.

4. On a complaint being made to the constable, or other police officers, or if they have occasion to suspect a crime has been committed, they investigate the case, and, if there appear sufficient grounds to warrant it, they arrest the party, and report the case to the chief magistrate, who issues, if there is sufficient ground to warrant it, an order for his provisional detention, to enable the officers to deduce the facts to writing; when they are submitted to the Attorney General for his consideration. The chief magistrate may order his immediate release, if he does not see sufficient grounds to detain the accused; and he may, if the charge is not of a serious nature, authorise that he be admitted to bail.

5. The Court does not exercise summary jurisdiction, as a magistrate in England, though prisoners are tried before the bailli and two magistrates for minor offences: but the Crown prosecutor directs the proceedings; and prisoner is always heard by counsel in these cases.

6. There are no preliminary instructions beyond what I have before mentioned in the 4th answer. Prisoner is brought up before the Court on an early day; the report of the police officer having been considered by the Attorney General, he reads it to the Court, in presence of the prisoner. The bailli then asks prisoner if he have engaged counsel, and, if not, recommends him to select one from the gentlemen composing the bar, called "Avocats." After he has done so, the Attorney General reads the indictment or act of accusation, to which prisoner pleads Guilty or Not guilty; when the Court makes an act accordingly. If the latter, he is sent to prison, and the Crown and prisoner are allowed to call witnesses for the prosecution and defence. Prisoner's counsel may move that he be admitted to bail; which, if the offence is not of a serious nature, the Court allows.

7. Prisoners are tried by a jury of 13: the majority acquits or condemns: they may, if found Guilty, appeal to a second jury, composed of 24 members, five of which are sufficient to acquit them. Evidence is heard before the bailli and two jurats, and written down in presence of the prisoner and his counsel. When the whole evidence for and against the prisoner is concluded, the first jury is called, and the evidence is then read. The prisoner is heard in his defence, and the Attorney General for the prosecution: seven jurats are required to be present. The chief magistrate, who gives the orders for the detention of the prisoner, cannot be said to have sent him to trial, as this is done on his appearing before the Court by the Attorney General, who is the public prosecutor for all crimes. The jurats composing the Court, before whom prisoner is first brought up, may sit during the subsequent stages of the trial.

8. By the Attorney General, who may drop proceedings, at any stage, if the evidence cannot substantiate the charge. It is generally done by an act of the Court. I know of no case in which a person so discharged has again been tried; and I do not consider that it could be done, such being tantamount to an acquittal.

9. On the prisoner being first brought before the Court after the report of the police has been read, and he has selected an advocate, the Attorney General presents the indictment or charge in writing: it cannot afterwards be altered or modified. The accused may amend his plea during any stage of the proceedings, to the time when the first jury is empannelled.

10. If the prisoner admits the facts but denies their relevancy to support the charge, he is heard by counsel, and the Attorney General in reply: and the Court decides as to their relevancy.

11. The Attorney General is empowered by the Court to call witnesses in support of the charge, and prisoner those required for his defence.

12. He is not.

13. No.

14. From the earliest times a prisoner in this island has always had the benefit of being heard by counsel to examine witnesses and plead in his behalf; he is not restricted as to the number; one only can however be heard. Prisoners select their own counsel; but, if they will not, the bailli assigns them one. If unable to pay for counsel, one of the members of the bar assists them gratuitously.

15. Both parties can summon witnesses: if they fail to attend, they are fined, and ordered to be taken in custody by the vicomte or sheriff to ensure their appearance: and any documentary evidence may be produced during any stage of the proceedings, up to the period of the enditement or first jury retiring.

16. On a day fixed by the bailli, after being informed by the Attorney General that he is prepared to proceed in the case, the Court, composed of the president and two jurats, sit for the purpose of hearing evidence, which is committed to writing by the attorneys, summoned to attend for the purpose. The public prosecutor and prisoner are always present.

17. At all stages of the proceedings prisoner must be present; no evidence can be taken in his absence.

18. A prisoner may hear evidence at any time after he has been first brought up: but he generally reserves his witnesses until those for the prosecution have been heard.

19. After a witness for the prosecution has been examined by the public prosecutor, prisoner's counsel may cross-question him to the extent which may be useful and relevant to his defence.

20. No fresh evidence can be produced by the Crown after the enditement, or first jury, is empannelled. The Court has in some few cases allowed prisoner to bring forward evidence to the very last stage of trial, that is to say before the second jury.

21. The whole.

22. It is read to the jury or juries; and, having been taken in presence of the accuser and the accused, and signed by the witnesses, its correctness cannot be impugned by either party.

23. Counsel for prisoners are allowed every possible latitude in arguing questions, both of fact and law, as well as in examining witnesses.

24. Prisoner, after the charges have been read, and the evidence has been gone through, is heard in his defence; and the Attorney General afterwards supports the charge, and is by law entitled to be heard last.

25. The Court, composed of the bailli and at least seven jurats, decide the law, and the juries the fact.

26. By the Court being called upon by the Attorney General, who gives his opinion as to the punishment to be awarded.

27. The Court has authority to adjourn from one day to another, until the evidence is completed. There is no instance in which it has adjourned, except for a very short period, after once the jury is empannelled.

28. This answer is given in the foregoing one; and I have nothing to add.

29. If a prisoner is acquitted by the first jury, the public prosecutor cannot appeal: but, if found Guilty, prisoner has right of appeal to the second jury. The enditement, or first jury, is composed of thirteen members of the police of the parish in which the offence is committed, presided by the constable or one of the centeniers: their verdict is returned by the majority. The second jury is selected by the Crown, and is composed of twenty-four members of three different parishes: five are sufficient to acquit; prisoner may challenge jurymen for cause, the Court deciding thereon. Questions of law and evidence, which have been decided by two jurats whilst taking evidence, may be argued before the full Court, on the day when the first jury is convened.

30. The vicomte or sheriff is charged with the execution of the sentence of the Court. When transportation is pronounced, the sanction of Her Majesty must be obtained: and, where sentence of death is passed, a delay is granted, to enable the convict to implore the pardon of the Sovereign, or a commutation of punishment.

31. The first part has already been answered before. Witnesses are sworn to declare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as they will answer to Almighty God, &c. The police composing the first jury sit by virtue of the oath taken by them on being admitted to office. The second jury are sworn by the bailli after prisoner has declared he has no cause of challenge. Forms of the oaths and proceedings can be had from the clerk of the court.

32. The Bailli, Attorney General, Vicomte and Solicitor General are appointed by the Crown. The jurats are elected by the rate-payers of the twelve parishes of the island. The constable and centeniers by the electors of their respective parishes for 3 years, the other police officers by the vestry for terms, varying from 4 to 7 years according to the law. These may be removed after trial by the Court. The other functionaries are answerable to Her Majesty in Council.

No. 6.

Answers of Charles Bertram, Esq., one of the Jurats of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

Charles Bertram, Esq.
1 August, 1846.

1. I have been centenier and constable of the Parish of Grouville, and am now one of the Jurats of the Royal Court.

2. The Royal Court is the only court having jurisdiction in criminal cases. Its jurisdiction is derived from the constitutions of King John, confirmed by several successive sovereigns, and extends over all crimes and misdemeanors except high treason and laying violent hands on the Queen's ministers whilst in exercise of their office.

3. The criminal law of Jersey is founded on the ancient custom of Normandy: but English authorities are cited in support of modern distinctions. Also Orders in Council, Acts of the States, and precedents of the Royal Court.

4. When information is given to the constable, centenier or other police officer, that a crime has been committed, he immediately inquires into all the circumstances, and arrests the party accused.

He afterwards lays the matter before the bailiff, or some other magistrate named by him to hear those informations; who, after investigating the case, grants a committal authorising the gaoler to receive the prisoner into his custody. If the magistrate should not think the case to warrant his detention, he orders the party accused to be liberated, or directs the police officer to take bail for the appearance of the accused before the Court.

5. The Court exercises a summary jurisdiction in all minor offences, and also where an accused submits.

6. There is no preliminary investigation other than has already been stated. At the first sitting of the Court, a party accused is usually brought up before that tribunal, when he is presented upon a written report of the police by the Attorney General. The accused having chosen an advocate, the Attorney General first reads the Report, and then an Act of Accusation or indictment, which he has prepared beforehand, and the prisoner is called upon to plead. If the plea his advocate puts in for him be one of "Not guilty," the Court makes an act which enables the Attorney General and the accused to call witnesses, the one to prove the truth of the accusation, the other his defence. The accused is by the same act remanded to prison, or admitted to bail.

7. Before the Royal Court composed of the Bailiff and two Jurats.

8. By the Attorney General, who is public prosecutor in all cases, and who only has power to abandon the prosecution, which he may do at any stage of the proceedings if he is not satisfied with the proofs, &c.

I do'nt know of any instance where, having abandoned a prosecution, another has been instituted against the same party for the same offence. When the Attorney General abandons a prosecution, he generally obtains an act of the Court for the purpose.

9. When the accused is first brought before the Court on the report of the police, the accusation charge is put into a written definite form by the Attorney General, who cannot afterwards alter or vary the form or substance of it. The party accused may at any time remodel or improve his defence.

10. If a party accused admit the facts but denies their relevancy, the Royal Court, after hearing the Attorney General and the advocate for the accused, decides on their relevancy.

11. The Attorney General is put to the proof of the facts.

12. He is not concluded thereby.

13. Nor by a denial of the facts is he concluded as to their relevancy.

14. In Jersey an accused has at all times been allowed counsel to advise and plead for him. He may have more than one if he pleases; but only one can plead. If the accused does not select an advocate, one is chosen for him by the chief magistrate. The members of the Bar always act gratuitously in criminal cases.

Charles Bertram, Esq.
1 August, 1846.

15. Witnesses both for the Crown and the accused are summoned by the Viscount: and, if they should not attend, the Court can order them to be seized, and has also power to compel the production of documentary evidence at any stage of the proceedings.

16. After the accused has put in his plea, a day is named to hear witnesses. The evidence is taken in writing in the presence of the Court consisting of the Bailiff and two Jurats, and in the presence of the Attorney General, the accused and his advocate.

17. The party accused hears all the evidence produced against him. No witnesses can be heard in his absence, or that of his advocate.

18. He can call evidence at any stage of the proceedings, after the matter has been sent to proof: but an accused seldom brings forward his witnesses until the evidence for the prosecution is closed.

19. After the Attorney General has finished examining his witnesses, the accused or his advocate may cross-examine them to the fullest extent.

20. Except as a matter of indulgence, fresh evidence is not allowed to be called after the case has come before the "Enditement" or first jury.

21. The whole of the evidence is reduced into writing.

22. It is afterwards read to the jury on the trial of the accused, for the purpose of his conviction or acquittal. As the evidence is always taken in open court, by attorneys of it, in presence of the Attorney General, the prisoner and his advocate, no question can afterwards be raised as to its being correct, unless the defect appear on the face of it.

23. The advocate of the party charged has the greatest latitude allowed him in being heard on questions of law and fact, and in examining witnesses.

24. The Attorney General is heard last.

25. The Court is to decide the law, and the jury the facts.

26. Judgment is awarded by the Court at the instance of the Attorney General.

27. The Court may adjourn or suspend its proceedings from one day to another, at all stages of them, for any reasonable cause.

28. Many incidents may arise in the course of the proceedings, such as turn on the regularity of procedure, &c., &c.

29. There is, strictly speaking, no appeal in criminal cases. When all the evidence is taken, a jury called the "Enditement," consisting of the constable and twelve police officers of the parish where the offence was committed, is assembled, before which the evidence is read and the counsel for the accused and Attorney General are heard. Seven of this jury must concur in a verdict to acquit the accused or to find him guilty of the whole or any part of the charge. The Crown has no appeal; but, if the prisoner is found Guilty, he may demand the benefit of the Grande Enquête, a second jury, composed of 24 gentlemen, eight selected from the parish where the offence was committed, and eight from each of the two adjoining parishes. The Enditement is not sworn; but the Grande Enquête is: and both are liable to be challenged. Of the Grande Enquête, 21 must agree in the verdict to pronounce a prisoner guilty. On both trials there must be a full Court, consisting of the bailiff and seven jurats, before whom all questions of law, &c., may be discussed.

30. If judgment be given against the accused, it is the duty of the Viscount or Sheriff to see to its execution.

31. It is understood that these forms have already been supplied by the greffier of the court.

32. The Bailiff, Attorney General, Viscount and Advocate General are appointed by patent from the Crown. The jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers throughout the Island. The constables and centeniers are chosen by their several parishes for three years, and the police officers for four or seven years, according to the parish. The Bailiff, Attorney General, Viscount, Advocate General and Jurats are amenable to Her Majesty in Council, the other functionaries to the Royal Court.

33. Other information will be given in reply to the second series of questions.

34. As there is a bill before the States relative to the criminal law, I beg to reserve my opinion until after that measure has been considered.

Jersey, 1st August, 1846. C. BERTRAM.

Answers of John Le Couteur, Esq., one of the Jurats of the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

John Le Couteur, Esq.

1. I was elected to the office of Jurat of the Royal Court in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty, after having filled several public offices.

2. The Royal Court.—Its jurisdiction is derived from a charter of King John, confirmed by other sovereigns, and extends over all crimes and offences, high treason and the laying of violent hands on the Queen's officers excepted.

3. Precedents, and some laws passed by the states of the island that have received the Royal Assent.

4. Generally by the arrest of the person by the constable or one of the centeniers of the parish, when they have collected sufficient information as to the guilt of the suspected party: the chief magistrate, or other magistrate appointed by him, may grant a committal or order the party to be liberated or admitted to bail. On an early day, the constable of the parish presents the party arrested, together with a report stating the principal facts that have come to his cognizance. In other cases, when the nature of the offence or the information obtained is not such as to warrant the arrest of the person, a report is presented to the Court through the Attorney General; and the Court may then order the party to be apprehended or merely summoned to appear. When a fine only has been incurred, the information is laid before the Attorney General, who summons the party to appear, or obtains a writ from the chief magistrate to the same effect.

5. For petty offences the Court exercises summary jurisdiction: in such cases, if the suspected party denies the facts laid to his charge in the report of the constable or centenier, the Court orders witnesses to be called on a future day, and, after hearing vivâ voce evidence, if the charge is proved, passes sentence.

6. The Attorney General presents a written accusation or indictment, grounded on the report of the constable or centenier, against the suspected party before the inferior number of the Court, composed of the bailiff and two jurats: if the prisoner pleads Not guilty, the Attorney General is allowed to call witnesses on a future day, when their evidence is taken down in writing. Witnesses for the defence may also be called: in the mean time the prisoner is either admitted to bail or sent to prison.

7. The evidence is taken down in writing before the inferior number of the Court, composed of the bailiff and two jurats, unless a witness is on the eve of leaving the island or is unable through sickness to attend the Court, when the evidence is taken before the viscount. When the evidence for the prosecution and the defence is complete, the bailiff summons a full Court, composed of seven jurats at least, and a jury is empannelled before whom the whole evidence is read and trial takes place.

8. By the Attorney General, who may abandon the proceedings, when it appears that the evidence will not support the charge: this is generally done with the sanction of the Court, when an act to that effect is then recorded. It is tantamount to an acquittal.

9. When the case is to go before a jury, the accusation or indictment prepared by the Attorney General is read to the prisoner, when he is first presented in Court. The accusation cannot afterwards be varied.

10. The question is argued before the Court.

11. The Court orders evidence to be heard on a future day; if no accusation or indictment is presented by the Attorney General, the evidence is heard on the report of the constable or centenier vivâ voce: but when there is an accusation, as the case must go before a jury, the evidence is taken down in writing.

12. He is not concluded.

13. He is not concluded thereby.

14. Yes, of a counsel to examine the witnesses, plead and assist him during the whole proceedings. He is chosen by the prisoner, and, if he does not select one, by the Court. The advocates are bound to assist a prisoner without means gratuitously. The prisoner is at no expense for summoning witnesses, or taking down their evidence in writing.

15. The accusing and accused party are entitled by law to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the production of documentary evidence necessary for the prosecution or the defence.

16. On an early day appointed by the chief magistrate, after the accused has denied the facts or pleaded Not guilty. It is taken down in writing by the attorneys of the Court, before the inferior number, and in the presence of the Attorney General and the accused party. Any question that may arise on the evidence is argued before the inferior number of the Court, but may be also submitted to the full Court.

17. No evidence can be received in his absence.

18. After the evidence for the prosecution has been heard, if his witnesses are not summoned or are not present, the case is put off to a future day to hear them.

19. The accused party is allowed fully to cross-question witnesses after they have been examined by the Attorney General.

20. Generally when the first jury is empannelled: in some cases the Court has allowed witnesses to be heard for the defence after the verdict of the first jury.

21. When the case goes before a jury the whole evidence is reduced to writing.

22. It is read to the jury. As the evidence has been written down in the presence of the accused party, and kept in the custody of the clerk of the Court, such cases do not occur.

23. All reasonable latitude is allowed to counsel to examine witnesses and to raise questions of law which are argued before the Court.

24. The Attorney General, as public prosecutor.

25. The Court decides the law: and, when an accusation has been presented by the Attorney General, which is the case when the alleged offence has any gravity, the juries decide the fact. The first jury is composed of thirteen members of the police of the parish where the offence has been committed, seven of whom may return a verdict of Guilty or Not guilty. The accused, but not the prosecutor, may appeal to a second jury called Grande Enquête, composed of twenty-four gentlemen, chosen by the Attorney General, eight from the parish where the offence has been committed, and eight from two of each of the adjoining parishes. Twenty must agree to return a verdict of Guilty; otherwise the party is acquitted.

26. By the full Court when the case has been before a jury.

27. Yes,—to allow the prosecutor or the accused to call further evidence, until the jury is empannelled.

28. A general outline of the proceedings has been given in the preceding answers.

29. The accused only may appeal from the first jury to the Grande Enquête. When the Grande Enquête is called, the evidence is read, the counsel for the accused presents the defence, and the Attorney General is heard in support of the previous verdict. If the accused be found Guilty, the Court passes sentence, the Attorney General being heard as to the punishment to be awarded, and the counsel of the accused in mitigation.

30. The Viscount carries the sentence of the Court into execution.

31. The Crown Officers or the Clerk of the Court will be enabled to furnish the Commission with forms of the proceedings. The several oaths administered are found in the code of laws or regulations passed by the States in seventeen hundred and seventy one.

32. The Bailiff and the Crown Officers hold their offices by letters patent. The jurats are chosen for life, by the rate-payers of the island. The constables and centeniers are elected by the rate-payers of their parish for three years. The police officers, who assist the constable and centeniers, are chosen by the parish assemblies. The police officers are removable by the Court, and the other functionaries by Her Majesty in Council.

33, 34. The revision of the Criminal Laws is now before the States. Reference will be made to these questions in the answers to the subsequent series.

No. 8.

Answers of Ph. Picot, Esq., one of the Jurats of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

Ph. Picot, Esq.

1. I have occupied various civil offices, by which I have become acquainted with many proceedings in criminal cases.

2. There is but one tribunal,—the Royal Court, which takes cognizance of all offences, except high treason and laying violent hands on the Queen's officers. It owes its origin to enactments of King John.

3. The authorities principally relied upon in the discussion of questions arising on criminal law are English authorities.

4. When it is suspected that a party has committed an offence, it is the duty of the constable, or other police officer to whom the complaint is made, to investigate the matter, and, if it appears to him that the suspicions are grounded, he apprehends the offender. If the offence is not of a serious nature, the accused is admitted to bail, to appear before the Court on a certain day; but, if the offence is of a serious nature, the officer obtains from the chief magistrate, or other magistrate authorized by him, a warrant or order for the gaoler to receive the accused into custody.

5. The Court exercises summary jurisdiction, only with respect to slight offences.

6. The accused party being in prison, it is the duty of the police of the parish in which the offence has been committed to bring the prisoner before the Court, at one of its first sittings, which is generally the next Saturday after his incarceration. The Attorney General then reads the report of the officer who apprehended the accused, and also a written charge, framed on that report. The prisoner chooses his counsel amongst the gentlemen of the bar: and, if he pleads "Not guilty," the Court either admits him to bail, or remands him to prison, and grants leave to the Attorney General to call up witnesses to sustain the charge, and to the accused to prove his innocence.

7. When the jurisdiction is not of a summary kind, he is tried by a jury in the presence of the bailiff and seven jurats at least. The bailiff and the two jurats, who have sent the party to trial, have only decided to hear witnesses, and to remand the accused to prison. They can always act as members of the Court.

8. The Attorney General institutes the proceedings: and, if no satisfactory evidence is adduced to sustain the charge, the Court liberates the prisoner, at the recommendation of the Attorney General.

9. At the outset of the proceedings, the charge against the accused is put in a definite written form: and, as it is framed on the report, it must always be substantially the same. The plea of the accused may be varied before evidence is completed; but I know of no instance in which the charge has been altered.

10. If the party charged admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, his counsel is first heard, then the Attorney General; after which the Court decides.

11. When the party charged simply denies the facts, his denial alters not the usual mode of proceeding, which is to hear witnesses and empannel a jury.

12 and 13. Whether the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, or to a denial of the facts, he is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy, nor as to the facts.

14. The party charged is entitled to assistance of counsel and other legal advisers, the number of whom is not limited; but only one counsel is allowed to address the jury. They are selected by the party accused: and, if he is unable to defray the expenses of legal assistance, a counsel is obliged, by his oath, to render him all the assistance in his power.

15. All witnesses, selected by the accusing or accused party, are compelled by law to give evidence before the Court: and, as for documents, they can be produced at any time, provided they are read to the jury before it retires to frame its verdict.

16. After the Attorney General has read his charge, the evidence is next taken, at another sitting of the Court. The bailiff orders a certain number of attorneys of the Court to write down all questions and and answers in his presence, and in that of two jurats, the Attorney General, the accused and his counsel.

17. The party accused is always present, as above stated, when evidence is taken for or against him.

18. After witnesses have been heard to prove the charge, the accused is allowed to produce evidence to meet that produced against him, though sometimes some of his witnesses are heard first.

JERSEY.
Answers to Questions.
SERIES I.
Ph. Picot, Esq.

19. The accused is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him, when the Attorney General declares that he has no more questions at that moment. The accused is not limited as to the number of his questions.

20. Fresh evidence may be produced either for or against the party accused, as late as the last day, even though the members of the jury should have taken their seats: but, in very few cases, fresh evidence has been heard in favour of the accused before the "Grande Enquête."

21. The whole evidence received at the respective stages of the proceedings is taken down in writing, as described in the 16th answer.

22. Evidence taken down in writing is lodged "au greffe," and afterwards read to the Court and to the jury by the Attorney General, and can never be disputed.

23. The counsel of the party charged has the same privilege as the Attorney General, to examine witnesses. He can be heard on questions of law before the Court, both before and after the verdict is delivered, and on questions of fact before the jury.

24. The accusing party is heard last.

25. The Court decides the law, and the jury the facts.

26. Judgment is awarded by the Court.

27. The Court adjourns its proceedings, to hear other witnesses, but never when a jury is sitting to try a prisoner. During a long trial, it may suspend its proceedings for a few minutes; then it is the duty of the Viscount to see that the jury has no communications with any one.

28. Contained in previous answers.

29. The accusing party has no right of appeal if the prisoner is acquitted by the "enditement" or jury; but, if found Guilty, the prisoner may appeal to the "Grand Enquête," composed of twenty-four of the most respectable men of three parishes, eight of each parish. They are selected by the Attorney General. If twenty of them find the prisoner Guilty, the Court, after hearing his counsel in mitigation, and the Attorney General in his conclusions, pronounces judgment.

30. It is the duty of the Viscount to see the judgment of the Court carried into effect.

31. The forms used at the various steps of the proceedings are contained in the books of the Court, and the oaths in the civil code of 1771.

32. The Bailiff, the Attorney General and the Viscount hold their offices by patent from the Crown. The jurats are elected for life, by the whole body of the electors of Jersey. The constables and centeniers are elected for three years, by the rate-payers of their own parishes. The vingteniers and "officiers du connétable" are elected by the vestries of their respective parishes, for a period varying from three to seven years. The Court can remove the police officers; the other functionaries are amenable only to her Majesty in Council

33. The "enditement" or jury is composed of thirteen police officers,—the constables, centeniers, vingteniers and "officiers du connétable." If seven of them return a verdict of "Not guilty," the prisoner is discharged by the Court.

Two persons nearly related cannot sit in the jury, nor in the "Grande Enquête."

The prisoner can refuse any juryman for specified reasons; and the Court decides upon their propriety.

34. A defect, which appears to me to exist in the present system, is the formation of the jury and the "Grande Enquête." I would not say that the present mode of acting is disadvantageous to the accused, nor that it secures not the ends of justice: but I believe that, if a list were framed containing the ablest men in the island, sitting by turn as jurymen, it would be an improvement.

No. 9.

John Pelgué, Esq.

Answers of John Pelgué, Esq., Jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. As a member for many years of the police of the parish of St. Saviour, I have often been called upon to act as a juryman on the Enditement, or first jury in criminal cases; subsequently, I have served as member, sometimes as foreman, of the Grande Enquête, or second trial of criminals, and have thus had opportunities of becoming practically acquainted with the criminal law in Jersey. I may add that, in early life, I spent a year or two in the office of a denonciateur or Deputy Sheriff.

2. The Royal Court alone. The origin of its jurisdiction in criminal cases is coeval with the institution of the Court itself under the Constitutions of King John; which Constitutions have been confirmed by Kings Henry III, Henry VII, and Charles II. The jurisdiction of the Royal Court extends over all crimes and offences, except high treason and laying violent hands on the Queen's Ministers, which are reserved for the judgment of Her Majesty in Council.

3. The laws of the old Duchy of Normandy form the basis of our criminal law. Preceding decisions of the Court, and the more eminent English writers on criminal law, are frequently quoted as authorities by the advocates who plead.

4. When a crime has been committed, the constable, centenier or other police officer of the parish wherein it has occurred, upon being applied to by the person aggrieved, arrests the suspected delinquent; he then lays all the circumstances of the case, so far as he has been able to discover them, before the chief magistrate, or another magistrate authorised by him, who, if after examination he sees sufficient grounds, issues a warrant or committal, which the police officer takes to the gaoler, in whose custody the prisoner is then placed. If the magistrate should consider the case not sufficiently proved against the prisoner, he may direct his liberation; or, if the offence be a light one, he may order that the delinquent be admitted to bail for his appearance before the Court.

5. The Royal Court exercises summary jurisdiction in cases of breach of the peace, assault and battery, infringement of prohibitory laws, keeping disorderly houses, and other minor offences; also when a prisoner pleads Guilty.

6. No other preliminary proceedings than those stated in the answer to the 4th question. We left the prisoner in the gaoler's custody: the former is, on an early day after his arrest, brought up before the Court by the police officer who first arrested him, and who presents a written report of all the circumstances of the case. The Attorney General, with whom the police officer's report had been previously left for consideration, reads it to the court, the prisoner being present. The chief magistrate directs the prisoner to select a counsel to conduct his case: the Attorney General next reads the act of accusation, and calls on the prisoner to plead, under the advice of his counsel. If the plea be one of Not guilty, the Court makes an act allowing the Attorney General and the prisoner to call witnesses to appear before it: and the prisoner is either remanded to gaol or admitted to bail, according to the nature of the offence.

7. Before the Royal Court, composed of the chief magistrate or bailiff and two jurats; the former, who, on the police officer's information, sanctioned the incarceration of the prisoner, appears not strictly speaking to have sent him to trial: he is only committed for trial by the Court which hears his accusation by the Attorney General.

8. Proceedings before the Court are instituted by the Attorney General, who may at any period give up the prosecution, if adequate proofs be wanting. There seems to be no instance in which the Attorney General, having given up a prosecution, has attempted to institute a second prosecution against the same individual for the same offence. When a prosecution is abandoned, the Attorney General usually obtains an act of the Court for that purpose.

9. On the first appearance of a prisoner before Court, the charge against him is, as before explained, made against him in a written and definite form by the Attorney General, the ex officio accuser, who cannot afterwards change the accusation in form or substance. The prisoner may remodel or improve his defence at any stage of the proceedings previous to the empannelling of the enditement, or first jury.

10. In this case, the Royal Court, after hearing the prisoner's counsel and the Attorney General on the question, decide upon the relevancy of the facts admitted, to support the charge.

11. The Attorney General is allowed by an act of the Court to call witnesses in support of the charge.

12. He is not.

13. He is not.

14. A prisoner may have as many legal advisers as he chooses; but only one counsel is allowed to plead for him; this one he may select; if he refuses to do so, the chief magistrate does it for him: if the prisoner be unable to pay the usual fees, the gentlemen of the Bar undertake his defence gratuitously.

15. The prosecutor and the prisoner can compel by law the attendance of any witnesses, and the production of any documentary evidence deemed essential to their case, at any stage of the proceedings previous to the empannelling of the enditement or first jury.

16. On an early day after the prisoner's committal, the chief magistrate convenes a Court composed of himself and two jurats, when evidence is taken down in writing by attorneys, the Attorney General and the prisoner being present.

17. No witnesses can be heard except in the prisoner's presence.

18. The prisoner's witnesses are usually brought up after the case for the prosecution is closed; but, if he has a special reason, he may do so before.

19. The prisoner is allowed to cross-examine the witnesses produced against him to such extent as may be useful to his defence.

20. No fresh evidence may be produced after the enditement or first jury is empannelled.

21. The whole of the evidence is taken down in writing.

22. It is read to the jury. The witnesses having deposed in the presence of the Court, the prosecutor and the prisoner, their evidence cannot subsequently be impugned.

23. The prisoner's counsel has the privilege of being heard, and of examining witnesses on questions of fact or law at any stage of the proceedings.

24. The Attorney General or public prosecutor has the right of being heard last.

25. The chief magistrate and the jurats decide all points of law; questions of fact are submitted to the enditement, a jury composed of twelve police officers presided by their constable or centenier, generally selected from the police of the parish wherein the crime has been committed. Any of the jury may be challenged, for cause, on the justness of which the Court (which must now be composed of the chief magistrate and seven jurats at least) decides. The enditement hear all the evidence read, as well as the pleading of the prisoner's counsel, with the reply of the Attorney General, and then retire to consult on their verdict. If unanimous, their foreman declares the verdict to the Court in the name of all; but, if they disagree, each individual member goes up to the chief magistrate's seat, and delivers his opinion. A majority will convict or acquit the prisoner: in case of conviction, the prisoner may appeal to the Grande Enquête, a jury selected by the Attorney General, and composed of twenty-four gentlemen, a third of whom must be inhabitants of the parish wherein the crime was committed, and the remaining two-thirds of two contiguous parishes, a third in each. The proceedings before the Grande Enquête are precisely the same as before the Enditement, the only difference being that twenty out of the twenty-four jurors must agree to convict the prisoner.

26. By the Court, at the instance of the Attorney General.

27. The Court has the power to adjourn, when engaged in hearing evidence: but, when once a jury is empannelled, the Court does not suspend or adjourn its sitting, unless it be, in a long case, for a short time, seldom exceeding an hour.

28. The material incidents are detailed above.

JERSEY.
Answers to Questions.
SERIES I.
John Pelgué, Esq.

29. The Attorney General cannot appeal if the prisoner be acquitted; but, if found guilty by the Enditement, the prisoner may appeal to the Grande Enquête, as before stated. Questions of evidence decided by an inferior court (that is one composed of two jurats and the chief magistrate as president) may be re-argued before the full Court, on the day when the Enditement is convened.

30. The Viscount is the officer charged to see the act or judgment of the Court carried into execution. Latterly, when judgment of death has been pronounced, a delay has been granted to the convict of two or three weeks, to enable him to petition the Crown for mercy.

31. The oaths of some of the officers mentioned above are long, and would not assist the Commissioners in their inquiry. All the members of the Court are sworn on assuming office: the police officers are sworn at the same time; the members of the Enditement are consequently not sworn as jurymen; but the members of the Grande Enquête are in every case; the witnesses also depose on oath.

32. The Bailiff or chief magistrate, the Attorney General, the Viscount and the Solicitor General hold their offices by Royal patent: the jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers throughout the island: the constables and centeniers are elected by the rate-payers of their respective parishes, and hold office for three years. The police officers are elected by the parish meetings, composed of inhabitants of the parish paying a certain rate and of the parish officers for the time being; these police officers hold office for periods varying from three to seven years.

33. In the answers given above, the Commissioners will find a pretty full outline of our criminal procedure.

34. I am not prepared to suggest any plan of criminal law reform.

No. 10.

Philip Le Gallais, Esq.
29 July, 1846.

Answers of Philip Le Gallais, Jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. Upwards of twenty-five years practice in the Royal Court as attorney and deputy viscount, and from January, 1843, as a jurat.

2. The Royal Court. Its jurisdiction is derived from a charter of King John, confirmed by successive sovereigns. It extends over all crimes and offences, excepting matters of high treason and laying violent hands on the ministers of justice while in the discharge of the duties of their office, which are reserved to the cognizance of the sovereign.

3. Prior to our separation from the Duchy of Normandy, we find no trace of a criminal law in this island. The old "Coutumier de Normandie," and Rouillé's commentaries thereon, furnish us with the original authority for our criminal law; to which may be added a few orders in council and ordinances of the states confirmed by royal authority. English authors are now frequently cited in the course of the pleadings.

4. When it is suspected that a party has committed an offence, the police collect all the information they can on the subject, proceed to the arrest of the suspected party, and, at the same time, or very soon after, inform the bailiff, or other magistrate authorised by him, of the circumstances and nature of the charge, who thereupon, if he considers them sufficient to authorise the detention of the party, issues an order or warrant, directed to the gaoler, in whose custody he is lodged by the police. A day previous to presenting the prisoner in Court, the constable leaves his written report, containing a detailed statement of the circumstances relative to the charge against the prisoner, with the Attorney General, who is, ex officio, the prosecutor. The next Court day, or soon after the arrest of the prisoner, it is the duty of the police to bring him up, when he is placed at the bar. The report, and the accusation or indictment, are read in open Court: and the bailiff, or chief magistrate, informs him of the nature of the charge, and that, if he have not already chosen an advocate to assist him in his defence, he had better do so now: he is then called upon to plead to the accusation or indictment, and may put in the plea he thinks fit, or he is advised; if it be that of Not guilty, a rule of Court is granted to the Attorney General to bring witnesses forward on a future day to support the charge; the accused party (unless the offence be bailable) is then fully committed and sent to prison.

5. The Court exercises summary jurisdiction when the accused party admits the charge, and in cases of breach of the peace, infringement of prohibitory laws, assault and battery, keeping disorderly houses, and other minor offences. In these cases, when the defendant denies the charge, vivâ voce evidence is heard on another day in his presence, but not taken down in writing, nor is the case tried by a jury.

6. Where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, no preliminary proceedings take place before the accused party be put on his trial, further than what is stated in the answer to the fourth question: the steps taken for securing his appearance before the Court are also stated in that answer.

7. Before the Royal Court, composed of the bailiff and two jurats: and, though the former is the functionary who gave the order for the committal or detention of the accused party, he cannot be said to have sent him to trial, as it commences only on his first appearance in Court.

8. By the Attorney General, who has the power, on his own responsibility, at any stage of the proceedings, to abandon the prosecution. This abandonment has the effect of a full acquittal.

9. The first time the accused party appears in Court, the charge is produced in a written definite form: the Attorney General cannot afterwards alter or vary the form or substance of the accusation or indictment.

10. When the party admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, the Royal Court then decides whether they are relevant or not.

11. If the party charged simply denies the facts alleged against him, the Attorney General is allowed by a rule of Court to call witnesses on a future day.

12. The party charged is not concluded as to the facts, if he confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges.

13. The party charged, by confining himself to a denial of the facts, is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of one or more advocates, and of one or more attorneys, when he has the means to defray their expense; and, when he is unable to do so, the advocate, whom he has the privilege of choosing, undertakes his defence gratuitously, as well as the attorney whose services he may require.

15. The Attorney General and the accused party can by law compel the attendance of any witnesses, and the production of such documents as may be considered useful, either to the defence of the accused, or to support the accusation at any stage of the proceedings, previous to the enditement or petty jury being empannelled.

16. Evidence is received as soon as the Court has made a rule to that effect, which is subsequently to the first appearance of the accused before the Court. The witnesses depose on oath, in presence of the Court, the Attorney General, the prisoner and his advocate. Their depositions are taken down, in writing, by some of the attorneys of the Court, who also, on this occasion, act gratuitously; which, being read to the witnesses, are by them respectively signed and lodged with the greffier or clerk of the Court.

17. The accused party is allowed during the whole of the proceedings to hear the evidence produced against him: no evidence can be taken in his absence.

18. The accused party is allowed to produce evidence at any time during the proceedings until the case is before a jury.

19. The accused party is allowed to question the witnesses, after the Attorney General has examined them, to such extent as may be useful to his defence.

20. The case being before the grand jury, no fresh evidence can be produced by the prosecutor. In some cases the Court does allow the prisoner to hear one or two more witnesses, if it be alleged to be material, for the purpose of establishing his innocence.

21. The whole.

22. It is read in open Court when the accused is on his trial before the jury. The depositions of the witnesses being taken down, in writing, in presence of the Attorney General and the accused party, either of them, not satisfied on some points of the evidence, may, previous to the calling of the jury, have the witnesses reexamined on those points, when any omission or error may be rectified: but neither party is afterwards allowed to give proof that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to.

23. The advocate of the accused party has the privilege of being heard on any question of fact or law which may arise in the course of the proceedings, and of examining and cross-examining the witnesses.

24. The Attorney General, as the prosecutor, is heard last.

25. The functionaries deciding the law are the bailiff and jurats constituting the Royal Court: and those deciding the fact are, in the first instance, the constable or centeniers, and police officers, to the number of 13, including the constable, who together form the enditement or petty jury; they act on such occasions by virtue of the oath taken by them on their admission to office, and therefore are not specially sworn to try the prisoner. If their finding be against the accused party, and he appeals therefrom, he is remanded to prison: and, a few days afterwards, the question of fact is again tried, and finally decided by the grand jury, composed of 24 men of good understanding and unimpeached character, selected by the Attorney General, eight from the prisoner's parish, and eight from each of two adjoining parishes.

26. The Royal Court.

27. It has that power for several causes, amongst which may be mentioned the following.

1. When, on the first appearance of the accused party in Court, the Attorney General may require time to consider and inquire further into the case prior to filing the accusation or indictment.

2. When the accused party's advocate requires a delay to consider the plea he may put in for the prisoner.

3. In order to take down the evidence in writing, and on some occasions to allow a reasonable time to bring forward any witness who may then happen to be out of the island, either for or against the prisoner.

4. In case of illness or absence of his advocate.

28. The bailiff, being informed that the evidence is closed, appoints an early day, on the application of the Attorney General, for the trial before the enditement or petty jury, which takes place in presence of a full Court, composed of the bailiff and seven jurats, at least. The prisoner is brought up and renews his declaration; or he may even, at this stage of the proceedings, vary or alter it. The names of the men of the jury being called, he is asked by the bailiff to state whether he has any challenge to make against any of the jury. This being disposed of, any question of law or objection previously taken, either by the Attorney General or defendant's advocate, in the first stages of the prosecution, and overruled before the inferior Court, may again be urged before the Court and fully discussed: if they have not the effect of quashing the prosecution, the jury is empannelled, the Attorney General reads publicly in open Court the whole of the proceedings, beginning with the written report of the police, then the accusation or indictment, the different acts or rules of Court, and, finally, the depositions. The advocate for the accused party is heard in his defence; the Attorney General supports the accusation or indictment, and then the bailiff (if he thinks proper) sums up the whole and addresses the jury on the case; after which, the enditement or petty jury retire in private, attended by the viscount or his deputy, with the whole of the written proceedings, that they may refer to, or reconsider, any part of the evidence submitted to them. On their return into Court, if agreed on their verdict, the foreman declares it to the Court; if not, each of the jurymen, individually and privately, states his opinion to the Court; and, should seven of them find the accused Not guilty, he is liberated, and there is an end of the accusation or indictment.

29. If the finding of the petty jury be against the prisoner, he has the privilege of an appeal to the grand jury, composed of 24 respectable men, as stated in my answer to the 25th question. A few days afterwards, the grand jury is summoned and sworn in presence of a full Court, and of the prisoner and his advocate, when similar proceedings and formalities are again observed as on the trial before the enditement or petty jury. The grand jury, attended by the viscount, retire, together with the whole of the written proceedings, to consider their verdict; and, unless 20 bring in a verdict of Guilty, the prisoner is acquitted and released from the accusation.

30. The viscount is directed to see the sentence of the Court carried into effect.

31. Having been informed by the greffier, or clerk of the Court (who has the custody of the books, in which are registered all criminal prosecutions), that he has furnished the Royal Commissioners with the forms used at the various steps of the proceedings, it is unnecessary for me to send them, as they would only be the counterpart of those already supplied by the greffier, who, I am further informed, has also transmitted copies of the oaths taken by the witnesses, the members of the Court, and of the grand jury.

32. The bailiff holds his appointment from Her Majesty during pleasure; the jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers of all the island; the constables and centeniers for three years by the rate-payers of their respective parishes; and the officers of police, called the constable's officers, and vingteniers, by their respective parish assemblies; the vingteniers for three years; the officers of constable of the county parishes for seven years; and those of the town and parish of St. Helier's for four years.

33. In the month of January, 1846, a projet de loi, or bill, regulating the mode of proceedings in criminal prosecutions, was referred to a Committee. This Committee has met and taken the subject into consideration, and, I trust, ere long, will have its report ready.

34. I cannot better point out the defects in our present system, nor the improvements which, with some modifications, might be adopted, than by referring the Royal Commissioners to the printed copy of the projet de loi, or bill, alluded to in my last answer. This very elaborate document (herewith enclosed) is from John William Dupré, Esq., Her Majesty's Solicitor General here, a gentleman of long practice, highly distinguished for his great knowledge of the laws and institutions of this island, and who has devoted much time and trouble to the consideration of this important subject.

Projet de Loi, or Bill for amending the Proceedings in Criminal Prosecutions, referred to in M. Le Gallais' Answer.

AUX ETATS DE L'ILE DE JERSEY,

L'An 1836, le 29e jour d'Août.

Les Etats ont pris en considération les défauts et les vices de la procédure criminelle, suivie devant la Cour Royale de cette île.

Ils ont reconnu que souvent les prévenus sont trop légèrement mis en état d'accusation, attendu qu'ils sont saisis, présentés devant la Cour, et que leur procès leur est fait, sur des dénonciations non appuyées du serment des délateurs, et que notre pratique n'admet point un examen préalable des charges mises à leur compte.

Ils ont aussi reconnu que l'ancienne règle, qui n'admettait l'instruction des procès criminels que durant les deux termes de la Cour Royale, offrait de grands inconvéniens, attendu qu'un accusé pouvait subir une détention de cinq à six mois, avant d'être jugé, et que l'accumulation des poursuites entravait la marche des affaires civiles; que la nouvelle loi qui permet de poursuivre les accusés en vacance comme en terme, quoiqu'elle ait remédié en grande partie à ces inconvéniens, laisse cependant trop à la volonté du Chef Magistrat et de la Partie Publique, et d'ailleurs elle assujétit les membres de la Cour Royale à une attendance continuelle, de sorte qu'il serait avantageux de fixer des époques rapprochées auxquelles ces sortes d'affaires seraient traitées, et en même tems d'abréger la procédure qui est inutilement prolongée par le système actuel.

Les Etats ont aussi reconnu qu'il existe un grave défaut dans la composition des Juris en matière criminelle. Qu'il est contraire à toute saine maxime de Jurisprudence, que les Officiers de Police, qui sont en charge pour quatre et sept ans, et qui peuvent être réélus, soient toujours appelés à former l'enditement, qu'ils aient à prononcer, en qualité de premier Juri, sur l'accusation; eux qui souvent, dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions, ont concouru à la découverte du crime, à la saisie et à la mise en accusation du prévenu; que l'accusé soit forcé de les accepter pour ses Juges, quelque opinion d'ailleurs qu'il ait de leur prévention contre lui, à moins qu'il ne puisse former contr'eux des récusations spéciales. Les Etats sont aussi convaincus que la pratique pourrait être dangereuse qui laisse à la Partie Publique, dont le dévoir est de sévir contre l'accusé, le droit de choisir les membres de la Grande Enquête qui doivent finalement prononcer sur son sort.

Les Etats ont de plus reconnu que la procédure actuelle est très vicieuse, en ce que les témoins ou informateurs sont entendus devant le Chef Magistrat et deux Jurés Justiciers, en absence du Juri; que les Jurés ne peuvent former leur opinion que sur la lecture qui leur est faite de ces dépositions, qui ont été rédigées par écrit. Que par cette manière de procéder, les procès criminels traînent en longueur, la Cour étant occupée plusieurs jours à préparer chaque procès, et que les Jurés ont le désavantage de ne pouvoir juger de la véracité des témoins et du degré de confiance qu'ils méritent, à la manière dont ils font leurs déclarations, qui d'ailleurs sont souvent imparfaitement rendues par les rédacteurs.

Que, d'ailleurs, la nécessité où se trouve la Cour d'interroger plusieurs témoins à la fois, afin de pouvoir expédier les affaires dont elle est saisie, nuit également à la due instruction du procès et aux intérêts de la défense.

Que le concours de deux Juris, dont les fonctions sont précisément les mêmes, pour juger un procès criminel, n'est pas nécessaire, et même peut nuire à l'administration de la justice; que d'ailleurs la Grande Enquête offre par sa composition, et la manière dont elle rend son verdict, une ample garantie à la société et à l'accusé; ainsi que l'ont demontré une longue expérience et l'assentiment général.

Par ces motifs, les Etats ont résolu d'opérer les changements et améliorations suivants dans la procédure criminelle:

1°. D'assurer la liberté personnelle des citoyens, en prescrivant que nul ne sera mis en état d'accusation que sur le serment d'une ou de plusieurs personnes dignes de foi.

2°. D'établir des Assises, convoquées à des époques fixes, pour juger les procès criminels.

3°. D'abroger la procédure devant l'Enditement, mais de conserver la Grande Enquête, qui era composée de citoyens offrant une garantie suffisante, et qui seront désignés par le sort pour assister aux assises.

4°. De supprimer la rédaction des dépositions devant la Cour, en absence du Juri, et de faire entendre les témoins de vive voix, devant la Cour et le Juri.

5°. D'assurer par des dispositions spéciales la comparution des Jurés et des témoins.

Et à cet effet, les Etats ont adopté la Loi suivante.

Loi sur la procédure Criminelle.

DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES.

I. Toute personne accusée de crime, ou de délit, assujétissant la personne qui en serait trouvée coupable à un emprisonnement de trois mois sera jugée par la Cour Royale, avec l'assistance de Jurés, composant une Grande Enquête, de la manière et dans les formes ci-après prescrites.

II. Il y aura annuellement six Assises criminelles ordinaires:

La première Assise commencera le 3e Janvier; la seconde le 1er Mars; la troisième le 1er Mai; la quatrième le 7e Juillet; la cinquième le 1er Septembre; la sixième le 1er Novembre.

Chaque Assise durera quatre jours, exclusivement du Dimanche et des jours fériés qui pourraient intervenir.

III. Si le jour indiqué pour l'ouverture de l'Assise est un Dimanche ou un jour férié, elle commencera le premier jour ouvrier suivant.

IV. Si les procès criminels à juger ne peuvent être terminés durant l'Assise ordinaire, la Cour pourra ordonner la convocation d'une ou de plusieurs Assises extraordinaires. Elle fixera la durée de l'Assise extraordinaire, qui n'excédera pas quatre jours.

V. Si les procès criminels à juger sont terminés avant le temps fixé pour la clôture de l'Assise, la Cour congédiera les Jurés dès que leurs services ne seront plus requis.

VI. La Cour en Corps présidera aux Assises; mais si, par l'absence, la maladie ou l'empêchement de plusieurs Jurés Justiciers, le nombre de sept ne peut être réuni, trois Jurés Justiciers, avec le Chef Magistrat, seront compétens pour tenir l'Assise.

Composition du personnel des Juris.

VII. Tout sujet Britannique, domicilié dans cette île, qui est âgé de vingt-un ans accomplis, et qui n'a pas atteint sa soixante-cinquième année, et qui est porté sur la liste du rât paroissial pour une somme de quartiers et au de-là, est tenu de servir en qualité de Juré dans les Grandes Enquêtes; sauf les exceptions ci-après énoncées.

VIII. Sont exemptés du service de Jurés:

1°. Les Membres du Corps de la Cour et les Connétables.

2°. Le Clergé de l'Eglise Anglicane et de l'Eglise Romaine; les Pasteurs des Eglises reformées non conformistes, qui justifient qu'ils sont à la tête d'une congrégation et qu'ils ne suivent aucune occupation séculière.

3°. Les Avocats de la Cour Royale, les Médecins et Chirurgiens, exerçant leur état.

4°. Les Maîtres de Port et les Pilotes brévetés, en activité de service.

5°. Les Prévôts du Roi.

6°. Les Administrateurs et Chefs des Hôpitaux publics; les Geoliers et Directeurs des Prisons et maisons de détention.

7°. Toute personne qui a atteint sa soixante-cinquième année.

8°. Toute personne atteinte d'une infirmité permanente, qui la rend incapable de servir.

IX. Sont incapables de servir comme Jurés:

1°. Tout individu qui n'est point né ou naturalisé sujet Britannique.

2°. Tout individu qui n'a pas atteint sa vingt-unième année.

3°. Tout interdit, pour quelque cause que ce soit; toute personne frappée d'aliénation mentale.

4°. Toute personne atteinte et convaincue de trahison ou de félonie, ou qui est condamnée à subir, ou qui a subi, une peine flétrissante; toute personne hors la Loi ou contumace.

5°. Toute personne sous accusation de crime ou de délit, qui l'assujétirait à être jugée par le Juri.

X. Pourront être exemptées du service de Juré, pour le tems que dure la cause d'exemption:

1°. Toute personne atteinte d'une infirmité temporaire qui la rend incapable de service.

2°. Toute personne qui ne comprend point la langue dans laquelle s'instruit la procédure.

XI. Chaque année, dans la première quinzaine du mois de Novembre, les Connétables ou Chefs de Police présenteront à l'Assemblée des Principaux et Officiers de leurs paroisses respectives un état par ordre alphabétique des habitants de la paroisse qui sont cotés au rât, pour une somme de quartiers et au delà.

XII. L'assemblée vérifiera sur la liste du rât l'exactitude de cet état. Elle en retranchera les noms de ceux qui ont le droit aux exemptions énoncées dans l'article 8; les noms de ceux qui réclameront une exemption en vertu de l'article 10; et les noms de ceux qui sont frappés des incapacités énoncées dans l'article 9.

L'état ainsi arrêté sera signé par le Connétable ou Chef de Police; il sera transcrit sur le livre des actes de l'assemblée, où il sera fait mention des exceptions admises et des motifs qui y ont donné lieu.

Un état nominatif sera dressé séparément:

1°. Des exemptions énoncées dans l'article 8.

2°. De celles réclamées en vertu de l'article 10.

3°. Des individus frappés d'incapacité en vertu de l'article 9.

Cet état, ainsi arrêté, signé par le Connétable ou Chef de Police, sera affiché le premier Dimanche après la tenue de l'assemblée à la principale barrière du Cimetière de l'Eglise paroissiale.

XIII. Chaque Connétable ou Chef de Police déposera au Greffe de la Cour Royale, dans le délai de quinze jours, l'état arrêté par l'assemblée de sa paroisse, avec un état des noms qui auront été retranchés de la liste; le Greffier transcrira ces états sur un Registre, et écrira un numéro vis-à-vis chaque nom des Jurés.

XIV. La Cour revisera les Etats d'exemptions, lorsqu'elle s'assemblera pour procéder au tirage des Jurés pour l'Assise de Janvier; et prononcera sur toute réclamation qui pourrait lui être adressée à ce sujet. Les Connétables ou Chefs de Police assisteront à l'audience, afin de donner les explications nécessaires.

Les personnes portées sur ces Etats, ainsi définitivement arrêtés, composeront les Jurés pour l'année suivante.

PROCÉDURE.

De la Prévention.

XV. Toute personne saisie sous prévention de crime ou de délit sera présentée devant la Cour, à la première audience, après un délai de quarante huit heures.

XVI. L'Officier qui saisira l'inculpé pourra le remettre provisoirement à la garde du Geolier de la Prison Publique, en obtenant, au préalable, une autorisation d'un Magistrat, laquelle autorisation sera déposée aux mains du Geolier, qui en donnera récépissé.

XVII. L'Officier auquel il appartient de présenter l'inculpé sera tenu de remettre à la Partie Publique, au moins vingt-quatre heures avant l'audience, un rapport énonçant les faits et circonstances qui ont donné lieu à la prévention, et qui ont accompagné et suivi la saisie, et tout autre renseignement qui peut servir à former l'acte d'accusation. Il remettra aussi à la Partie Publique les noms des témoins et informateurs.

XVIII. L'Officier auquel il appartient de présenter l'inculpé citera, ou fera citer, à comparaître à l'audience, par ses Officiers ou par le Prévôt de la paroisse où réside le témoin, les témoins ou informateurs qui doivent être entendus pour établir la prévention.

XIX. Lorsque l'inculpé sera présenté, la Partie Publique donnera lecture du rapport, et produira l'acte d'accusation. L'inculpé sera interrogé par le Président sur ses noms et prénoms, son âge, son état; les personnes citées en témoignage déposeront par serment; et la Cour décidera s'il y a preuves, charges ou indices assez graves pour prononcer la mise en accusation de l'inculpé et l'envoi de la cause aux Assises.

Si la Cour décide l'affirmative, l'accusé plaidera sur l'accusation.

Si l'accusé se déclare non coupable, il sera constitué prisonnier ou admis à caution, s'il y a lieu; et la procédure sera continuée.

S'il refuse de plaider, la procédure sera continuée comme s'il s'était déclaré non coupable; mais il ne sera pas admis à caution, quand même il y aurait lieu.

S'il s'avoue coupable, la Cour prononcera sentence.

Si la Cour estime que les preuves, charges ou indices résultant des dépositions des témoins ne sont pas assez graves pour prononcer la mise en accusation de l'inculpé, il sera relâché, ou, s'il y a lieu, la cause sera retenue pour être jugée par la Cour en simple police.

XX. L'inculpé pourra se faire assister par un Avocat. Dans cet état de cause les fonctions du défenseur se borneront à énoncer et discuter toute question préjudicielle que pourrait faire naître l'accusation, à interroger les témoins et à énoncer le plaid de l'accusé aprés l'arrêt de mise en accusation.

XXI. La Partie Publique pourra requérir un délai, soit pour prendre de plus amples informations, avant de présenter l'acte d'accusation, soit à cause de l'absence d'un ou de plusieurs témoins; la Cour fixera la durée du délai, selon les circonstances qui l'auront motivé.

XXII. Si un délai est ordonné, l'inculpé sera mis en état de détention préventive, ou admis à caution, s'il y a lieu. La Cour annoncera à l'inculpé le jour de l'audition de l'affaire; et elle commandera aux témoins ou informateurs présents de comparaître le dit jour.

XXIII. Dans les procés criminels intentés sur la représentation de la Partie Publique, lorsque la saisie de l'inculpé sera ordonnée par la Cour, les témoins seront entendus pour établir la prévention lorsque l'inculpé sera présenté, la représentation tenant lieu d'acte d'accusation.

XXIV. Si le délit imputé à l'accusé, soit par le rapport de l'Officier compétent, soit sur la représentation de la Partie Publique, ne donne lieu qu'à une signification de comparaître ou à une action ordinaire, il n'y aura pas de témoins entendus pour établir la prévention, mais l'inculpé sera tenu de plaider sur l'acte d'accusation, ou sur la représentation ou billet, la premiére fois qu'il comparaîtra.

XXV. Sur le défaut d'un inculpé, cité pour un délit en vertu d'un Acte de la Cour, ou d'une action, la saisie de sa personne sera ordonnée. L'ordonnance fixera le cautionnement qui sera exigé par l'Officier pour assurer la comparution de l'accusé.

Si l'inculpé qui aura fourni caution ne comparaît pas le jour qui lui aura été assigné par l'Officier, le cautionnement sera adjugé au Roi, et prise de corps sera décernée vers l'inculpé.

XXVI. Si l'inculpé pour crime ou délit, donnant lieu à la saisie da personne, est en fuite, ou s'il se soustrait aux recherches de la Justice, prise de corps sera décernée vers lui.

XXVII. Aprés prise de corps décernée, nul cautionnement ne sera reçu, mais l'inculpé sera mis en état de détention préventive.

XXVIII. Tout témoin cité pour établir la prévention de l'inculpé, ou auquel il aura été commandé de comparaître en vertu de l'article 22e, et qui ne se présentera pas pour déposer, sera passible d'une amende de cinq chelins sterlings.

Les personnes citées en témoignage, qui, par leur absence, donneront lieu à un délai ou à une remise de l'affaire, seront en outre condamnées aux frais curiaux, à payer à chaque témoin ou informateur présent une indemnité de deux chelins; et leur saisie sera ordonnée et exécutée par le Vicomte ou l'un des Dénonciateurs, Sergens de Justice, qui les présentera devant la Cour le jour indiqué pour l'audition de la cause : sauf, dans l'un et l'autre cas, une excuse légitime.

XXIX. Quand le verdict d'une Enquête de levée de corps aura établi la prévention, l'inculpé sera présenté seulement pour répondre à l'acte d'accusation, le verdict de l'enquête remplaçant l'arrêt de mise en accusation. Les témoins seront entendus par serment devant l'Enquête de levée de corps; le Vicomte, ou le Dénonciateur agissant, leur administrera le serment.

XXX. L'accusé pourra se faire délivrer par le Greffier, gratuitement, copie de l'acte d'accusation et des autres pièces du procès, qui auront été déposées au Greffe.

Formation du Juri.

XXXI. Dans les trois premiers jours de la semaine qui précède celle où l'ouverture d'une Assise ordinaire doit avoir lieu, la Cour s'assemblera pour procéder au tirage des Jurés qui composeront les Grandes Enquêtes.

XXXII. Le tirage des Jurés de l'Assise aura lieu dans la forme qui suit :

Des numéros, en nombre égal et correspondant à ceux des Jurés dans le Registre du Greffier, seront inscrits sur des bulletins séparés et mis dans une urne, en présence de la Cour : le Vicomte en retirera 50 bulletins; et les numéros sortant, avec le nom des Jurés qu'ils désignent, seront inscrits sur une liste, à mesure qu'ils sortent de l'urne.

Les trente-huit premiers individus désignés seront tenus de servir comme Jurés de l'Assise.

Les douze derniers pourront être appelés comme Jurés supplémentaires, si par quelque cause le nombre des Jurés de l'Assise se trouvait incomplet.

XXXIII. Les Jurés qui auront assisté à une Assise seront dispensés de servir dans les autres Assises de l'année.

XXXIV. Le tirage des Jurés pour les Assises extraordinaires aura lieu dans les formes indiquées pour les Assises ordinaires.

La Cour fixera le jour du tirage, lorsqu'elle ordonnera la convocation de l'Assise; le jour indiqué doit être un des trois premiers jours qui précédent celui de l'ouverture de l'Assise extraordinaire.

XXXV. Quand la liste des Jurés de l'Assise sera arrêtée, elle sera signée par le Président de la Cour et remise au Vicomte, qui citera les Jurés de l'Assise ordinaire à comparaître au jour et à l'heure indiqués pour l'ouverture de l'Assise, et les trois jours d'Audience suivants.

XXXVI. Les citations seront par écrit, ou imprimées; elles seront signées par le Vicomte, et servies à domicile, vingt-quatre heures au moins avant le jour pour lequel la première comparution des Jurés est requise. Elles feront mention de la peine à laquelle les Jurés sont sujets s'ils ne comparaissent point.

XXXVII. La Grande Enquête sera composée de vingt-quatre Jurés; les Jurés seront appelés à la former dans l'ordre où ils sont inscrits sur la liste signée par le Président de la Cour. Les Jurés récusés, et dont les récusations seront admises, seront remplacés dans le même ordre.

Quand il sera formé un nouveau Juri on commencera par les Jurés qui n'auront pas servi dans l'Enquête précédente, et ensuite on recommencera la liste.

XXXVIII. L'accusé pourra récuser péremptoirement douze Jurés appelés, sans être tenu d'assigner les motifs de la récusation. S'il y a plusieurs accusés et qu'ils ne puissent s'accorder sur les récusations à porter, chacun d'eux aura le droit de récuser péremptoirement quatre Jurés.

XXXIX. Tant l'accusé que la Partie Publique pourront porter des récusations spéciales, qu'il y ait eu récusation péremptoire, ou non.

XL. Si la liste des Jurés est épuisée, et qu'il ne reste pas un nombre suffisant de Jurés non récusables pour former la Grande Enquête, la cause sera remise, et des Jurés supplémentaires seront cités pour la compléter.

XLI. Les récusations spéciales ne seront admises que contre celui ou ceux qui auront souffert par le crime ou délit imputé à l'accusé, contre les parens et alliès de l'accusé, ou de celui ou de ceux qui ont souffert par le crime ou délit imputé à l'accusé, jusque et y compris le dégré de cousin germain, ou à cause d'inimitié envers l'accusé, d'un procés au civil dépendant entre le Juré récusé et l'accusé, ou d'un procés criminel dépendant, ou qui aurait été jugé, où l'accusé et le Juré récusé auraient figuré l'un comme délateur ou partie plaignante, et l'autre comme accusé.

XLII. Le père et le fils, le beau-père et le gendre, deux frères, deux beaux-frères, ne pourront former partie du même Juri.

XLIII. Le serment suivant sera administré aux Jurés : " Vous jurez que vous remplirez con-
" sciencieusement et scrupuleusement les devoirs de Juré, sur l'accusation portée par le Procureur
" Général du Roi (ou l'Officier exerçant les fonctions de Partie Publique) contre ....., et que
" vous donnerez votre verdict en conformité aux preuves, sans prévention et sans haine, et que vous
" ne divulguerez point l'opinion de vos collègues, ni la votre, comme vous en répondrez devant Dieu,
" à l'acquit de votre conscience."

Chaque Juré répondra individuellement " Je le jure."

XLIV. Les Jurés, après qu'ils auront prêté serment, choisiront pour leur chef un des membres de la Grande Enquête.

Procédure devant la Grande Enquête.

XLV. Après l'installation de la Grande Enquête l'acte d'accusation sera lu, et l'accusé sera sommé par le Président de la Cour d'énoncer derechef son plaid; lecture des actes et piéces de la procédure sera faite; les témoins déposeront par serment et de vive voix; la Partie Publique exposera la cause; le défenseur de l'accusé présentera la défense; la Partie Publique pourra répliquer, mais de manière que le défenseur ait dans tous les cas le droit de parler le dernier; le Président de la Cour résumera l'affaire; il fera remarquer aux jurés les principales preuves pour ou contre l'accusé.

Si le crime imputé à l'accusé emporte la peine capitale, la Cour fera prendre note des dépositions.

XLVI. Le verdict de la Grande Enquête sera annoncé publiquement et à haute voix par le Président, et déclarera l'accusé innocent ou coupable de l'entier de l'accusation, ou innocent ou coupable de partie de l'accusation.

Dans ce dernier cas le verdict énoncera les chefs de l'accusation dont l'accusé est déclaré innocent ou coupable.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Philip Le Gallais, Esq.
29 July, 1846.

Le verdict pourra modifier l'accusation, en rapportant l'accusé coupable d'un dégré moins grave du crime qui lui est imputé.

XLVII. Il faut le concours de vingt Jurés pour déclarer l'accusé coupable.

XLVIII. Si le verdict de la Grande Enquête déclare l'accusé coupable de l'entier ou de partie de l'accusation, il sera déclaré dûment atteint et convaincu du crime, du délit, ou de la contravention mis à sa charge ; et la Cour appliquera la peine qu'il a encourue.

Si le verdict déclare l'accusé innocent, il sera déchargé de la poursuite et relâché.

XLIX. Les Jurés pourront se retirer dans la chambre de leurs délibérations pour considérer leur verdict. Ils y seront conduits par le Vicomte, qui, après leur avoir remis les pièces de la procédure, sortira de la dite Chambre, et empêchera qu'ils ne communiquent avec qui que ce soit.

L. S'il s'élève du doute relativement au verdict ou à la portée du verdict prononcé par le chef de la Grande Enquête, la Cour pourra renvoyer les Jurés dans la Chambre des délibérations pour le rectifier, avec les formalités prescrites par l'article précédent.

Il en sera de même si le verdict ne se rapporte point aux chefs de l'accusation.

LI. Si la majorité des Jurés reconnaît qu'il y a dans les faits de la cause des circonstances atténuantes en faveur de l'accusé, il en sera fait mention dans le verdict.

Dans ce cas la Cour prononcera une peine contre l'accusé, inférieure à celle qu'il eût encourue s'il eût été déclaré coupable sans circonstances atténuantes.

LII. Dans tous les cas ou la peine capitale sera prononcée la sentence ne sera mise à exécution qu'après avoir reçu la Sanction Royale ; et à cet effet le Chef-Magistrat transmettra toutes les pièces de la procédure à sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil.

LIII. Sur les questions de droit qui seront soumises à la Cour, soit par la Partie Publique, soit par l'accusé, la partie qui proposera la question exposera ses moyens, et l'autre partie aura la réplique.

LIV. La Cour sera tenue de faire acte de toutes ses décisions et de les motiver ; et elle enregistrera le verdict de la Grande Enquête.

LV. Les Jurés ne communiqueront avec qui que ce soit, autres que leurs collègues et la Cour, du moment qu'ils auront prêté serment, jusqu'à ce qu'ils aient rendu le verdict, sur peine de dix livres sterling d'amende vers le contrevenant, et de nullité de la procédure, s'il y a eu communication avec une personne étrangère au Juri, relativement au procès.

LVI. Si durant les débats un Juré est atteint d'une maladie ou d'une indisposition qui l'empêche de continuer ses fonctions, il pourra être remplacé sur le champ par un autre Juré de l'Assise, si la Partie Publique et l'accusé y consentent.

Autrement, le procès aura lieu devant une autre Grande Enquête, s'il se peut durant la même assise, ou sera renvoyé à une assise extraordinaire.

LVII. Tout Juré dûment cité à comparaître à une Assise, et qui ne se présentera point quand son nom aura été appelé trois fois à haute voix, ou qui se retirera après avoir comparu, sans l'autorisation du Président de la Cour, sera condamné à une amende de dix livres sterlings.

Le Juré, ou les Jurés, qui, par leur absence, donneraient lieu à la remise de l'affaire, seront en outre condamnés à payer les frais curiaux, une indemnité de cinq chelins à chaque Juré présent, et de deux chelins à chaque témoin, sauf, dans l'un et l'autre cas, une excuse légitime.

LVIII. La citation des témoins, dans un procès jugé avec l'assistance de Jurés, sera servie, à domicile, par le ministère du Vicomte ou de l'un des Dénonciateurs, Sergens de Justice, au moins vingt-quatre heures avant celle de l'audience, et à la diligence de la Partie Publique.

LIX. La citation sera par écrit, ou imprimée, et signée par l'Officier ; elle énoncera le nom du témoin, le titre de l'officier qui remplit les fonctions de Partie Publique, celui de l'accusé, ou des accusés, le jour, l'heure et le lieu où la présence du témoin est requise, et la peine à laquelle il est sujet s'il ne se présente pas.

LX. Toute personne dûment citée à témoignage devant la Grande Enquête, qui ne comparaîtra pas à l'audience indiquée dans la citation, quand son nom sera appelé trois fois à haute voix, ou qui, après avoir comparu, se retirera sans déposer ou sans l'autorisation du Président de la Cour, sera condamnée à une amende de cinq livres sterling.

Si l'absence de la personne citée donne lieu à la remise de la cause, elle sera en outre condamnée aux frais curiaux, à payer une indemnité de cinq chelins à chaque Juré, et de deux chelins à chaque témoin présent ; et la Cour ordonnera sa saisie par l'Officier, qui la présentera le jour indiqué pour l'audience ; sauf, dans l'un et l'autre cas, une excuse légitime.

LXI. Tout témoin saisi en vertu d'un acte de la Cour, fait en exécution de cette loi, pour avoir fait défaut devant la Grande Enquête, sera tenu de donner caution à l'Officier de comparaître devant la Cour, pour donner sa déposition, toutes fois et quantes qu'elle en sera requise, sur la pénalité de cinquante livres sterling.

S'il ne fournit le cautionnement requis, il sera détenu jusqu'à ce qu'il ait déposé.

LXII. Les seules causes admissibles pour justifier l'absence d'un Juré, dûment cité en vertu de cette loi, sont :

1°. Le cas de maladie qui l'empêche de quitter son domicile sans danger.

2°. De décès d'un parent ou allié, jusqu' et y compris les dégrés d'oncle et de neveu, de tante et de nièce, pourvu que l'inhumation n'ait pas eu lieu huit jours avant celui où la comparution est requise.

LXIII. Les seules causes admissibles pour justifier l'absence d'un témoin ou informateur, dûment cité en vertu de cette Loi, sont :

1°. Le cas de maladie qui l'empêche de quitter son domicile sans danger.

2°. Le décès d'un parent ou allié, jusqu' et y compris les dégrès d'oncle et de neveu, de tante et de nièce, pourvu que l'inhumation n'ait pas eu lieu avant le jour, ou le jour même, que la comparution est requise.

LXIV. Tout Juré, témoin ou informateur, empêché par maladie de se presenter le jour où sa comparution est requise, sera tenu de faire remettre à la Partie Publique, avant l'audience, le certificat d'un médecin ou d'un chirurgien, constatant son état, et de se faire exoiner devant la Cour.

Le Juré, témoin ou informateur, empêché à cause de la mort d'un parent ou allié, sera tenu d'en donner avis avant l'audience, a Partie Publique, et de se faire exoiner devant la Cour.

Néanmoins, si la cause d'absence naît le jour qui précède celui où la comparution est requise, ou le jour même, et que le Juré, témoin ou informateur empêché n'a pu remplir les formalités prescrites par cet article, il pourra se faire re ever, sans frais, des condamnations prononcées contre lui, en justifiant son éta d'incapacité à la satisfaction de la Cour.

LXV. La Partie Publique, ou l'accusé, pourra faire entendre devant le Vicomte les témoins ou informateurs qui sont sur leur départ de cette île, ou qu'une maladie ou une infirmité empêche de se rendre à la Cour.

Il en sera de même si, entre l'époque de l'accusation et celle de l'Assise, il y a lieu de craindre le décès ou le départ d'une personne dont le témoignage est nécessaire.

La Cour, dans tous les cas, accordera la demande qui lui sera faite pour cet effet ; l'Acte autorisant le Vicomte à recevoir la déposition énoncera le motif pour lequel la demande est faite.

Si le témoin ou informateur, entendu devant le Vicomte, peut déposer devant la Cour, lorsque le procès sera jugé, sa déposition écrite ne sera pas produite, mais il sera tenu de déposer de vive voix.

LXVI. La citation d'un témoin ou informateur à comparaître devant le Vicomte sera faite dans les formes prescrites par les articles 58 et 59. L'absence de la personne citée l'assujétira aux peines énoncées dans les articles 60 et 61.

L'absent pourra se prévaloir des excuses énoncées dans l'article 62, en remplissant les formalités prescrites par l'article 64.

Le Vicomte prononcera les peines dans un record écrit au pied de l'Acte de la Cour ; mais, pour être exécutoire, le record devra être confirmé par la Cour, sauf la peine de la saisie et l'obligation de fournir caution, qui sera provisoirement exécutée sur le simple record du Vicomte.

LXVII. L'accusé sera présent à toute déposition prise devant le Vicomte : il lui sera donné un avertissement, ainsi qu'à son défenseur, de vingt-quatre heures pour le moins.

LXVIII. L'absence d'un ou de plusieurs témoins essentiels, soit à l'accusation, soit à la défense, donnera lieu au renvoi du procès aux prochaines Assises.

LXIX. L'accusé, s'il est sous la main de la justice, sera présent à toutes les audiences et à tous les jugements qui le concernent, et le verdict de la Grande Enquête sera rendu en sa présence.

LXX. La contrefaçon ou la falsification d'un certificat requis, en vertu des dispositions de cette Loi, assujétira les délinquants, et ceux qui s'en seront servis sciemment, à être poursuivis et punis comme faussaires.

LXXI. Toute personne qui délivrera un certificat requis par cette Loi, et qui y constatera un fait ou des faits qui seront faux, ou qui sciemment fera usage d'un pareil certificat, subira une amende qui ne sera pas moins de dix livres sterling, et n'excédera pas cent livres sterling : les insolvables seront punis par un emprisonnement qui ne sera pas moins de trois mois et n'excédera pas un an.

Des Nullités.

LXXII. Toute violation des dispositions de cette Loi, relativement à la formation de la Grande Enquête, ou aux formes qui doivent être observées devant elle, donnera lieu à la nullité de la procédure.

Answers of Francis Arthur, Esq., one of the Jurats of the Royal Court, to the first Series of Questions.

Francis Arthur, Esq.

1. I was elected jurat in 1845, after having filled several public offices.

2. The Royal Court, whose jurisdiction has originated in the charter of King John, and has been confirmed by successive sovereigns : it extends over all crimes and offences, with the exception of high treason and laying violent hands on the Queen's officers, reserved to Her Majesty in Council.

3. Our criminal law is based on the ancient law of Normandy : but precedents are chiefly relied upon.

4. The constable or centenier of the parish where the offence has been committed collects all the information he can obtain : and, if the offence is such as to justify the arrest of the person, he arrests the party suspected, when there are sufficient grounds to believe him guilty. Such officer then lays the matter before the chief magistrate, who may grant or refuse a committal. In other cases the constable or centenier, through the Attorney General, presents a report to the Court, stating the offence that has been committed, and the information he has received. The Court may then order the party to be arrested, or merely summoned to appear.

5. The Court alone has a summary jurisdiction, which it exercises in cases of breach of the peace, assault and battery, infringement of prohibitory laws, keeping disorderly houses, and other minor offences.

6. The party arrested is brought before the Court : the report of the police, stating the most important facts of the case, and which has been left previously with the Attorney General for his consideration, is read ; and the Attorney General, as public prosecutor, reads the accusation or indictment which he has prepared. The accused party, with the advice of counsel, puts in his plea ; if he does not plead Guilty, the Court allows the Attorney General and the prisoner to summon witnesses for some future day, and the accused party is either admitted to bail or remanded to prison, according to the nature of the offence.

7. The evidence is taken down in writing before the Court, composed of the bailiff and two jurats. When the evidence is complete, both for the prosecution and the defence, the full Court, composed of the bailiff and seven jurats at least, meets ; the jury, composed in the first instance of 13 members of the parish where the offence has been committed, is empannelled ; the accusation or indictment, together with the evidence, is read, the counsel of the prisoner heard in his defence, and afterwards the Attorney General. The jury, by a majority of votes, finds the accused party Guilty or Not guilty. In the first case he may appeal to another jury, composed of 24 gentlemen, chosen by the Attorney General. When this jury is empannelled before the full Court, the evidence is again read over, and the party heard in his defence, as also the Attorney General in support of the accusation. Five members of the jury are sufficient to acquit. If the prisoner is found guilty, the full Court then passes sentence.

8. By the Attorney General, who may abandon proceedings, with the sanction of the Court, unless it be for minor offences. We are not aware of fresh proceedings having been afterwards taken against the same party.

9. When the party is first brought before the Court, the accusation which has been prepared by the Attorney General is read. He is not allowed afterwards to vary or alter its form or substance.

10. The point is argued before the Court between the Attorney General and the counsel for the accused party.

11. The Attorney General is allowed to call witnesses in support of the charge.

12. No.

13. He is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of counsel. One counsel only can be heard for the defence: he is selected by the party accused, and pleads gratuitously if such party is without means.

15. Both parties are entitled by law to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence at any time before the jury be empannelled. In some cases the Court has allowed the defence to produce further evidence after the verdict of the first jury.

16. On an early day, fixed by the chief magistrate, it is taken down in writing before the Court by some of the attorneys, in the presence of the Attorney General and of the prisoner and counsel.

17. No evidence can be heard in his absence.

18. At any stage of the proceedings.

19. After the Attorney General has examined them, the party accused may cross-question the witnesses to such an extent as may be useful to his defence.

20. The Attorney General is not allowed to hear witnesses after the case has been before the first jury; but in some cases, and under special circumstances, it has been allowed to the party accused.

21. The whole is taken down in writing.

22. The witnesses do not appear before the jury; but the evidence is read. The evidence being taken down in the presence of the Attorney General and the accused party, and kept in the custody of the clerk of the Court, its correctness cannot be impugned.

23. He can be heard on questions of fact or law, and may examine the witnesses.

24. The Attorney General has the privilege of being heard last.

25. The Court decides questions of law, and the juries decide the fact.

26. By the Court, after having heard the Attorney General as to the punishment to be awarded, and the accused party or his counsel in mitigation.

27. The Court has power to adjourn or suspend proceedings, to allow fresh evidence to be heard either for the prosecution or for the defence, until the first jury is empannelled.

28. The general incidents have been detailed in the foregoing answers. The jurors of the first and also of the second jury may be challenged for cause.

29. The Attorney General cannot appeal, if the accused party is acquitted by the first jury; but the prisoner may appeal to the second jury, or grande enquête.

30. The Viscount is the officer charged to carry the sentence of the Court into execution. In cases of capital punishment sufficient time is allowed the criminal to sue for mercy.

31. The clerk of the Court may furnish the Commission with the forms of proceedings. The oaths taken by witnesses, juries and members of the Court are contained in the Code of Laws printed in 1771.

32. The Bailiff, the Attorney General, the Viscount and the Solicitor General hold their offices by letters patent from the Crown. The jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers of the island. The constables and centeniers are elected for three years by the electors of the several parishes; and the police officers are chosen by the parish assemblies. The constables, centeniers and police officers are removable by the Court; the other functionaries by Her Majesty in Council.

33 and 34. The punishments to be awarded are in most cases left to the discretion of the Court, who is ruled by precedents and a few penal enactments. The punishments do not exceed in severity those awarded by the English laws; and generally criminals are treated with much more leniency: but more precise enactments would be required. It is generally admitted that the police ought not to be on the first jury. The second jury, or grande enquête, is, on the other hand, entirely chosen by the Attorney General for each case. Some better mode ought to be devised. The revision of the criminal law has been for some time before the States; and the question is now in discussion before a Committee of that body.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Joint Answers of Her Majesty's Procureur Général and Avocat Général, in the Island of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

Procureur Général, and Avocat Général. 8 August, 1846.

1. The Attorney General practised as one of the Advocates in the Royal Court, from 1812 to 1823, and from this last date has held his present office.

The Advocate General practised as one of the Advocates of the Royal Court, from the year 1815 to 1823, and since this latter period has held his present office.

2. The only tribunal exercising criminal jurisdiction in the island of Jersey is the Royal Court, composed of the bailly, as presiding judge, and twelve assessors termed jurats; Her Majesty's Attorney and Advocate General; a greffier, or clerk of Court; the vicomte, and two denunciators, executive officers, and six advocates.

The jurisdiction of the Royal Court was established, in its present form, by certain constitutions granted by King John, when the islanders, retaining their allegiance to that sovereign, separated from continental Normandy.

The authority conceded to the bailly and jurats by these constitutions has been recognised and confirmed by charters emanating from almost every sovereign who has sat on the English throne, and more particularly and amply by Queen Elizabeth, and Charles I. and II.

The jurisdiction of the Royal Court extends over every species of criminal offence, with the exception of those specially reserved in the constitutions of King John, namely, high treason, and laying violent hands on the king's ministers in the execution of their office.

3. As there is no statute law in the island of Jersey for the classification or punishment of crimes (with the exception of two Orders in Council concerning manslaughter, and an Order in Council concerning sodomy and bestiality), the authority principally relied on in the discussion of questions arising upon the criminal law is the ancient custom of Normandy, the undoubted groundwork of our criminal procedure, and precedents contained in the records of the Royal Court; and frequently, when questions arise involving considerable doubt or difficulty, recourse is had to the principles of English law.

4. There are various modes of bringing to justice a party suspected of having committed an offence.

1. The Attorney General may proceed by representation made publicly to the Royal Court, in the nature of an ex officio information, stating the nature of the offence imputed to the party; upon which the Court order the arrest of the party charged, or that he be peremptorily summoned to appear and answer the suit. This proceeding is used in cases of high misdemeanour, such as libel or slander against the constituted authorities, abuse of trust in public officers, and the like.

2. In offences against the person or property, such as assault and battery, larceny, burglary, &c., the party aggrieved prefers a verbal complaint to the constable or one of the centeniers (being the chief officers of police) of the parish wherein the offence has been committed. The party suspected or charged is apprehended by one of those officers; and, as soon as the capture is effected, the officer applies verbally to the bailly, or one of the jurats deputed by him to that effect, for authority to detain the offender in the common gaol until an opportunity offers to bring him before the Royal Court. This authority is granted on the simple statement of the police officer, without hearing any evidence in support of the charge.

3. In a case of homicide, if the perpetrator of the crime is known or suspected, he is apprehended and secured as above stated. An inquest is held on the body in the following manner. The bailly issues his mandate to the vicomte, directing him to summon twelve men, and in the presence of the Attorney General or Advocate General to view the body, and to take the report of the jury, upon oath, as to the cause of death. The vicomte selects twelve men to form the jury, and proceeds with one of the crown officers to the place where the corpse is laid. The jury is sworn to declare truly and faithfully, without hatred, favour or partiality, how the deceased came by his death. Witnesses are heard, but not upon oath; the Vicomte receives the verdict of the jury, writes it at the foot of the bailly's mandate, and on a future day returns it into Court, the jury being also present, and called at the bar. The bailly asks each juryman separately if he confirms his report. If they all do so, the verdict is recorded; if they alter or vary their first verdict, it is so stated in the record.

4. In offences of a more trivial nature, such as breaches of police regulations, &c., the constable reports the case to the Royal Court, and an order is made to summon the supposed delinquent to answer the charge.

5. In minor offences, such as breach of the peace or of police regulations, the Court disposes of the case summarily without the formality of a jury; the defendant pleads to the charge; and the Court orders, if necessary, witnesses to be summoned on a future day, when the matter is decided; in the mean time, if the party had originally been apprehended, he is allowed to put in bail, or in default of bail is remanded to prison.

6. In cases where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, the party charged is, as soon as it can conveniently be done, brought before the Court, composed of the bailly and two jurats, by the constable of the parish wherein the offence was committed. The constable hands to the Attorney General a detailed report of the circumstances under which the capture was effected; the Attorney General reads this document, in presence of the party charged, and exhibits an "accusation," or indictment granted on the constable's report; the prisoner puts in his plea of Guilty or Not guilty. If the former, the Court either proceed to give judgment, or, if it be a charge of felony, refer the case to the full Court, composed of the bailly and at least seven jurats. If the accused party pleads Not guilty, the Court authorize the Attorney General to produce evidence in the following form: "Il est permis au dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine d'informer." The party accused is then remanded to prison till such time as evidence can be procured, or enlarged upon bail if the offence is bailable. The accused party is then considered to be on his trial.

7. The subsequent proceedings take place partly before the same Court, namely the bailly and two jurats, and partly before the full Court, composed of the bailly and at least seven jurats. The evidence is heard before the bailly and two jurats, in presence of the accused party, and taken down in writing. When all the evidence, both against and for the accused, has been taken, a day is appointed for the trial of the cause. The Attorney General directs the same constable, who, in the first instance, exhibited the charge against the accused party, to bring twelve of his officers to form, with himself, the first or petty jury, for the trial of the prisoner, on the appointed day. The Court is then composed of the bailly and not less than seven jurats. The constable and his twelve officers are placed in the box: the accused party is allowed a challenge, but only on specific grounds: no oath is administered to the jury. The whole of the proceedings, including the different rules and orders of Court, and the whole of the evidence previously taken in writing, are read by the Attorney General to the jury; the counsel for the defence is heard, and the Attorney General in reply. The jury retire in custody of the vicomte, who takes with him, and lays before the jury, the indictment and the written depositions, in order that they may refer to them, if needful. When they have made up their mind, the vicomte brings them again into Court, and, if they are unanimous, the constable delivers the verdict; if they find the accused guilty, in these or similar terms: "L'accusé est plutôt coupable qu'innocent du crime mis à sa charge." If they find him innocent, the verdict is "plutôt innocent que coupable." If the jury is not unanimous, each juryman in rotation delivers his opinion secretly to the bailly and jurats; and the opinion of the majority is announced by the bailly as the verdict of the jury. If the prisoner is declared more innocent than guilty, he is forthwith discharged. If he is found more guilty than innocent, the Court declare him to be criminally indicted. The prisoner is then entitled to appeal to the Grande Enquête, or jury of twenty four; or he may waive his right, and submit to have judgment passed. If he submits, the sentence is immediately pronounced. If he appeals, he is remanded to prison until the Attorney General can call the grand inquest of the country, of which the accused has demanded the benefit.

Within two or three days, the Court meet, constituted as before, for the final trial of the case. Twenty-four men, selected by the Attorney General from amongst the most intelligent inhabitants of the parish wherein the crime has been committed, and the two adjoining parishes, eight from each, are summoned to serve as a jury, and also a few supplementary jurymen from each parish in case of challenges, sickness or absence of any of those who are intended to form the jury. The prisoner may challenge any of them, but, as in respect of the first jury, only on specific grounds. When the jury is complete, they are sworn "to declare well and faithfully what they shall find in their conscience relative to the crime of which the party is accused, namely, whether he is more guilty than innocent, to charge or discharge him, and that they will do so without favour or partiality, as they shall answer it before God." Precisely the same form is then gone through which had previously been observed in the first trial. On the return of the jury into Court, with the vicomte, if they are unanimous, the foreman delivers the verdict. If they differ, they each deliver their opinion to the bailly secretly; if twenty out of the twenty-four concur in finding the accused more guilty than innocent, he is declared by the bailly duly attainted and convicted of the crime or offence on which he had been criminally indicted, and sentence is immediately passed. If five or more out of the twenty-four concur in finding the party accused more innocent than guilty, he is forthwith discharged.

8. The proceedings are always instituted by the Attorney General on the part of the Crown, or, in his absence, by the Advocate General. The proceedings may be abandoned by the public prosecutor at any of their stages, when he finds that the evidence is not sufficient to support the charge. Such an abandonment has the effect of an acquittal.

9. The charge against the accused party is usually put in a definite form and in writing, when he is brought before the Court by the police. Sometimes, when the charge is complicated, or when further inquiry is necessary, the party accused is remanded for a limited period; but this is of rare occurrence, the Attorney General being generally prepared to file the indictment at the usual period. The accuser cannot vary or alter the form or substance of the charge when once it has been filed.

10. If the party charged admits the facts, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, his counsel may be heard in support of his plea, and the Attorney General in reply. If the Court decide in favour of the accused party, he is discharged; if against him, the case is proceeded with.

11. If the party simply denies the facts alleged against him, the Court order that witnesses shall be summoned.

12. The party confining himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges is not thereby concluded as to the facts.

13. Nor, if he confines himself to a denial of the facts, is he in a criminal prosecution, concluded as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of counsel and other legal advisers. He may have the assistance of more than one counsel; but only one can be heard in his defence. He may select his own counsel; and, if he does not, the bailly assigns him an advocate. This is always done, whether the party accused has or has not the means of defraying the expense of legal assistance.

15. When the Court have ordered that witnesses shall be summoned, or have authorized the Attorney General to produce evidence in support of the charge, the Attorney General causes summons to issue to those persons who are to be heard as witnesses. The summons are served by the vicomte or his deputy; and the party failing to appear to give his evidence is amerced in a small fine to the Queen, and is liable to pay certain expenses occasioned by his default; the Court order him to be seized and brought up by the officer on the day appointed for a further hearing of the case. The accused party gives the names of his witnesses to the Attorney General's agent; and they are likewise summoned at the suit of the Crown to give their evidence, and liable on default to the same penalty as the witnesses for the prosecution.

With respect to documentary evidence, there is no process established by law or practice to compel its production in criminal cases; nor are we aware that any decision has ever been given on the subject. In civil suits, if, on the examination of a witness, a document in his possession is brought in question, as necessary to be produced, the Court usually order it to be exhibited; and we presume that the same proceeding would be had recourse to, should the production of any document be found material in a criminal prosecution.

16. In criminal prosecutions, as soon as the party accused is put on his trial, a sufficient number of days are appointed to take the evidence in writing; and each day a sufficient number of witnesses are summoned to occupy the time of the Court. The evidence is taken before the bailly and two jurats; the witnesses produced are sworn to declare the whole truth without favour, hatred or partiality, as they will answer it to God at their peril. An attorney takes the evidence in writing, generally by questions and answers; each question and answer being read aloud by the attorney to the Court, as the evidence proceeds; when the deposition is finished, either altogether or for the day, it is signed by the witness.

17. The party accused is always present when evidence is taken against him. We know of no case where evidence was ever taken in his absence; nor would such evidence be received as part of the proceedings on the trial.

18. The party accused may produce evidence on any day appointed for taking evidence in his case; but usually the witnesses for the prosecution are first examined, and then the witnesses for the defence. Nevertheless, the accuser may recall witnesses to be further heard, and even hear fresh evidence after the witnesses for the defence have been heard; and the accused party may then, if he judges it material, call fresh evidence on his part.

19. The accused party can question the witnesses produced against him as soon as they have been examined in chief, and to the full extent prescribed by the rules of evidence. He may even have them recalled, and re-examine them at any time before trial.

20. The accuser cannot call fresh evidence after the day when the enditement or petty jury is called to try the accused. There are instances where the accused party has been allowed to call evidence in support of his defence before the Grande Enquête after he had been criminally indicted by the petty jury.

21. All the evidence is taken down in writing.

22. We have already described the mode in which the evidence is used at the trial. No proof is allowed, either against or on the behalf of the accused party, that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to; the accused party being always present with his counsel when the evidence is taken, and having the privilege of calling the attention of the Court to any error or omission in the evidence.

23. The counsel of the party charged may be heard on any question of fact or law; and, when a question has been decided against him by the inferior Court, he can have it re-heard before the full Court, and can subject the witnesses for the prosecution to as full a cross-examination as is consonant with the rules of evidence, and may examine and re-examine his own witnesses as fully as he judges it necessary for the due defence of his client.

24. The Attorney General is always heard last.

25. The bailly and jurats decide questions of law. The juries decide the fact.

26. Judgment is awarded by the Court, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the jurats present; if they should be equally divided in opinion, the bailly has the casting vote; otherwise, he has no voice in the matter.

27. The Court has the power of suspending its proceedings, but only on account of some legal impediment, such as the absence from the island of a material witness for the prosecution or the defence, or the absence or incapacity of counsel for the party accused, or where, on the representation of the accused party that a strong prejudice existed against him, a delay should be judged necessary to ensure a fair trial.

28 and 29. We presume that the information sought by these two questions may be gathered from the answers to those previously proposed.

30. When judgment is given against the accused party, it is carried into effect by the vicomte. If it be a sentence of imprisonment, the culprit is forthwith taken from the Court House to gaol. If it be transportation, he is remanded to prison until the Queen's pleasure as to the further disposal of his person is made known by her Order in Council. If it be a capital punishment, the time when it shall be carried into execution is not fixed by the Court; but usually the Court allow a sufficient delay to enable the culprit to sue the Crown for pardon, or for a mitigation of the penalty. The practice is to execute the judgment on the Saturday after the delay is expired.

31. The forms used at the various steps of the proceedings, and the oaths taken by the witnesses and the members of the Court, having been furnished to the Commissioners by the greffier of the Royal Court, it is needless to repeat them here.

32. The bailly is appointed by the Crown during pleasure. The twelve jurats are elected by the people; every person in the island assessed to the parish rate of taxes having a right to vote at their election. The Attorney General, Advocate General and Vicomte are appointed by the Crown for life. The greffier, the denunciators and the advocates are appointed by the bailly, also for life. The constables and centeniers are elected by the inhabitants of their respective parishes who are assessed to the rate, and hold their office for three years. The police officers who, with the constable and centeniers, are liable to serve on the petty jury, are:—

1. The vingteniers, who are elected by the vestry of their respective parishes; they remain in office three years.

2. The constables' officers, who are also elected by the vestries of their respective parishes, and hold their office four years in the parish of Saint Helier, and seven years in the eleven other parishes.

34. The imperfections of our present system may be classed under four heads:—

1. The want of a preliminary examination of a party suspected of an offence before he is committed and put upon his trial.

By the present mode of proceeding, as before stated, the party is charged upon the simple declaration of the party aggrieved; he is arrested by the police; he is not brought before any magistrate to answer the charge; but upon the showing of the police officer the magistrate gives an order for his detention until he can be brought before the Court. When there is no evidence heard to show that there are sufficient grounds to put him on his trial, the Attorney General, if the facts stated in the constable's report warrant an indictment, is bound to prosecute, and the Court to commit; and it happens sometimes that, after a detention of some weeks, when the witnesses for the prosecution are heard, they altogether fail in establishing the charge. Besides, the constable's report is all that the Attorney General has to guide him in framing his indictment; which not unfrequently leads to errors fatal to the case: a result which would always be avoided, if that officer had before him the evidence taken at the examination of the party charged.

The establishment of a police magistrate, before whom every person charged should be brought for examination before committal, would, in our opinion, be a very useful measure.

2. The manner in which evidence is heard in criminal cases is very unsatisfactory. It is taken before the bailly and two jurats, and written down. In cases of some magnitude this takes several days; and, the Royal Court being occupied with civil as well as criminal cases, it occasions considerable delays, and lengthens the imprisonment before trial. Moreover, as the juries do not hear the witnesses depose, and as the degree of credibility which a witness deserves can often be better estimated by the manner in which he delivers his evidence than by its import, they have no means of forming a correct opinion upon the subject. They must receive as evidence the words of the deposition as they appear in the written document which is read to them at the trial.

An alteration in that respect would, we think, be advisable.

3. Some change is required with respect to the enditement, or petty jury. It is at present composed of the constable and officers of police of the parish wherein the offence has been committed; and it does not seem altogether just that the persons who have been active in detecting the offender, in bringing him to justice, and in procuring evidence to convict him, should afterwards form the jury to try the case.

4. It would also be more convenient if criminal trials should take place at stated periods. Mixed up as they are with the civil causes, one set of cases must frequently interfere with the other; and this intermixture is the frequent cause of long delays in the administration of justice.

THOMAS LE BRETON, Procureur Général.
J. W. DUPRE', Avocat Général.

Jersey, 8th August, 1846.

---

John Hammond Esq. 20 July, 1846.

Answers of John Hammond, Esq., Senior Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. I was apppointed one of the Advocates of the Royal Court, by the late Bailly, Lord de Carteret, in the year 1821; and from that period to the present time have practised as a member of the bar.

2. The Royal Court of this island, "La justice Royale," is the tribunal possessing criminal jurisdiction in Jersey. The creation of the office of jurats (the magistrates who compose this Court) goes as far back as the reign of King John, as appears by the constitutions of that monarch. This Court takes cognizance of all crimes and misdemeanors that take place within the limits of its jurisdiction, save treason and cases styled in the constitutions above referred to "nimis ardui," which I take to mean such as may affect the superior members of the Court, or differences arising between the civil and military authorities of the island, which, from local circumstances, cannot competently be investigated by the island tribunal.

3. The authorities mainly relied upon for the elucidation of the principles of criminal jurisprudence, and also for the awarding and adjudicating of punishments, are the English law books; recourse is also had to the Norman commentators, and sometimes, but very rarely, to the Code Napoléon and French authors. Precedents from our own Court Rolls are also consulted.

4. The more usual mode of proceeding against a suspected offender is by the arrest of his person by the constable (after verbal information given him) of the parish wherein he resides, who, thereupon, obtains leave from the chief magistrate to place the prisoner provisionally in the custody of the gaolor of the island prison, until he is presented before the Court to answer to the charge brought against him by the public prosecutor, viz. the "Procureur Général."

5. The Court before whom the prisoner is brought in the first instance is composed of the bailly and two jurats, whose functions do not extend beyond their receiving the police officer's report, the "Procureur Général's" written accusation against the prisoner, and the prisoner's plea thereto. This Court also determines on the question of bail, if propounded.

If, however, the matter do not exceed a breach of the peace or a mere misdemeanor, and the prisoner admits the facts and submits to the Court, the Court proceeds forthwith to pass sentence. But, if the accusation is of a grave character, and the prisoner pleads Guilty, then the Court, on the motion of the prosecutor, remands the convict, in order that on a future day he may be brought up before the full Court, composed of the bailly and seven jurats (at least), to receive sentence.

6. The preliminary proceedings before an accused party is put upon his trial, and the steps taken to secure his appearance, are, as already stated:—1st. His arrest by the police officer; and, 2ndly, his temporary custody until presented before the Court. If, however, the matter is bailable, the officer, upon conferring with the Crown officer, may take bail for the prisoner's appearance in Court.

7. The accused party is tried before the Royal Court, as before stated.

8. The proceedings are invariably instituted at the suit of the Crown officer, the "Procureur Général;" he alone can stay or abandon proceedings. After such an abandonment, duly recorded, no future similar accusation can be brought against the party thus released from a former prosecution.

9. On the first appearance of the prisoner at the bar of the tribunal, the public prosecutor, after entering the report of the police officer, presents a written accusation against the prisoner, who usually pleads forthwith thereto: but, when the case requires it, the prisoner may ask for, and almost invariably obtains, a delay to consider the accusation before recording his plea. I know of no instance where the accuser has been allowed to alter his first accusation; he might in diminution, but certainly not in aggravation, of the accusation. The party accused, on the other hand, may from time to time alter or vary his plea, which is, at every sitting of the Court to hear his case, taken down in writing.

10. In this case the matter would not go to a jury, but the question of law would be submitted to the decision of the bench.

11. When the party pleads "Not guilty," the Court issues an order empowering the prosecutor to inform against the prisoner, that is to bring evidence in support of the accusation; and the prisoner may also bring witnesses on his behalf.

12. If the accused party pleads to the relevancy of the charges, it is only in the nature of a preliminary or interlocutory plea, which in nowise precludes his pleading afterwards as to the facts alleged against him.

13. The denial of the facts by the prisoner does not debar a subsequent plea as to their relevancy.

14. The accused party is entitled to legal advice and assistance. He may have more than one advocate; but only one can speak on his behalf. He may select his counsel, whether he have or have not the means of defraying the expense of legal assistance.

15. Both parties have the power of producing evidence at any stage of the proceedings prior to the empannelling of the "enditement," or first jury; and even there are cases when evidence has been received after the verdict of the "enditement." The mode of compelling witnesses to appear is similar to that practised in civil cases, namely by a summons served by the proper officer, and, in case of default, by amercement and arrest of the person of the witness.

16. Evidence is first received after the Court has granted an order empowering the prosecutor to inform against the accused. The evidence is taken in writing before the inferior Court, that is the Court composed of the bailly and two jurats.

17. The prisoner must be present at the hearing and taking down of the evidence.

18. When the witnesses produced by the prosecutor (in criminal causes they are called "informateurs") have been heard, and their evidence taken down, the accused party may proceed to hear his witnesses, styled "témoins à décharge," whose evidence is also taken down in writing.

19. The party accused has the full benefit of cross-examining the witness for the prosecution.

20. Ordinarily the evidence is closed when the cause is ripe for hearing before the first jury the "enditement." But there are instances, as before stated, when fresh evidence has been received before the jury of appeal, the "Grande Enquête."

21. As before observed, the whole of the evidence is taken down in writing.

22. The first jury being empannelled, the evidence collected against and on behalf of the prisoner is read aloud by the Crown officer or officers: if any of the members of the jury require it, such part of the evidence as is in English is translated and explained by the prosecutor. As the whole of the evidence is given in presence of the prisoner, I conceive that proof affecting the correctness of the written evidence would not be allowed, because the prisoner, whilst the evidence is being written down, can state his objections, if he deem it inaccurately recorded, and the Court will always hear him on such or similar objections, and, if his objection be valid, it will be received and acted upon at the time by the Court.

23. The counsel for the defence may propound any questions of fact or law, in the order he deems most advantageous to the prisoner, and has full power to examine the witnesses.

24. The prosecutor is heard last.

Answers to Questions,

SERIES I.

John Hammond, Esq.
20 July, 1846.

25. The Court, that is the bailly and jurats, are the judges of the law. The "enditement" and "grand enquête" pronounce respecting the facts.

26. The judgment (after the verdict of the jury is given) is awarded by the bailly and jurats.

27. By what has been already stated, it will be seen that several days are occupied in criminal prosecutions, during which there are intervals of time of greater or less duration, subordinated by the circumstances of the case. But, when the jury is empannelled, no adjournment or suspension takes place.

28. At the risk of repetition, I may state as briefly as possible the mode of accusation and trial. The party charged having been informed against to the constable or centenier of the parish where the alleged offence has been committed (the complaint addressed to the constable is a mere verbal one, and not on oath), the police officer proceeds in search of the supposed delinquent; and, if he find him within the limits of his parish, he seizes and searches him forthwith, and, according to the nature of the offence, makes or orders a search in the prisoner's lodgings, or other places, for such articles, weapons or other effects as may lead to the detection of the offender, or tend to throw light on the further investigation of the matter. He then applies to the chief magistrate for power to place the prisoner in the custody of the keeper of the prison. He then prepares a written report of all the facts and circumstances of the case, and delivers it to the "Procureur Général" (the Attorney General). The prisoner is brought up at the first sitting of the Court after his apprehension. The constable then, through the "Procureur Général," presents the prisoner before the Court, together with his written report, and all articles, weapons or other effects seized and secured by the police; which articles or weapons are deposited in Court, and there remain in the custody of the Court till the end of the trial. The "Procureur" then files an accusation against the accused. The accused, before pleading, selects his counsel (if the matter is of great importance he usually sends for an advocate to consult with him before being presented in Court), and then pleads to the accusation, which plea is duly recorded by the clerk of the Court. If the plea is "Not guilty," the prosecutor is allowed to bring evidence in support of the charge; and, if it is not a bailable offence, the accused is then sent to prison, "est constitué prisonnier"—is constituted a prisoner. At a subsequent sitting, the "informateurs," or witnesses for the Crown, are summoned, and their evidence taken down in writing by the "écrivains," or attorneys, who are specially convened by the chief magistrate for that purpose. The prisoner is present at every stage of the trial, and is sent back to prison at the close of each day's proceedings. (I may here remark that, if one or more of the witnesses (either for or against the prisoner) are on the eve of departure from the island, and cannot therefore be heard before the Court, or incapacitated, through illness, from appearing, an order is obtained from the Court to have their evidence taken before the "vicomte" (or sheriff). If there be many witnesses in a criminal trial, four or five, or even more, days may be taken up in receiving the evidence. When the evidence is closed, a day is appointed for bringing on the trial before the first jury, the "enditement." This jury is composed of thirteen (13) members of the police of the parish where the offence has been committed: formerly the rule was to empannel the members of the police of the parish where the prisoner resided; but the practice that obtains now is preferable; as, if there were several prisoners, of different parishes, under one accusation, it might be difficult to determine how to form the jury. The constable, if not a witness, is foreman of the jury. The prisoner may challenge one or more members of the jury, but for cause only (the validity of which is decided by the Court). The proceedings must take place before a full Court; that is the bailly and seven jurats at least. The accusation is then read to the prisoner, and his plea is again recorded; if still a plea of "Not guilty," the prosecutor proceeds to read the report, the accusation, the depositions, and all documents having relation to the trial; after which, the prisoner's counsel addresses the "enditement;" the prosecutor is then heard in support of the accusation. The bailly, the president of the Court, may sum up; and then the "enditement" retire in charge of the "vicomte," or sheriff. The whole of the documents are placed in the "vicomte's" hands, for the further consideration of the members of the "enditement," if they require it; and also the articles, weapons or other effects deposited in Court may be sent up for their inspection. On their return into Court, the foreman, if the members of the jury are all agreed, declares the verdict. If the jury is not unanimous, the members go up one by one to the bailly, and deliver their opinion separately; but so as only to be heard by the bailly and the jurats collected around him. The prisoner is either acquitted or convicted by the majority of the "enditement." The president of the Court declares the result of the scrutiny; if favourable to the prisoner, he is immediately discharged; if against him, he may either submit to the verdict—in which case the "Procureur" proposes the nature and amount of punishment to be awarded. The prisoner, before the Court pronounces, is heard by counsel in mitigation, after which the Court passes sentence—or,

29. The prisoner may appeal to another jury, the "Grande Enquête," a privilege he has a right to claim as a matter of course. Whereupon he is remanded to prison (formerly in irons, but now this is dispensed with) until the "Grande Enquête" be convened. On the day appointed, the full Court again assembles, and the members of the "Grande Enquête" are called, and the jury constituted. It consists of twenty-four (24) members, chosen from the parish where the offence has been committed (formerly, from the parish where the prisoner resided) and the two adjoining parishes, eight from each parish, men of the highest standing in their respective parishes. If the prisoner has no challenge to offer, or when such as he may have presented (which must, like the preceding, be for cause) are disposed of, the members of the "Grande Enquête" are sworn in by the president of the Court. The members of this jury are chosen by the "Procureur," and are not summoned until the evening preceding the day of trial. The same mode and order of proceeding take place as before the "enditement;" but twenty of the members of the jury at least must concur to convict the prisoner. The "Procureur" has no power to appeal in criminal cases.

30. When the prisoner is convicted, the Court, on the motion of the prosecutor, decrees the punishment to be inflicted, and the "vicomte" (the sheriff) is charged to see it duly put into execution; the order of the Court being his warrant or authority to carry the same into effect.

pay rate; they hold their office for life. The constables and centeniers are elected by the suffrages of their rated parishioners, and hold their office for three years; they are eligible for re-election. The police officers are appointed by the parish vestries, and hold their office for seven years, except in the parish of St. Hélier, where the period is restricted to four years.

33. It does not occur to me that any thing further of any importance relating to our Criminal Law and procedure requires to be noticed.

34. In answer to this question, I respectfully suggest what appears to me to be defective in our present system.

1. The want of a preliminary investigation before putting a prisoner on his trial.
2. The very deficient mode of obtaining evidence, and imparting it to a jury.
3. The uselessness, inconvenience and impropriety of two recorded verdicts in the same case.
4. The objectionable mode of selecting the members of the "Grande Enquête," the prosecutor being the party who possesses that power.
5. The disadvantage to the defence arising from the prisoner's counsel being precluded the privilege of replying to the Procureur's speech.

These disadvantages might, I think, without much difficulty be remedied. The more difficult question I conceive to be respecting the manner of carrying on a preliminary inquiry before putting the prisoner on his trial. This, I think, might be done by substituting to the "enditement" another jury, which might be styled a Jury d'Examen, composed of members chosen from among the most influential members of the community throughout the island, whose functions would be very similar to those of the grand jury in England, and might be composed of the same number of persons. Their duty would be to examine witnesses in presence of the prisoner, both in support of the charge and on behalf of the accused, for the sole object of deciding for or against a prosecution: no pleadings would take place before this jury. The majority of votes would form the opinion of the jury, which opinion would be simply endorsed on the constable's report or the "Procureur's" accusation. The jury might be intrusted with the choice of their chairman; and the documents and witnesses in support of the charge might be presented to the jury by the "Vicomte." It is respectfully submitted that a jury thus constituted would combine the advantage, not only of the grand jury, but of the examining magistrate, as the prisoner would be present and his witnesses might be heard. The proceeding would not, in most cases, be unnecessarily long, because, on hearing two or more credible witnesses in support of the charge, whose testimony as far as it went was conclusive, the jury might stop further inquiry, and order the matter to be sent forthwith to trial and make their endorsement accordingly. On the other hand, if there was not sufficient ground for a prosecution, it would be of incalculable benefit to prevent a prosecution before any recorded proceedings be for ever inscribed in the Criminal Rolls. This jury might, moreover (being composed of the first people of the community, their qualification depending on a high rate), have extended powers, such as the right of investigating and making presentments respecting the public establishments of the island, the prison, the hospital, &c.; and, from being chosen from the 12 parishes, men who at present are only in the habit of transacting parochial affairs, which tend to engender a certain party and narrow spirit, would have to cooperate with those of distant parishes; and thus petty differences of interest and influence would be merged in a more general and more extended sphere of action.

Efficiently to carry out the foregoing suggestion, it would be indispensable to appoint regular assizes, or stated and fixed periods for holding the Criminal Court. Indeed, under any circumstances, I consider that it would be fitting that stated and fixed periods be set apart for the administration of criminal justice, for the due consideration of such grave and important matters which, properly to be discussed and decided, require to be attended with that solemnity which the nature of such proceedings demands. Assuming, then, that assizes were established, I consider that a jury d'examen ought to assemble on the first day, and proceed immediately to the duties assigned to it; and then those prisoners left for trial by its decision would be proceeded against forthwith at the suit of the "Procureur" before the "Grande Enquête," instructed by vivâ voce evidence, thus dispensing altogether with the "Enditement" or jury of 13. Indeed, I think it could be traced that in the origin the jury composed of the police officers was merely jury d'examen, having only to determine if the party charged was to be indicted, endité. But, now that it is to all intents and purposes a jury returning a verdict on the facts of the case, whose judgment remains for ever recorded, this proceeding is fraught with many serious evils; it places the two juries in an invidious position each to the other, and gives rise to this anomaly, that, whereas if six members of a jury declare a man "Not guilty" he is condemned, whilst if subsequently five members only of another jury declare him "Not guilty" he is acquitted, and when the facts of the case and all the attendant contingencies are precisely similar, and presented to the jurymen of both juries in precisely the same state. Moreover, a great evil, and indeed a manifest injustice, arises from recording two opposite verdicts in the Rolls of the Court. To contemporaries it is comparatively of little moment, as they may be acquainted with all the facts of the case; but in a small community, like our's, it is an evil to leave on record, to be seen by after generations, decisions which are virtually set aside and expunged.

The objection to this proposed change may be its too great complication, and, so to speak, its excess of machinery. If this objection was deemed insuperable, then I consider that a previous examination before a magistrate, as practised in England, is indispensable. This, efficiently carried out, might perhaps supersede the necessity of the first jury; though I think both these changes would be productive of much good.

I have said that a second defect arises from the mode of taking the evidence in criminal cases. The disadvantage of this mode of proceeding is, I believe, very generally recognised and acknowledged. It is true that it affords to the defence the advantage of knowing most, if not all, the evidence adduced in support of the accusation before bringing forward any témoin à décharge; but I do not consider this sufficient to countervail the injury to the ends of justice consequent upon this manner of obtaining a knowledge of facts that are to guide a jury, whose members have not even the advantage of seeing one of the witnesses, and therefore are prevented from suggesting questions, the answers to which might be of such material assistance to them.

John Hammond, Esq. 20 July, 1846.

I have already alluded to the uselessness, inconvenience and impropriety of two recorded verdicts, and therefore deem the suppression of the enditement, or first jury, composed of the police officers, as essential to the better administration of our criminal proceedings. I consider the grande enquête as fully adequate, and in every way properly composed, rightly to fulfil the duties devolving upon this jury. Perhaps, instead of limiting the choice of its members to three parishes, it might be useful to extend it to the principal inhabitants of the island generally, who might be chosen by lot, or by the "vicomte" (sheriff), to serve when a grande enquête was required. This would also obviate the invidious, and, I think, objectionable, duty imposed upon the prosecutor. I speak merely of the theory of this part of our proceedings: for during the whole course of my practice I can testify that this duty (the selection of the members of the grande enquête) has always been performed with the utmost care and impartiality. I would also suggest that, as the proceedings of our juries are secret, and their votes (when not unanimous) given secretly, the members ought to be bound to secrecy by their oath, both as to their own vote and the votes of their fellows.

Another irregularity I have pointed out is respecting the order of the speeches of counsel; this, I believe, is admitted to be a defect, as well by the Crown officers as by the members of the bar. It is, however, I conceive, a matter of minor importance.

Answers of Francis J. Le Couteur, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

Francis Le Couteur, Esq.

1. I am an advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey.

2. The Royal Court alone. Its jurisdiction originated under the early Dukes of Normandy: but the first charter confirming its authority was granted by King John. Its jurisdiction extends over all crimes and offences; high treason, and laying violent hands upon the bailiff and jurats, excepted.

3. Chiefly Blackstone, &c., and the old Norman authors.

4. If the offence be serious, the party is put in custody, with the sanction of the bailiff or one of the jurats: then a report is presented to the Court by the constable (or mayor) of the parish, and the Attorney General is allowed to prosecute.

5. The Court exercises a summary jurisdiction over all minor offences.

6. See answer 4th.

7. Before the Royal Court, composed of the bailiff and jurats.

8. By the Attorney General. This functionary has alone the power of causing proceedings to be abandoned. Having once abandoned the prosecution, he could scarcely again institute criminal proceedings against the same party for the same offence.

9. At the first stage; and the written act of accusation cannot be altered.

10, 11, 12, 13. The form of proceeding is the same.

14. Yes. One or more, at his option. By himself. An advocate cannot refuse his gratuitous assistance.

15. Witnesses subpœnaed are obliged to appear. After the act of accusation has been read, a day is appointed for hearing them.

16. As soon as possible, evidence is taken in Court before the bailiff and two jurats.

17. The prisoner is always present.

18. After the Attorney General has produced all his evidence.

19. The cross-examination takes place, and to a great extent, after the Crown lawyer has finished.

20. The hearing of evidence closes immediately before the pleadings commence, so that fresh evidence could scarcely be produced after the pleadings.

21. All evidence is taken down in writing.

22. It is read to the jury by the Attorney General. When the evidence is taken down, the accused is free to object to any part of it, but not afterwards.

23. The greatest possible latitude is given to counsel.

24. The public prosecutor has the privilege of being heard last.

25. The jurats decide the law, and the jury the fact.

26. By a majority of the jurats.

27. The Court has the power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings, like any other Court.

28. The incidents to accusation and trial have been mentioned in the preceding answers.

29. The accused may appeal from the petty to the grand jury: he may also appeal from this last, in cases of murder, to the mercy of the Crown.

30. The viscount is charged to see sentence carried into effect.

31. The forms used at the various steps of the proceedings which are the subject of the preceding questions have been answered in the preceding answers. The oath is administered to witnesses, by the clerk of the Court, in these terms:—

> "You swear and promise that you will declare the truth, and nothing but the truth, in the action of Her Majesty's Attorney General and the prisoner, which you will do without favour, hatred or partiality, as you shall answer to Almighty God."

The members of the Court do not take oath, except when sworn into office.

32. The jurats are elected by the people. The Bailiff, Attorney General, Viscount and Solicitor General are appointed by the Crown, and hold office during pleasure. They are amenable to the Queen in council.

No. 15.

Francis Godfray, Esq.

Answers of Francis Godfray, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. I have practised as an advocate of the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey upwards of sixteen years.

2. The Royal Court of the island is the only tribunal that exercises criminal jurisdiction in the island; and its jurisdiction extends to all offences and crimes, with the exception of high treason.

After King John had lost the whole of the Duchy of Normandy, which was annexed to the French Crown, except the Channel Islands, which remained under his dominion, he gave a charter to the inhabitants of the Island of Jersey, granting or confirming to them certain privileges; the present constitution of the Royal Court, and its jurisdiction, are established by that charter.

The Royal Court consists of the bailly and twelve assessors, called jurés justiciers, or jurats. The bailly and two jurats form the inferior number in all criminal proceedings; to constitute a full Court, the bailly and seven jurats, at least, are required.

3. The criminal law of the Island is composed of the laws of the Duchy of Normandy, as they stood before the separation of the island; the common law, as it is established by precedents of the Royal Court; acts of the States confirmed by orders of the Sovereign in Council; orders of the Sovereign in Council; and a few Acts of Parliament, in which the island is specially mentioned.

The cruelty and severity of the old Norman laws have, however, been mitigated by the decisions of the Royal Court to meet the exigencies of the times.

The old laws of the Duchy of Normandy are set forth in the Grand Coustumier, and commented by Rouillé, Terrien and Houard; as no modern writer has written a commentary on those laws, no authority can be principally relied on before the Royal Court.

4. It is the duty of the connétable of the parish, who is ex officio a member of the States, and of the centeniers, the subordinate officers immediately under him, where an offence or crime is supposed to have been committed, to institute an inquiry; and, if, from the informations he receives, he sees sufficient grounds for a public accusation, he arrests the person suspected of being the offender; and, according to the nature of the offence, he either takes bail of his appearance before the Royal Court on a fixed day, or he states the case to the bailly, or to one of the jurats of the Royal Court, who, if he deems it expedient, gives him a written authority to commit provisionally the party charged to the custody of the keeper of the public prison; and, the next Court day or as soon as possible after, the connétable presents the party charged before the Royal Court, with a written report stating what has taken place and the material parts of the information he has received. This report is read to the Court by Her Majesty's Attorney General. It is the duty of the Attorney General to see that all offenders are brought before the Royal Court, and that no crime or great offence goes unpunished; he is ex officio the only prosecutor of crimes and misdemeanors in the island.

If the connétable, or centenier, does not consider that the nature of the offence or the circumstances of the case are sufficient to authorize the arrest of the accused party, he sometime enters a report of the case before the Royal Court.

The Court, after hearing the Attorney General, either orders that the accused party shall be arrested by one of the officers of the Court, or that he will be summoned to appear.

5 and 6. When the accused party is brought by the connétable before the Royal Court, composed of the bailly and two jurats, if the offence charged cannot subject the accused party to corporal punishment, the Attorney General reads the report of the connétable; and, if the accused party admits the facts, the Court gives judgment immediately; if the accused party denies the facts, the Court orders that witnesses shall be heard on a subsequent day; and the accused party is generally admitted to bail. Evidence is heard vivâ voce on a future day; and the Court, composed of the bailly and two jurats, decides the matter, and gives judgment.

If the offence charged is of a nature to subject the offender to corporal punishment, and which is to be tried by a jury, the Attorney General reads the report of the connétable, and forms a written accusation against the prisoner, setting forth clearly the nature of the offence with which he is charged.

If the accused party pleads Not guilty, the Attorney General is allowed to call evidence, and the Court, according to the nature of the offence or the circumstances of the case, either remands the prisoner to jail, or admits him to give security of his re-appearance.

If the prisoner pleads Guilty, and the offence is not of a very serious nature, the Court exercises summary jurisdiction, and gives judgment immediately; otherwise the report is entered, the accusation lodged au greffe, the plea of the prisoner is recorded in an act of the Court, and the matter is referred to the full Court, composed of the bailly and of seven jurats at least. The prisoner is brought on a subsequent day before the full Court; that gives judgment, after hearing the prisoner, by the means of an advocate, and the Attorney General in reply.

When the accused party has pleaded Not guilty, he is brought on a subsequent day before the Court, composed of the bailly and two jurats, in order that the witnesses, both for the prosecution and the prisoner, may be heard, and their evidence taken down in writing: when all the witnesses have been heard, the case is sent before a jury, called enditement, which is composed of the connétable of the parish where the offence has been committed, and twelve of his officers; the report, accusation and evidence is read to the jury by the Attorney General. An advocate is heard in favour of the prisoner, and the Attorney General in support of the accusation; the jury withdraws, and returns a verdict of Guilty, or Not guilty; if they disagree, the opinion of the majority forms the verdict.

If the accused party is found Not guilty, he is immediately discharged from the accusation: if found Guilty, he may acquiesce in the verdict, or he may appeal to a grande enquête, which is a jury, composed of twenty four persons selected by the Attorney General from the principal inhabitants of three parishes; eight from that in which the prisoner resides, and eight from each of two neighbouring parishes, when they are empannelled as a jury that are sworn to give a fair and impartial verdict: the same forms are gone through as before the enditement; and twenty must agree to find a verdict of Guilty, five being sufficient to acquit the accused.

The law does not allow a jury to proceed, except before the full Court; that is, as has been already stated, the bailly and seven jurats.

When the prisoner is found Guilty by the enditement and does not appeal to a grande enquête, and when he is declared Guilty by the grande enquête, the advocate of the prisoner is heard in mitigation of the punishment, and the Attorney General gives his conclusions, and the Court delivers judgment.

The connétable, or other officers who have arrested the prisoner, or taken part in the proceedings, cannot form part of the enditement.

7. The Royal Court is the only tribunal that can take cognizance of offences; I have been stating, in the preceding answer, how it is constituted. Whatever decisions the bailly or jurats may have given at any stages of the proceedings do not incapacitate them from acting as members of the Court at any future stages.

8. The proceedings against an accused party are always instituted by the Attorney General, or, in his absence, by Her Majesty's Solicitor General, who acts ex officio as Attorney General. The Attorney General may abandon the proceedings at any stages; such an abandonment has the same effect as an acquittal.

9. The charge against the accused party is put in a written and definite form by the Attorney General when he is brought for the first time before the Royal Court. The form or substance of the charge, cannot be varied.

10. If the accused party admits the facts, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, his advocate is heard in support of his plea, and the Attorney General has the reply, and the Court decides the question.

11. If the party charged denies the facts, the Attorney General is allowed to call witnesses to prove the facts alleged, and the prisoner may call witnesses to prove his plea, and rebut the evidence for the prosecution.

12. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, he is not thereby concluded as to facts.

13. If the party charged confines himself to the denial of the facts, he is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of an advocate; he may retain several; but only one is allowed to address the Court or jury. He selects his counsel. When the party is unable to defray the expenses the advocate acts gratuitously. If the party charged does not select an advocate, the Court assigns him one to watch the proceedings in his behalf.

15. When a witness is summoned to appear before the Court, and neglects to do so, the Court orders him to be arrested and brought before the Court on a subsequent day; and he pays the expenses incurred by his absence. When a witness is ill, or about to leave the island, the Court authorizes the vicomte to take his evidence, which always takes place in presence of the Attorney General, the party charged and his advocate.

16. It has already been stated, when evidence is first received, it is taken in presence of the Court, the Attorney General, the party charged, and his advocate; and, if the case is to be tried by a jury, it is taken down, in writing, by an attorney of the Royal Court.

17. No evidence is taken, except in the presence of the accused.

18. As soon as the witnesses for the prosecution have been heard, or even before, if the party charged requires it, and that the witness is ill, or about to leave the island.

19. The party accused is allowed to question and cross-examine a witness brought against him when he has answered the questions put to him by the Attorney General or the Court.

20. Evidence may be heard for or against the party accused till he is tried by the enditement; and sometimes the prisoner has been allowed to produce witnesses between the enditement and the trial by the grande enquête.

21. All the evidence received is put down in writing.

22. The evidence taken down in writing is read to the enditement and the grande enquête.

Answers to Questions.
SERIES I.
Francis Godfray, Esq.

No party is allowed to give proof that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to. That is impossible, as the evidence is taken down in presence of the Court and all the parties. The question is put, written by the attorney, read aloud to the witness, who answers vivâ voce; his answer is immediately taken down and read; it is competent to either party to cause any error to be immediately corrected; when the whole evidence is taken down, it is signed by the witness, and lodged au greffe, and forms part of the records of the Court.

23. The advocate of the party charged has a right to be heard on all questions of fact, or of law, and on all incidents which may arise in the questioning of witnesses.

24. The Attorney General has the privilege of being heard last.

25. The Royal Court decides questions of law and fact in all cases, except those that are to be tried by a jury, in which cases questions of law are decided by the Court.

26. By the Royal Court.

27. The Royal Court has the power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings at any stage, for any cause which the Court judges sufficient, such as the absence or illness of some material witness.

28. I consider that the incidents to accusation and trial have been sufficiently detailed.

29. If the party charged is tried by a jury when the enditement is called, which is always before a full Court, the Attorney General or the accused party may obtain the decision of the full Court on any plea or objection that has been at any stage of the proceedings overruled by the inferior number of the Court.

30. When judgment is finally given against an accused party, and he is condemned to imprisonment or corporal punishment, the vicomte is ordered to see the sentence carried into execution; if the accused party is condemned to pay a fine awarded to Her Majesty, an officer, called prévôt, levies the fine.

31. The forms used at the various steps of the proceedings will, no doubt, be furnished to the Commissioners by the Attorney General and the greffier of the Royal Court, as well as a copy of the oaths taken by the witnesses and members of the Court respectively: the oaths of all the members of the Court and witnesses are contained in the Code of Laws of 1771.

32. The bailly is appointed by the Crown; the 12 jurés justiciers or jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers throughout the island. The connétable and centeniers, his immediate subordinate officers, the oldest of whom replaces him officially, when out of the island or incapacitated through illness or some other cause from performing the duties of his office, are elected by the rate-payers of their respective parishes. The vingteniers and officiers du connétable are elected by the parish assembly, composed of those persons who pay a certain rate, and the connétable and his officers. The vingteniers are elected for three years, and the officiers du connétable in the country parishes remain in office seven years; those in the parish of St. Hélier only four years.

33. I think the preceding answers are sufficient.

I am not ready to point out the defects and suggest the improvements in the present system: and, I think, this cannot be done with advantage before all the questions have been sent by the Commissioners and the various answers obtained.

FRANCIS GODFRAY.

No. 16.

Peter Le Sueur, Esq.

Answers of Peter Le Sueur, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the First Series of Questions.

1. I am an advocate of the Royal Court, and have practised since 1838. I have filled the office of chief constable of St. Helier since 1839, having been re-elected in 1842 and 1845.

2. The Royal Court. Its jurisdiction has originated in a charter of King John, confirmed by several successive sovereigns; and it extends over offences of every description, high treason and laying violent hands on the Queen's officers excepted.

3. Precedents of the Royal Court, and, for the general principles of criminal law, Blackstone and Russell.

4. The information is generally given to the constable of the parish, or to one of the centeniers. If the offence is such as to warrant the seizure of the person, the constable or the centenier, after having investigated the circumstances of the case and ascertained what evidence may be brought forward, proceeds to arrest the suspected party, and then applies to the chief magistrate, or other magistrate authorised by him, who gives an order to sanction the imprisonment, or directs that the party be admitted to bail, or liberated, as the case may be. In cases admitting of doubt, the Crown officers are generally consulted before the party is arrested.

The viscount and the two dénonciateurs of the Royal Court have also occasionally arrested persons for criminal offences.

When the offence is not such as to warrant the arrest of the person, a report is presented to the Court, through the Attorney General, by the constable of the parish where the offence has been committed; and the Court, on the conclusion of the Attorney General, orders the suspected party to be summoned or arrested, as the case may be.

The Attorney General may also ex officio lay an information before the Court, when an order is made for the delinquent to be arrested or served with a summons to appear.

5. Misdemeanors are tried by the Royal Court without the intervention of a jury; but the distinction between offences that are to be tried by a jury and those that may be disposed of by the Court is not very clearly established.

No other Court or officers exercises a summary jurisdiction.

6. The suspected party, whether he has been admitted to bail or put in jail, is brought before the Court on an early day; and the report of the police, stating all the material facts of the case, is read by the Attorney General, with whom it has been previously left for his consideration. The Attorney General also reads the indictment or accusation which he has prepared; and the prisoner is called upon, after he has chosen a counsel, or a counsel has been appointed to him by the Court, to present his defence. He may ask time to consider the indictment, or plead Guilty or Not guilty. In the latter case, the Attorney General is empowered to summon witnesses or informateurs to appear on a future day; and, in the mean time, the prisoner is sent back to jail, or admitted to bail, if the offence is bailable.

7. Before the Royal Court. The evidence is taken down in writing before the bailiff and two jurats; but the juries are empannelled, and the trial proceeds, before the full Court, composed of the bailiff and seven jurats.

No party can be put on his trial but by a judgment or order of the Court.

8. By the Attorney General. The Attorney General, with the sanction of the Court, may, at any stage of the proceedings before the jury is empannelled, abandon the accusation, if the evidence is clearly insufficient to support the accusation. It is tantamount to an acquittal, unless some important proof of the guilt of the party is afterwards discovered.

9. When the party is first brought before the Court, on his being presented, the Attorney General reads the indictment, or accusation: after the party has put in his plea, it cannot generally be varied, as it is embodied in the Act of the Court. But, in a few cases, the Attorney General has been allowed to correct some errors in the accusation, when discovered before the accused party had left the Court.

In such cases the accused party may, of course, alter his defence.

10. The question is argued before the Royal Court.

11. The Court orders witnesses to be heard on a future day.

12. He is not concluded as to the facts.

13. No.

14. Yes: he is entitled in all cases to the assistance of a counsel. When the accused party does not select counsel, one is appointed to him by the Court. Only one counsel can be heard in defence of the prisoner; but he may retain more. The advocates always act gratuitously when the accused is without means.

15. The accusing and accused party may have the required witnesses summoned. If they are in the island, the Court has full power to compel their attendance, and obtain any documentary evidence.

16. After the accusation has been read in Court by the Attorney General, an order is then made, authorizing the Attorney General to call witnesses on a future day. The evidence is taken down in writing in the presence of the prisoner and counsel, generally before the Court, composed of the bailiff and two jurats, and in some cases before the viscount or his deputy, when a witness is unable to attend Court through sickness, or is about to leave the island.

17. No witness is heard in his absence.

18. Immediately after the evidence for the prosecution has been heard, or even before, with the consent of the Court.

19. The party accused is allowed fully to cross-examine witnesses produced against him.

20. No fresh evidence for the prosecution can be produced after the jury is empannelled. But in a few cases the Court has allowed fresh evidence to be called in by the accused party, after the verdict of the first jury.

21. The whole is taken down in writing.

22. It is left in the custody of the clerk of the Court, to be referred to by the parties, and read before the jury. The evidence is reduced to writing in the presence of the prisoner, and each answer read as soon as written down, so that any error or omission can be pointed out by the prisoner or his counsel. Should, however, any error pass unperceived, the witness can be again called before the Court, provided the jury is not yet empannelled.

23. He may be heard on questions of law at any time during the proceedings, and has full power to examine witnesses.

24. The Attorney General is heard last. When the juries are empannelled, the accusation and evidence are read by the Attorney General, and the prisoner's counsel is heard in his defence, after which the Attorney General addresses the jury.

25. The Court decides questions of law; the juries decide the fact. The first jury is composed of the constable and twelve members of the police of the parish where the offence or the principal offence charged has been committed, unless the Court allow a jury to be called from another parish. If the majority return a verdict of Guilty, the prisoner may appeal to a grande enquête, or jury composed of twenty-four gentlemen (selected by the Attorney General from the three adjoining parishes), five of whom are sufficient to acquit.

26. By the Court on the conclusions of the Attorney General.

27. Yes; from day to day when the evidence is to be reduced in writing. After the jury has been empannelled, I know of no case where the trial has been suspended or put off, unless for an hour at most.

28. A general outline of the proceedings has been given in the preceding answers.

29. In cases that are disposed of summarily (or without the intervention of a jury) by the Court, composed of the bailiff and two jurats, neither party can appeal. In cases that go before a jury, the accused party may appeal from the first to the second jury, but not the Attorney General.

30. It is the duty of the viscount, or his deputy, to see it carried into effect. Time is allowed to a criminal condemned to death to sue for mercy.

JERSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Peter Le Sueur, Esq.

31. I beg to refer the Commission to the Clerk of the Court: the several forms of indictments or accusations, &c., are found in the records of the Court. The oaths taken by the witnesses and members of the Court, &c., are found in the "Code of Laws for the Island of Jersey, 1771."

32. The bailiff and Crown officers, viz., the Attorney General, Viscount and Advocate General, are appointed by letters patent.

The jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers of the island, and are amenable before Her Majesty in Council.

The Clerk of the Court and the two dénonciateurs, or under-sheriffs, are named by the bailiff.

The constables and centeniers are chosen for three years by the rate-payers of their several parishes.

The members of the police are chosen by the parish assemblies, viz., the vingteniers for three years, and the police officers in the town for four years, in the county for seven years.

These several functionaries are removable by the Royal Court.

33. Our system of criminal proceeding may on the whole offer ample guarantees to the accused; but several parts are open to objections.

1. To award punishment for the slightest offence, the presence of the following functionaries at least is required:—the bailiff, two jurats, the Attorney General, the viscount, the clerk of the Court, and the advocates; a more summary jurisdiction is much wanted.
2. The first jury is composed of the members of the police selected by the constable.
3. The jurors for the grande enquête are selected for each case by the Attorney General.
4. Taking down the evidence in writing is often a long and tedious process.
5. The evidence is received in the absence of the jury.

On the other hand, the jury is enabled to examine more carefully the whole of the evidence brought forward, by referring to the depositions when they have retired to form their verdict; and, as the evidence is not closed in one day, other witnesses, if it is necessary, may be summoned by the prosecutor or the accused, until the case is thoroughly investigated, so that neither party can be taken by surprise. These several advantages and disadvantages were under the consideration of a Committee of the States, named to revise the Criminal Law, when the Royal Commission was issued.

P. LE SUEUR, Advocate.

No. 17.

James Godfray, Esq.

Answers of James Godfray, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. The opportunities I have had of becoming acquainted with the criminal law of Jersey are by having, as clerk in the Greffier's Office, registered the proceedings and sentences of the Royal Court from 1840 to 1843, and subsequently by having occasionally attended the meetings of the Court when criminal prosecutions have been carried on.

2. The Royal Court is the only tribunal in the island exercising criminal jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction has originated in the law of Normandy as it existed before our separation from that Duchy, and extends over all offences excepting in cases of high treason.

3. The original authorities relied upon in the discussion of questions arising upon the criminal law were the commentators Rouillé and Terrien; but, that law being but partially commented by them, the modern English and French authorities on criminal law are principally relied upon in most questions which call for a discussion.

4. The step first taken for the purpose of bringing to justice a party suspected of having committed an offence is his apprehension, which is effected by the constable or one of the centeniers of the parish in which the offence has been committed. This police officer immediately informs the bailiff, or one of the "jurés justiciers" (jurats), of the occurrence, and states the cause of suspicion. If the suspicion appears grounded, the bailiff or jurat gives the police officer permission to put the party suspected into custody provisionally; and it is the duty of the constable or centenier on the next court day to bring up the offender, and to give his report in writing, containing the information he may have received relative to the offence, into the hands of the Queen's Attorney General, who thereupon frames an accusation or charge against the offender.

5. The Court exercises summary jurisdiction in cases of petty offences, when the accused party admits the facts imputed to him, or when he submits to the judgment of the Court in order to avoid further prosecution.

6. Where there is no summary jurisdiction exercised by the Court, the preliminary steps which take place before the accused party is put upon his trial are as follows.

The Court being constituted of the bailiff and two jurats, and the offender being brought up before them by the constable, this officer's report, and the charge formed thereon, are read out by the Attorney General; the accused party is then called upon by the bailiff to put forth his plea, which is immediately taken down in writing by the greffier, or clerk of the Court. This plea or déclaration, as it is styled, together with the constable's or centenier's report, remains in the hands of the greffier, to be by him produced when necessary. In order to secure his appearance before Court, the accused party, if not admitted to bail, is, after each day's proceeding, at the request of the Attorney General, remanded to prison; and the Court gives the Attorney General "permission d'informer," leave to call witnesses. The accused party is also allowed to bring forward such evidence as he may think proper for his defence.

If one day does not suffice for the hearing of evidence, the bailiff fixes some future day for that purpose, and so on until the case is ready to be submitted to the enditement or first jury.

7. The accused party is tried before the Royal Court in every case, either where there is or is not summary jurisdiction. In the first case, that is where there is summary jurisdiction, the Court may be constituted, as before, of the bailiff and two jurats only; and in the other case, that is where there is not summary jurisdiction, the Court must be constituted of the bailiff and at least seven jurats, that number forming a quorum. In the latter case, after all the preliminary steps have been taken, the Attorney General orders the constable, or in his absence the centenier of the parish in which the offence has been committed, to have twelve of his (the constable or centenier's) subordinate sworn police officers summoned to attend Court on the day appointed for the trial. These twelve officers, with the constable or centenier as their president, form what is termed the enditement, or first jury, by whom the accused party is tried. They are summoned by the vingtenier, according to a list made out by the constable or centenier. When the case has been heard by this jury, the bailiff having summed up the evidence, its members, taking with them all the minutes of the proceedings, retire to form their verdict; if it occurs that they are not unanimous in their opinion, and consequently no verdict is formed, when they return their President informs the Court thereof, whereupon the bailiff calls up all the members of such jury separately; and, in order that the Court only should know their various opinions, each member gives his secretly, of which the bailiff takes note, and returns the verdict accordingly. If the verdict returned is that of "plutôt coupable qu'innocent," that is, rather guilty than innocent, the accused party becomes, what is termed in the Acts of the Court, "criminellement enditè." Being thus indicted, if the accused party chooses to submit to the judgement of the Court, the Court immediately proceeds to pass sentence; if not, he has then the privilege of undergoing another trial by a second jury, called the "grande enquête du pays," which is summoned for that purpose generally in the course of the week. Should seven members of the first jury or enditement find the accused "plutôt innocent que coupable," rather innocent than guilty, he is immediately set at liberty. It sometimes occurs that the first jury is chosen from another parish than that in which the offence has been committed; but this is only an exception to the general rule.

The grande enquête, or second jury, is composed of twenty-four of the principal inhabitants, that is of those who pay the higher taxes, of three different parishes, viz. eight from the parish in which the offence has been committed, and eight from each of the two neighbouring parishes. These persons are chosen by the Attorney General, and summoned by the prévôt (summoning officer) of their respective parishes late in the evening preceding the day of their attendance. On the day of trial by enditement, or first jury, the accused party, immediately after the charge has been read, may challenge any member of this jury. He has the same right as regards the members of the grande enquête, or second jury; and, as in both cases more than the requisite number are summoned to attend, should the Court, always consisting of the bailiff and seven jurats at least, find the cause of challenge grounded, another person is immediately called up in the room of the member so displaced. When this second jury is complete, the usual oath is administered to them by the bailiff, and the trial takes its course. Should the members of this jury not be unanimous, their respective opinions are heard by the Court in the same manner as those of the first jury. Five out of the twenty-four members can acquit the prisoner. The bailiff or the jurat who has given the provisional permission to detain the accused is capable of acting as member of the Court.

8. The whole of the proceedings against the accused party are instituted and carried on by the Queen's Attorney General, who acts ex officio, and has the power of causing them to be abandoned at any stage previous to the accused party having been brought up before the enditement. This abandonment has no effect upon future accusations.

9. The charge against the party accused is put into a definite form in writing, as soon as the constable or centenier's report has been read to the Court. As to the substance of the charge, the accuser cannot afterwards change it; neither can he vary the form. The party accused may change his plea at any stage of the proceedings, and may otherwise improve his defence in such a manner as he or his counsel may think proper.

10. Where the party charged admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, the Court, consisting of the bailiff and two jurats, judges the question as to the relevancy; this being set aside, if the offence is of a trivial nature, the Court thus constituted proceed to pass sentence. If, on the contrary, the offence is of a serious nature, the full Court is convened for that purpose. Seven jurats at least must be present with the bailiff.

11. The Court orders that whosoever may have cognizance of the facts shall be summoned to attend Court, which is accordingly done; and the proceedings are carried on as is stated in answer to questions Nos. 6 and 7.

12. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, he is not thereby concluded as to the facts.

13. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the facts, he is not thereby concluded as to the relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of one or more counsel and other legal advisers. He makes the selection himself; and, where he is unable to defray the expense, they are always obliged to assist him gratuitously. One advocate only is allowed to address the Court and jury on his behalf. Should all the advocates (six in number) have refused to act for the accused party, upon his informing the Court thereof, the bailiff calls upon one of them, who is then bound to assist the accused.

15. The accusing party can, at any stage of the proceedings, previous to the trial by endite- ment, produce evidence, both oral and documentary. In order to compel the production of oral evidence, the list of witnesses of each party is put into the hands of the vicomte or the dénonciateur, whose duties are to summon the witnesses at least 24 hours previous to the day on which their presence is necessary. If any witness fails to attend to this summons, the Court, so as to ensure his presence on a future day, orders the arrest of his person. The documentary evidence, which may be or may have been produced, is, together with the depositions of the witnesses, "logées au greffe," that is, deposited in the hands of the greffier, who produces them when required, and is obliged to give a copy thereof gratuitously to the accused party. The accused, besides having the same means as the accusing party of producing evidence, has the privilege of so doing after his trial by enditement, that is when he comes to trial by grande enquête.

16. The evidence is first received the next Court day appointed for that purpose after the charge has been drawn out by the Attorney General. The evidence is taken vivâ voce where the jurisdiction is of a summary kind. Where the jurisdiction is not of a summary kind, the whole evidence is taken in writing by attorneys named by the bailiff to that effect. It is in both cases taken in presence of the Court, the accusing and accused party.

17. The party accused is allowed to hear the evidence produced against him, when such evidence is first taken, as is stated in answer to question No. 16.

18. The accused party may produce evidence to meet the evidence produced against him immediately after the evidence for the prosecution has been heard.

19. The accused party is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him, after the Attorney General has questioned them. It is always optional to the accused party to put the last questions to the witnesses; and he may do so to any extent, as long as they are connected with the case.

20. Fresh evidence may be produced by the accused at any stage of the proceeding before the actual judgment; but the accuser is not allowed to produce evidence after the case is ready to be tried by the enditement or first jury.

21. The whole of the evidence, at every stage of the proceeding, is taken down in writing, excepting in cases where the Court exercises summary jurisdiction.

22. The evidence which is taken down in writing is afterwards read to the Court and the first jury. The accused party, if found guilty by the first jury, is allowed, when he comes to trial by the second jury, to produce evidence against that which may have been previously produced against him. As the evidence is taken down in writing by an attorney in presence of the bailiff, jurats and the parties concerned, the duty of the Court is to see that whatsoever the witnesses state be correctly taken down, and afterwards signed by them; it never occurs that this part of the proceedings is disputed; although I conceive that, if there was any informality in this respect, the accused party would be allowed to give proof to that effect.

23. The counsel of the party charged has the privilege of being heard on questions of fact or law, and examining witnesses at any stage of the proceedings.

24. The party accusing first reads the charge; then each day's proceedings according to date; after which counsel is heard for the accused, and lastly the Attorney General. Should he make use of new arguments, the accused may be heard in reply; but not otherwise.

25. When the case is not of sufficient gravity to be submitted to a jury, the bailiff and jurats decide both law and fact. In other cases they decide the law only; and the first and second jury, in their respective capacity, decide the fact.

26. Judgment is awarded by the bailiff, according to the opinion of the majority of the jurats.

27. The Court has the power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings at any stage. When the witnesses, who have been warned for a certain day, have all deposed, or when the Court sees that the whole of the evidence cannot be heard in that one day, the proceedings are adjourned. They are also adjourned in cases of illness, either of the accused party or his counsel, or for any other reasonable cause. The Court can suspend its proceedings for a short space of time only (not more than about an hour) when either the enditement or grande enquête are sitting; but in that case these bodies, having begun their respective duties, are not allowed to separate or have communication with any person until they have returned their verdict. They are, during this momentary suspension of the proceedings, as also when they retire to form their verdict, put under the immediate charge of the vicomte or sheriff.

28. Having detailed, as clearly as was in my power, the incidents to accusation and trial, I have nothing more to add in answer to this question, except that, when a witness is about to leave the island, the Court, on the demand of the accusing or accused party, authorises the vicomte to take down in writing the deposition of such witness, which he accordingly does in presence of both parties. The deposition so taken is signed by the witness, as also by the vicomte, who afterwards puts it into the hands of the party who has applied to the Court to have such deposition taken; and on the next Court day it is logée au greffe (deposited in the greffier's office), with the other written evidence to the same effect.

29. On questions of law which may have been moved before the bailiff and two jurats, the accused party has the power of appeal to the bailiff and the twelve jurats, seven of whom must be present with the bailiff to form a Court of Appeal. This appeal is brought on the day of trial by enditement previous to the fact being submitted to this jury. No further appeal is allowed as regards the law; but, as is before stated, the accused may appeal to, and be tried by, a grande enquête, whose decision is final. The Court, in passing sentence, always reserves the right to the party convicted of applying to Her Majesty for pardon. The accusing party has no right of appeal.

30. If judgment be finally against the accused party, he is sent back to prison, and the vicomte sees that it is carried into effect.

31. Herewith is a copy of a report drawn out by the centenier, who had apprehended the parties therein mentioned, and presented to the Court by the constable of the parish, in which the offences had been committed, at the same time as he brought the offenders before the Court. (No. 1.)

Enclosed is also a copy of the charge formed by the Attorney General on the above mentioned centenier's report (No. 2), and the acts of the Court relating the proceedings of each day until final judgment. (Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.)

I have not thought it necessary to send forms of the oaths taken by the members of the Court, witnesses and others, the greffier having informed me that he had drawn them out for the purpose of forwarding them to the Commissioners.

32. The bailiff is appointed for life by the Sovereign. The jurats are elected by the tax-payers of the whole island, and officiate for the term of their natural life, or until such time as they obtain their discharge, on account of age or infirmity, by means of an Order by Her Majesty in Council.

The constables and centeniers are chosen by the tax-payers of their respective parishes, and perform the duties of their office for the space of three years.

The officiers du connétable and vingteniers (the constable and centeniers' subordinate officers) are chosen by the principaux (those who pay above a certain amount of taxes) and the police officers of each parish, who are convened from time to time for that purpose.

The officiers du connétable officiate in the parish of St. Helier four years, and in the other eleven parishes seven years. Though the law does not state for what space of time the vingteniers are to fill their office, it is the custom in all the parishes to proceed every three years to new elections.

33. The above answers contain, as near as possible, the information I can furnish respecting the criminal law of Jersey.

34. The defects which appear to me to exist in the present system are,—

1st. That a person on mere suspicion is kept in gaol sometimes a week at the pleasure of the police, previous to his being presented before Court.

2ndly. That the constable or the centenier who has apprehended the party suspected, and his subordinate police officers, who have generally assisted him in so doing, are called upon to form a jury to try the accused.

3rdly. That in cases of a serious nature the witnesses who have deposed, and whose depositions have been taken down in writing, are not afterwards called upon to appear at Court in presence of the juries.

In order to remove these defects, I beg leave at present to suggest,—

That the moment a party, suspected of having committed an offence, has been apprehended by the police, he and the witnesses to the fact should at that time be brought up before, and examined by, a magistrate appointed for that purpose; and, if this magistrate, after having heard the evidence, which he would be obliged to take or cause to be taken down in writing, should find the offence of a serious nature, and, consequently that there was cause to have the party suspected tried by jury, he would then issue an order to have him put into custody until such time as the Court and juries would meet for the purpose of trying criminal cases.

That the police could not have the power of detaining a party suspected more than 18 hours (Sunday excepted) before presenting him to this magistrate.

That in cases of trivial offences this magistrate would have the power to exercise summary jurisdiction.

That this magistrate could in no way form part of the Court or juries by whom the accused was to be afterwards tried.

That the jury composed of the police be abolished, and, if necessary, another substituted in lieu thereof.

And, as it is difficult for a jury, in some cases, to seize the exact meaning of the witnesses by the mere reading of their depositions, it would be proper,—

That the witnesses who had deposed before the magistrate be called up in presence of the jury or juries on the day or days of trial, to hear their depositions read, and be questioned thereon.

That the accused party would on those days be allowed to bring up fresh evidence, which might be favourable to his defence, as also evidence to meet that which had previously been brought up against him.

These few alterations, though they might not entirely eradicate the existing evils, would in some measure improve the present system.

JAMES GODFRAY.

MONSIEUR,

Vendredi, le 19 Septembre, 1845, vers les six heures du matin, M^se^ Anne Pearce, veuve de M. Thomas Huxford, vint me porter plainte que, la nuit précédente, des voleurs avaient arraché un des volets et brisé un des carreaux de vitre de sa boutique, par où ils s'y étaient introduits et ensuite ouvert la porte extérieure, et qu'ils lui avaient volé environ dix douzaine d'œufs, douze bouteilles de ginger beer, plusieurs pains, deux morceaux de lard, deux paires de souliers, du fromage, environ neufs livres de réglisse et autres objets, qu'ils avaient tiré plusieurs tiroirs dans lesquels ils avaient fouillé, avaient brisé le haut d'un pupitre qui était fermé, endommagé un grand nombre d'objets, et laissé dans la boutique une chandelle allumée. Que les voleurs s'étaient également introduits dans la boutique occupée par M. Josué Noël, dans le même voisinage. Peu de temps après, je me rendis chez la dite M^se. Huxford, et ensuite chez le dit sieur Noël, qui me dit que la nuit précédente des voleurs avaient déplacé un des volets de sa boutique, brisé un des carreaux de vitre par où ils s'y étaient introduits, et lui avaient volé un fromage, un pain, trois à quatre douzaines d'œufs, plusieurs boîtes de lucifer matches, trois livres de tabac et de la liqueur; et que des boîtes et show glass, que les voleurs avaient emportées et déposées dans les environs, lui avaient été rapportées de très grand matin par des personnes qui les avaient trouvées. Ayant observé comment les voleurs s'étaient introduits dans les dites boutiques, je soupçonnai Edouard Anquetil, Richard Joyles, avec leur camarade, d'être les auteurs des dites ruptures et vols. Jeudi, le 2 du courant, M. Philippe Nicolle, officier du connétable, m'informa qu'en conséquence des informations qu'il avait reçues, ayant lieu de croire que William Gillet avait aux pieds une des paires des souliers volés chez la dite M^se. Huxford, il l'avait interrogé, et qu'il disait les avoir achetées de Richard Joyles. M. Nicolle en ayant d'abord informé M. le Centenier Du Parcq, ils avaient été à la poursuite du dit Joyles, qui nia ces faits; mais qu'ayant été ensuite chez Betsey Jarvis, où les dits Richard Joyles, Edouard Anquetil, William Sampson et autres repris de justice logeaient, ils avaient fait des perquisitions, et y avaient trouvé une paire de souliers, qui avait été identifiée, ainsi que celle trouvée aux pieds du dit William Gillet, par la dite M^se. Huxford pour sa propriété, et comme faisant partie des objets volés dans la susdite occasion. En conséquence M. le Centenier Du Parcq avait detenu provisoirement les dits Richard Joyles, William Sampson et William Gillet dans les loges de l'Hôpital. Je fus accompagné du dit Sieur Nicolle aux logements de la dite Betsey Jarvis, qui venait de sortir pour se rendre à l'Hôpital. Edouard Anquetil, qui était dans une des mansardes, s'évada par la lucarne et pardessus les toits des autres maisons. Etant retourné à l'Hôpital, accompagné de M. le Centenier Du Parcq, et du dit officier de Police, Nicolle, j'y trouvai la dite Jarvis, et, en présence des dits Joyles, Sampson, et Gillet, elle me remit trois bâtons de réglisse, qu'elle nous dit provenir des dits vols; que, la nuit qu'ils avaient été commis, William Gillet, Richard Joyles et Edouard Anquetil étaient entrés chez elle vers une heure, et que Gillet portait un panier rempli d'œufs et deux paires de souliers; alors Gillet dit, " it is of no use; I will tell the truth," et fit l'aveu que, la nuit en question, lui, Gillet, Richard Joyles et Edouard Anquetil avaient été dans Roseville street, que Joyles avait forcé une barre en fer qui retenait les volets d'une boutique (celle du dit Sieur Noël), avait dérangé un de ces volets, et que, Anquetil ayant brisé un des carreaux de vitre, il s'était introduit dans la dite boutique, mais qu'ils n'y avaient rien volé de sa connaissance; qu'ensuite ils s'étaient rendus à la boutique de M^se. Huxford, où Joyles avait forcé le volet d'une des fenêtres, et que, Anquetil ayant brisé un des carreaux, il avait défait le bouton qui retenait la dite fenêtre, et qu'ensuite Anquetil et lui (Gillet) s'y étaient introduits, que Anquetil lui avait remis un panier rempli d'œufs et deux paires de souliers qu'il avait passées à Joyles, qui faisait guet en dehors; que lui et Anquetil étaient ensuite sortis, mais que Anquetil, qui avait bu de la liqueur, devint si ivre que Joyles fut obligé de le porter sur son dos chez la dite Betsey Jarvis, où lui (Gillet) avait porté les œufs et les souliers; qu'ils avaient couché Anquetil, et que, ayant fait part de ce qu'ils venaient de faire à William Sampson et à Mark Vickery, ces derniers s'offrirent de retourner avec eux; qu'en conséquence ils s'y étaient rendus ensemble; arrivés à la susdite fenêtre, Sampson s'y introduisit et avait ouvert la porte extérieure de la dite boutique; qu'alors lui Gillet, Richard Joyles et Mark Vickery y étaient entrés et y avaient pris du pain, de la morue, des bâtons de réglisse, une petite boîte en acajou et autres objets dont il ne se rappellait pas: Richard Joyles, qui était présent, dit que l'entier de ce que Gillet venait de rapporter était correct à l'exception d'un fait, que lui (Joyles) avait forcé une barre en fer qui retenait les volets de la boutique du dit Sieur Noël, et en avait dérangé un des volets. Joyles nia ce fait. En conséquence je sequestrai les dits trois bâtons de réglisse et les deux paires de souliers susmentionnés, et je saisis les dits William Gillet, Richard Joyles et William Sampson, que j'ai remis, avec la sanction d'Edouard Leonard Bisson, écuyer, Lieutenant Bailli, à la garde du geolier de la prison. J'ai fait tout mon possible pour parvenir à arrêter les dits Edouard Anquetil et Mark Vickery; mais n'ai pu y réussir.

James Godfray, Esq.

De tout quoi je vous fais ce présent rapport.

L'an mil huit-cent quarante-cinq, le onzième jour d'Octobre. William Gillet, Richard Joyles, William Sampson et Edouard Anquetil, saisis de fait par le Centenier Chevalier de la paroisse de St. Helier, et présentés en justice par le connétable de la dite paroisse, ont été accusés par le Procureur Général de la Reine, en conséquence du rapport du dit centenier, d'avoir dans la nuit de Jeudi, 18e, à vendredi, 19e jour de Septembre, 1845, ou vers ce tems là, rompu la boutique occupée par Mse. Anne Pearce, située proche le Hâvre des Pas, en la paroisse de St. Hélier, de s'être ensuite introduits dans la dite boutique, et d'en avoir volé une quantité d'objets appartenant à la dite Pearce, entr'autres: "Dix douzaines d'œufs ou environ, douze bouteilles de ginger beer, une petite boîte en acajou, plusieurs pains, deux paires de souliers, du fromage, de la morue, du lard, et du réglisse." Item, de s'être, la même nuit de Jeudi 18 à vendredi 19 Septembre, 1845, ou vers ce tems là, introduits, aussi avec effraction, dans une autre boutique occupée par M. Josué Noël, située dans Roseville street, en la ville de St. Hélier, et d'en avoir volé une quantité d'objets, entr'autres, un fromage, un pain, environ trois douzaines d'œufs, plusieurs boîtes de lucifer matches, environ trois livres de tabac, de la liqueur, plusieurs boîtes, et un show glass, le tout la propriété du dit Josué Noël, ou d'avoir aidé, assisté, ou participé, aux dites ruptures et aux dits vols, ou d'avoir reçu, caché ou recelé les dits objets volés, sachant qu'ils provenaient de vols. Les dits William Gillet et Richard Joyles s'étant avoués coupables de l'accusation portée contr'eux, et ayant offert d'être témoins pour la Reine, ils ont été envoyés en prison pour être reproduits et recevoir sentence, dans le cas où leur offre ne serait point accueillie. Et les dits William Sampson et Edouard Anquetil ont plaidé à la dite accusation et fait leurs déclarations, qui ont été rédigées et logées au greffe, et ils ont été constitués prisonniers sous les dites accusations, à l'instance du dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine, auquel il est permis d'informer. Etant le rapport du dit centenier, ainsi que les effets par lui sequestrés et produits en Cour, demeurés logés au greffe.

L'an mil huit-cent quarante-cinq, le dix-huitième jour de Décembre. William Sampson et Edouard Anquetil sous accusation d'avoir de complicité avec William Gillet et Richard Joyles, dans la nuit de Jeudi 18 à Vendredi 19 jour de Septembre, 1845, ou vers ce tems là, rompu la boutique occupée par Mse. Anne Pearce, située proche le Havre des Pas, en la paroisse de St. Hélier, de s'être ensuite introduits dans la dite boutique, et d'en avoir volé une quantité d'objets appartenant à la dite Pearce, entr'autres, dix douzaines d'œufs, ou environ, douze bouteilles de ginger beer, une petite boîte en acajou, plusieurs pains, deux paires de souliers, du fromage, de la morue, du lard, et du réglisse. Item, de s'être la même nuit de Jeudi 18 à Vendredi 19 Septembre, 1845, ou vers ce tems là, introduits, aussi avec effraction, dans une autre boutique occupée par Monsieur José Noël, situtée dans Roseville street, en la ville de St. Hélier, et d'en avoir volé une quantité d'objets, entr'autres un fromage, un pain, environ trois douzaines d'œufs, plusieurs boîtes de lucifer matches, environ trois livres de tabac, de la liqueur, plusieurs boîtes, et un show glass, le tout la propriété du dit Josué Noël, ou d'avoir aidé, assisté, ou participé aux dites ruptures et aux dits vols, ou d'avoir reçu, caché ou recelé les dits objets volés, sachant qu'ils provenaient de vols, le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au rapport du Centenier Chevalier de la paroisse de St. Hélier et en l'acte de la Cour, daté l'an 1845, le 11 jour d'Octobre, convenus à l'instance du Procureur Général de la Reine, pour ouïr le rapport des hommes de l'Enditement de la Paroisse de St. Hélier sur la dite accusation: Pierre Le Sueur, écuyer, Connétable, Messrs. George Le Cronier, Henry Mahy, Philippe Fauvel, jun., Jean Binet, jun., Jean Alexandre, Jean Le Cras, Philippe Sorel, George Coutanche, George Clement Le Feuvre, Thomas Monnamy, Edouard Gallichan, George Picot, actionnés par le Procuréur Général de la Reine, pour passer comme hommes d'enditement à la charge ou décharge des dits William Sampson et Edouard Anquetil sur la dite accusation. L'accusation a été lue aux dits prisonniers; et ils ont sur ce plaidé et fait leurs déclarations, qui ont été rédigées et logées au greffe. Lecture a été donnée des dépositions des témoins ci-devant rédigées et logées au greffe, et des autres pièces de la procédure. Les accusés ont été entendus en leurs défense par le moyen de leur avocat; et le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine a été ouï. Les hommes de l'enditement se sont retirés avec toutes les pièces de la procédure, pour conférer dans le particulier, et, étant de retour et à un accord, ils ont fait leur rapport à la justice, par le moyen du dit Connétable, qu'ils croient en leurs consciences que le dit William Sampson est plutôt innocent que coupable de la rupture et du vol commis chez le dit Josué Noël, et les deux accusés plutôt coupables qu'innocents des autres chefs de l'accusation. Partant ils demeurent endités criminellement; et ils ont été renvoyés en prison jusqu' à ce que le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine fasse convenir la Grande Enquête du Pays dont ils ont demandé le bénéfice.

Les hommes de la Grande Enquête se sont retirés, avec toutes les pièces de la procédure, pour conférer dans le particulier, et, étant de retour et à un accord, ils ont fait leur rapport à la justice par le moyen du dit François Bertram, écuyer, qu'ils croient en leurs consciences que les deux prisonniers à la barre sont plutôt coupables qu'innocents des crimes dont ils étaient endités. Partant ils en demeurent dûment atteints et convaincus. Ensuite, après que les dits prisonniers, ainsi que le dit William Gillet, lequel le 11e Octobre dernier se déclara coupable de l'accusation, comme paraît par acte du dit jour, ont été entendus en mitigation par le moyen de leurs avocats, la Cour, conformément aux conclusions du dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine, et considérant leur état de récidive, les a condamnés pour punition de leurs crimes à être déportés à tel lieu qu'il plaira à Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil d'ordonner, pour le terme de sept années. Tous leurs biens, meubles et héritages, s'ils en ont, demeurent acquis et confisqués à Sa Majesté ou au Seigneur auquel il appartient. Et ils sont renvoyés en prison jusqu'à ce que le bon plaisir de Sa Majesté soit connu touchant la dite déportation, au quel effet le greffier est chargé de transmettre copie authentique du présent acte au Clerk en attendance du Conseil Privé de Sa Majesté.

Answer of Robert Pipon Marett, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the First Series of Questions.

Robert Pipon Marett, Esq.
4 August, 1846.

In compliance with the request contained in your secretary's letter of the 4th of July, I have the honour of forwarding for your consideration the following paper, which embodies a reply to the series of questions concerning the Criminal Laws of Jersey, which accompanied that communication. As you will perceive, I have taken the liberty of so far departing from the strict tenour of your instructions in respect to those questions, that, instead of answering them categorically in the order in which they are laid down, I have given the information they were intended to elicit, in the form of a dissertation. My object, in adopting such a course, was principally to avoid repetitions; besides which I considered that, allowing of more method than the other, it would enable me to give a more accurate, connected and comprehensive view of our system of administration in criminal matters, and therefore the better to fulfil the design of your inquiries.

I shall premise by stating in reply to the first question that I was appointed an Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, in November, 1840, by the present Bailli, Sir John de Veulle, and began practising about the middle of the year 1842. (1)

In treating of the administration of Criminal Law in Jersey, it will be most convenient to divide the subject into two principal parts. In the first, I shall give an account of the functionaries to whom that administration is entrusted, their powers, duties and the manner of their appointment: in the second, I shall detail the mode in which it is conducted.

PART 1.—Of the Persons who administer the Law in Criminal Matters.

The Functionaries, to whom appertains the administration of the Criminal Laws, may be distributed into two classes; viz.:

JERSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Robert Pipon Marett, Esq. 4 August, 1846.

I. Those who, after an act reputed criminal has been committed, are called upon to decide on its nature and the degree of culpability which belongs to it, and on the kind and amount of punishment to be inflicted on the offender; in other words, the Judicial Body.

II. Those whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such acts reputed criminal, to take measures after their perpetration for bringing those concerned in them to be judged by the proper Tribunal, and afterwards to carry the sentence of such Tribunal into execution; otherwise the Executive Body.

The Judicial Body.—To speak with exactness, there exist two Courts possessing Criminal jurisdiction in Jersey; the Ecclesiastical Court, and the Royal or Civil Court. The former of these owes its origin to James I., who, in 1623, granted to the Insular Clergy a body of (2) "Canons Ecclesiastical," by which he empowered the Dean, as judge, together with the other Rectors of parishes, as assessors, to take cognizance of a variety of offences, which will be found enumerated in the 22nd Canon, and to punish and censure them according to the laws of the Church. For many years after its institution, these powers were vigorously exercised: but of late, owing to several causes, the Court has seldom displayed its authority, and the repression of every kind of crime and delinquency has been almost entirely left to the secular arm. And indeed it would be better, perhaps, both for the clergy themselves and the community at large, if the right of deciding on such matters, which it has thus virtually abandoned, were taken altogether from the Ecclesiastical Court, and its functions confined to administering the oath of office to the churchwardens, alms-collectors and other ecclesiastical officers, rectifying errors in the parish registers, and other similar cases which, from their nature, fall more particularly within its province. For its warmest supporters must allow that, whenever it has attempted to enforce its authority in modern times, its members have been assailed with accusations of bigotry and intolerance, and exposed to severe criticisms and angry recriminations, which, however (2) unmerited, could not otherwise but excite prejudices against them in the minds of many, and seriously diminish their influence as ministers of the Gospel. Moreover, it would certainly contribute much to the uniformity and simplicity of our criminal system, if the task of carrying it out, in all its details, were confided to one Court alone.

Such an arrangement would be so much the more expedient and feasible, that it may be (2) said to exist already in practice, the Royal Court being, de facto, the only criminal tribunal in the Island.

This Court consists of the Bailli and jurats. The Bailli was anciently appointed by the Governor: but since the reign of Henry VII., or more properly of James I., who renewed and enforced the order of the former King, he is of royal nomination, and held his office for life until the time of the present bailli, who enjoys it only durante bene placito. He receives a salary of 300*l*. per annum, out of the revenues belonging to Her Majesty in the Island, and is entitled besides to various official fees which together make this place one of considerable emolument. He is, ex officio, president of the Royal Court on all occasions, and under whatever denomination it may act, as well as of the insular "States:" but by a singular anomaly, he cannot, in either capacity, give his opinion on any subject, concurrently with his colleagues, except when a decisory or casting vote is required. He has the privilege of naming one or more lieutenants to replace him, both at the Court and in the States, whenever by sickness or any other cause he is prevented from attending: and it would appear, from the practice of the last 50 or 60 years, that he is not restricted in his choice to any of the members of the Court in particular, though it was anciently held that the jurats alone were eligible. The "greffier," or clerk of the Court, the "commis au greffe," or deputy clerk, the two "dénonciateurs" or sheriff's officers, the six advocates, and the "huissier," or usher, are all appointed by him, as well as the "écrivains," or attorneys, whose number he may increase at his pleasure He possesses the power of punishing, by fine and temporary suspension from their offices, any members of the Court, not excepting the jurats, who may be guilty of disrespect towards him in (32) his official character, or of disobedience to his legitimate commands, and may even dismiss the advocates and attorneys, if the offence be repeated. The preservation of order and decorum during the sittings of the Court is peculiarly his province: and for this purpose he is invested with a right of summary jurisdiction, and may sentence the delinquents to be fined, or imprisoned for a short period, without the intervention of his fellow magistrates. His writ or order is necessary for the holding of coroner's inquests. No theatrical performance or public exhibition of any kind can take place without his permission; and no foreigner can exercise any trade or calling in the island, or dispose of goods and merchandize there, whether by wholesale, in retail, or by public auction, without first obtaining his license. He is also, by virtue of his office, a member of the board intrusted with the management of the public prison and house of correction.

The jurats, or, to use their official designation, the "Jurés Justiciers," twelve in number, are elected by the suffrages of the rate-payers throughout the Island, of which they must be natives. They hold their post for life, and can resign it only with the permission of Her Majesty in Council. If found guilty of gross misconduct, they may be dismissed by the same authority. (3) The creation of this order of magistrates is due to King John, who, to reward the islanders for their faithful adherence to his fortunes, amid the general defection of his other Norman subjects, bestowed on them a body of "Constitutions," in which the mode of nominating the jurats is laid down, and their powers are defined.

(2) The Royal Court, so composed, has the cognizance of all cases, civil, mixed and criminal, arising within the island, except high treason, disputes arising between the governor and the major part of the jurats*, and the ecclesiastical matters before alluded to. This extensive jurisdiction was first conferred upon it by King John, as appears by the fifth article of the Constitutions of that prince, above mentioned, has been acknowledged by all the succeeding sovereigns of England, and was specially confirmed by the charter granted to the islanders, in the fourth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. In civil cases, when the matter in dispute, being personal property, is of or above the value of £80 sterling, or produces, if it partake of the nature of the reality, a revenue of five livres per annum or more, an appeal lies to Her Majesty in Council: but the decision of the Court is final in all questions of a purely criminal nature. The same rule formerly prevailed in respect to mixed cases also; but there seems to be a tendency at present to favour a different practice. From the tenor, however, of its records in general, and of some orders in council in particular on this subject, I am disposed to be of opinion that the Jersey Court can claim the right of judging all matters, in which the criminal element enters, without appeal. (2)

Such being the number and variety of the causes submitted to its jurisdiction, the Court has found it necessary, for the sake of order and expedition, to divide them into classes, for the treatment of which particular days are assigned. On these occasions, it takes different denominations according to the nature of the matters on which it is engaged. Thus, on those days (generally Thursdays) which it devotes to the hearing of questions relative to real property, it is styled "la Cour d'Héritage." Under the name of "Cour de Catel" it takes cognizance of suits concerning Chattels or personal property, or rather, I should say, did so; for this Court, for which Tuesdays during term were formerly reserved, may now be said to exist in name only, being entirely superseded by the Courts of "Billet" and "Samedi," which were originally created to relieve it from the pressure of business with which it was overburdened. The former of these is held on Fridays, and is used for the recovery of debts, bonds and arrears of rents, a kind of transferable mortgages peculiar, I believe, to the Channel Islands. As to the "Cour de Samedi," which derives its name from the day on which it chiefly (but not exclusively) sits, it is a sort of subsidiary Court, at which are instituted a mixed multitude of actions, which are not considered to belong to the jurisdiction of the Courts already mentioned, and, among others, criminal prosecutions, which are all, without distinction, commenced there. With regard however to such as are finally brought before a jury, though all the preliminary proceedings are carried on before the Saturday's Court, the trial itself invariably takes place in presence of the "Full Court." (2) (7) (16)

It is proper to explain what is meant by the Full Court. It is not customary for the whole body of the jurats to attend at thesittings of the Courts above described: but the task of hearing suits, in the first instance, is committed to what is called the Inferior Number, which, at the Courts of "Héritage" and "Catel," consists of three, and, at those of "Billet" and "Samedi," of two, jurats, together with the Bailli: and its decision is binding, in personal actions, when the subject of the contest falls below the value of five pounds sterling. But, when it exceeds this sum, in worth, and in all real actions, the parties concerned, if dissatisfied with the judgment, are at liberty to have it re-examined by the "Corps de la Cour," or Full Court, on which occasion seven at least of the jurats, with the Bailli, must be present. In every instance, without exception, the magistrates forming the "Nombre inférieur," whose decision is called in question, are permitted to act as members of the Full Court. (7)

The terms during which the Jersey Court is open for the transaction of business are two in number. The first, or April, term begins on the Saturday immediately following the 11th of April, and continues to the fifth of July. The second, or September, term commences on the first Saturday after the 11th of that month, and terminates on the 5th of December. In former times, the prosecution of all criminal matters was limited to these periods: but, since 1834, this rule has been relaxed in favour of such accused persons as are suffering imprisonment, whose trials may now be proceeded with, at all times, without interruption or delay. Admiralty causes, and a few others requiring expedition, and which belong exclusively to the jurisdiction of the Saturday's Court, are also allowed to be brought on during the vacation.

I shall only just mention in this place, as being comprised in the judicial body, the juries employed in criminal trials, of which there are two, the enditement or preliminary jury, and the grande enquête or jury of appeal. Their composition and functions will be better described when I come to speak of the criminal procedure.

The Executive Body.—The functionaries included under this head are the "Procureur Général de la Reine" or Attorney General, the "Avocat Général de la Reine" or Solicitor General, the Vicomte or High Sheriff, the two Dénonciateurs or sheriff's officers, the parochial police, and the Prévôt.

The Procureur Général stands at the head of this department. He is, ex officio, public prosecutor; and every suit involving the application of a penal law must be instituted through him, and with his approbation. So extensive are his powers in this respect that, not only may he file an information against any person of his own authority, but, even after the accused is before the Court, and though the accusation may have been pleaded to and sent to proof, in short, at any time before either the verdict of the jury or the final judgment of the Court has been given on the matter at issue, he is at liberty to abandon the prosecution. On this, the party who was its object is immediately set free, and cannot again be brought to trial on the (32) (8) same charge. The presence of the Procureur is requisite for the holding of Coroner's Inquests; and on these occasions he may call any number of witnesses, and continue their examination from day to day as long as he considers necessary. To him also belongs the privilege of choosing the members of the grande enquête. This office is of great antiquity: in Jersey indeed, in all probability, it is coeval with the occupation of the island by the Normans. It was anciently in the gift of the Governors; but this privilege was finally taken from them by James I.; since which time the Procureur is nominated by the Crown. Though generally, he is not necessarily, a native, nor even a member of the Court. His salary is 100*l.* per annum, which are paid out (32) of Her Majesty's Revenues in the Island; in addition to which he receives, out of the proceeds of (8) the license tax, a sum proportioned to the number of licenses, which may amount to 40*l.* or (8) 50*l.* yearly, and is entitled to certain fees, which may, one year with the other, raise his official income to somewhat more than 200*l.* To compensate in some measure for the insufficiency of this remuneration, he is allowed to practise, as barrister, in all cases in which the interests of Her Majesty or the public are not concerned. His duties being very laborious, he is permitted to appoint, as assistant, a kind of secretary, called the "Autorisé du Procureur Général," who receives out of the revenues of the Crown an annual sum of 12*l.*; a most inadequate recompense, (32) when the ~~responsibility~~ attached to the situation is taken into account.

* Such at least is the construction which the Court seems, from the earliest times, to have put upon the latter part of the fifth article of King John's Constitution, which is as follows. "Exceptis casibus nimis arduis, et si quis legitimè convictus fuerit a fidelitate Domini Regis tanquam proditor recessisse, vel manus injecisse violentas in Ministros Domini Regis modo debito officium exercendo." Nothing can well be more vague than these expressions; and Queen Elizabeth's Charter is not more explicit. Perhaps for et si we should read ut si, thus rendering the latter branch of the sentence the explanation of the former.

The Avocat Général—

Is the substitute of the Procureur, and acts in his stead, whenever, from indisposition or any other cause, he is unable to attend to his duty. In the presence of the Procureur, however, all his authority ceases. He is then nothing more than the adviser of that functionary, not (32) having even the faculty of addressing the Court after him on any public subject. The case is otherwise, of course, when he is engaged as advocate in a private suit. Like his colleague, he is appointed by the Crown. His annual salary is 50*l.*, wholly drawn from the Royal Revenues. I may add that both these officers, in their official characters, are entitled to a seat in the assembly of the insular "States," and may take part in the discussion of any measure, but are not admitted to vote.

The Vicomte—

(32) This officer takes precedence of the Avocat Général, though, from the similarity, indeed identity, of their functions, I have preferred mentioning the latter immediately after the Procureur. His duties are numerous and important: but I shall confine myself solely to the enumeration of such as are connected with the administration of criminal justice. In the first (32) place, he presides at inquests, in the capacity of coroner. He summons all witnesses in criminal trials, as well on behalf of the accused as of the Crown. He has the charge and superintendence of all persons incarcerated for crime, conveys them to and from the Court and prison (30) during their trial, and after their conviction takes the necessary measures for putting the sentence of the Court into execution. When the Court, on the information of the Procureur that a misdemeanor or a minor offence has been committed, issues an order for the seizure (saisie) of the delinquent, or his appearance to answer the complaint against him, the vicomte is one of the officers commissioned to carry it into effect. It is his peculiar business to inspect and legalize, by his stamp or seal, all weights and measures used in the island, and to discover and denounce all infractions of the regulations relating thereto. He may also arrest and bring up for punishment any person guilty of resisting or molesting him in the legal exercise of his office, or committing a breach of the peace in his presence. The origin of this office extends to a very remote period. It is supposed to be the same which is mentioned in the Constitutions of King John, under the name of "Propositus," and was then bestowed by popular election: but, if this surmise be true, the people have long since lost that right; and the vicomte, once the nominee of the governor, has held for nearly two centuries and a half, and now holds, his employment by Royal patent. More favoured, in this respect, than the Procureur and the Avocat, he enjoys the advantage of performing his duties by deputy: but it has been decided that, in availing himself of that privilege, he cannot reserve any portion of his authority or act simultaneously with his delegate. He receives from the Crown a yearly salary of 100*l.*; and his official fees are considerable.

The Dénonciateurs—

(32) There was anciently but one dénonciateur; and to this day one only, the senior of the two, is paid by the Crown. The sum he receives is extremely trifling. The second place was created, soon after the Restoration of Charles II., by Sir George de Carteret, then governor and bailli of the island, to reward one of his adherents, who had experienced heavy losses and encountered many dangers in the service of that King. Since that period its existence has been recognized by several orders in council. These functionaries are styled officiers de justice, or officers of the Court; and their duty (as part of the criminal establishment) is to escort the vicomte in seizing offenders or citing them to appear, in obedience to its orders. They may also arrest for a breach of the peace committed in their view.

The Parochial Police—

Is composed of four grades or orders of officers, "Connétables," "Centeniers," "Vingteniers" and "Officiers du Connétable."

Of the connétables, there is but one for each parish, who is not only at the head of its police but also its municipal chief, and representative in the States, and is elected by the contributors to the parochial or poor rate. His office is triennial, at the expiration of which term he is re-eligible. His powers as police officer are very considerable. Of his own knowledge, or on the information of others (which is not required to be upon oath), that a crime or other infraction of the law has been perpetrated, he may, without warrant, proceed to seek out and arrest the offender, and may keep him in his own custody or that of his subordinates until he can be brought before the Court. As this method, however, would occasion much inconvenience, the most general mode is to place the prisoner in charge of the gaoler, for which purpose the permission of the bailli or one of the jurats is necessary. He is also empowered to enter and search any house suspected to contain stolen property, or any arms or instruments which may have been employed in the commission of the crime, and to sequestrate all such articles. On presenting his prisoner, he must deliver to the procureur, to be read to the Court, a report giving a full account of the circumstances which led to the arrest, and of his proceedings in the matter, and produce whatever effects he may have seized, which, from that moment, remain under the care of the greffier, or clerk of the Court, until the close of the trial. (32)

The centeniers are elected in the same manner, and for the same period, as the connétable; and their duties and powers are similar, with this difference, however, that they are subordinate to that officer, by whom the criminals they apprehend are presented before the Court, and to whom also their reports are addressed.

The vingteniers and officiers du connétable assist the constable and centeniers when necessary; but, unless accompanied by one of those superior functionaries, they cannot arrest even for the most heinous offence, committed out of their sight, though they may for any criminal act done in their presence. They are chosen by the parochial or vestry meeting, and hold their office for seven years in all the parishes except St. Hélier's, where the chief town is situated, in which, in consideration of the onerous nature of their employment, their time of service is limited to four years. In addition to their duties as policemen, the vingteniers, within the bounds of their respective "Vingtaines" (the name given in Jersey to the subdivision of a parish), collect the poor-rate, carry summons by order of the connétable, and levy certain fines which he is authorized to impose.

The authority of the members of the police is confined to their respective parishes. They are all sworn into office before the Royal Court. The forms of the oaths administered to the different ranks, which vary in some particulars, are to be found in the "Jersey Code of Laws," compiled in 1771. With the exception of the vingteniers, who receive a small percentage on the moneys they collect, they serve gratuitously. One of the most important of their duties remains to be stated. They form the enditement, or perpetual preliminary jury of their parish, except when either the accused or the injured party is one of their body, on which occasions the police of one of the adjoining parishes is called in to replace them. (32)

The following table exhibits the police establishment in the several parishes of the island.

The Prévôt—

In each of the parishes where a royal fee or manor is situated, the tenants are bound to furnish a Prévôt, whose business it is to summon the parties in civil suits,—in those mixed cases called "causes en ajonction," in which the procureur acts jointly with the plaintiff,—and in some of a criminal nature. As there are no manors belonging to Her Majesty, and consequently no Prévôts, in St. Ouen's or St. Clement's, that office, in respect to those parishes, is filled by the Prévôts of St. Mary's and Grouville. In some parishes the Prévôt has an inferior officer to assist him, called "le Sergent de la Reine," whom it is also the duty of the tenants to supply. (32)

PART II.—Of the mode of administering the Criminal Law, otherwise, of Criminal Procedure.

As the means employed for bringing a suspected person to justice, as well as the subsequent process, differ in many important respects according as the offence laid to his charge may be ranged under either of the following heads, it will be convenient to adopt that classification, however imperfect, and to consider separately each of its divisions. They are:—

I. Acts criminal per se, which may be called "Common Law Offences."

* The existence of a small town, called St. Aubin's, in St. Brélade's, is the reason of its possessing a greater number of constable's officers than the other parishes, St. Helier's alone excepted, which I have already mentioned as the site of the principal town.

JERSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Robert Pipon Marett, Esq. 4 August, 1846.

II. Acts not in themselves criminal, but which are rendered such by some prohibitory enactment, otherwise, "Statutory Offences."

I.—Common Law Offences.

When any of the offences comprehended in this class has been perpetrated, there are several ways of bringing the supposed criminal to give an account of his conduct.

First. The procureur, or in his absence the avocat général, on receiving a report of the matter from a constable, or other authorized officer, may submit it to the Court, and move that an order or warrant be issued in consequence, for compelling the appearance of the offending person. This request is always granted as a matter of course. The order, or act, of the Court is different, according to the nature and gravity of the facts alleged. In cases of felony, and
(4) others of a very aggravated character, the Court issues what is called a "Décret de prise de corps," by which all persons are, not only forbidden to shelter the party against whom it is directed, or favour his escape, but empowered to seize, and deliver him into the hands of the proper officers. When the imputed offence amounts to a misdemeanour only, an "Acte de saisie" is granted, in virtue of which the vicomte, or one of the dénonciateurs, arrests and incarcerates the offender, unless he can give sufficient security for his appearance to answer the complaint, when necessary. In cases of less consequence, the Court merely enacts that a "signification," or peremptory summons, shall be served on the inculpated person by one of the officers first mentioned, and, should it be ineffectual, an "Acte de saisie" is resorted to.

Secondly. The Procureur may acquaint the Court with the facts that have come to his knowledge, without naming his informant, and apply for any of the above mentioned acts or warrants, on his own responsibility. This course is very rarely adopted.

(4) Thirdly. The most ordinary mode, however, (except for petty delinquencies when a "signification" upon a report is the usual process) is for the police of the parish in which the criminal act has been committed to investigate the whole matter, arrest the supposed malefactor, and present him, together with their report, before the "Cour du Samedi" at the earliest opportunity.

Whichever of these methods may have been employed for ensuring his appearance there, as soon as the accused is at the bar of the Court, the Procureur commences proceedings by reading aloud the act or warrant issued by the Court, the report of the police officer, or both as the case may be, and afterwards the accusation founded thereupon; and, having finished, he delivers
(9) the whole of these documents to the greffier, to be kept in his custody. From that moment he is no longer at liberty to alter, add to or amend the accusation in the slightest degree, though,
(8) as I have already stated, he may, indeed, abandon the whole, or any part of it, at any time previous to the judgment of the Court, or the verdict of the enditement or preliminary jury.

The accused is next called upon to plead to the charge; in doing this he may be assisted by
(1) as many of the advocates as he can afford to employ, though one only is allowed to speak, the others acting merely as advisers. Should he be unprovided with counsel, he is directed to choose one, by the bailli; or on his refusal to comply with that recommendation, an advocate is
(14) assigned him by the Court. Before putting in his plea, every facility is afforded to the prisoner and his counsel of examining the report and the accusation; and, should he wish for time to deliberate, his request is invariably acceded to. In this case, he is remanded to prison, or, if the Court see occasion to permit it, allowed to give bail.

On this head, the Court of Jersey has always shown the greatest indulgence to prisoners. In cases of breach of the peace, assaults, unless the life of the injured party has been endangered, and misdemeanours generally, bail is never refused: and it has frequently been accepted, even when the accusation has been for petty larceny, the penalty being of course proportioned to the magnitude of the offence. To qualify a party to remain surety for another, it is necessary he should possess real property in the island; but the smallest amount is sufficient. The practice of permitting the prisoner to give his own recognizance for his appearance is unknown among us: but he may obtain his liberty by depositing the required sum in the hands of the vicomte.

Should the prisoner, immediately on his arraignment, or at the expiration of the delay granted him for preparing his plea, confess his guilt, the Court, after hearing his advocate in
(5) mitigation and the Procureur's "conclusions," that is, his observations on the facts of the case and the application of the law, generally proceeds to pass sentence at once; and its decision is
(29) final. At other times, when the offence is so serious as to require a severe punishment, the culprit is remanded until the next meeting of the full Court, when he receives his doom, provided, always, he persists in his previous avowal; for it is a maxim of our law that an accused
(13) person may retract, change or modify his plea at any time before judgment has been finally pronounced upon his case.

If the accused stand mute of malice, the Court orders a plea of "Not guilty," "Non coupable," to be entered on his behalf.

Should he demur to the accusation (which he may do with a reserve as to the truth of the (10) facts), the objection is immediately discussed. In the event of its being set aside, he may then
(12) plead Not guilty, and is at liberty to urge anew his rejected plea at the trial. The authorities most frequently appealed to for the decision of questions of this kind, and of criminal law
(3) generally, are precedents, and the writings of the most celebrated English lawyers. The works of the most esteemed French jurists are also occasionally referred to.

In almost every instance, however, the plea adopted by the accused is Not guilty, as it allows of the utmost latitude in conducting his defence.

Whatever be the plea or "déclaration" put in, it is immediately recorded by the greffier.

When this is done, if the general issue has been pleaded, the mode of proceeding differs according as the case is considered to require the intervention of a jury or to be cognizable in a summary manner by the Court.

I must here observe that I am not aware that there exists any definite rule for the application of these two kinds of trial, both the one and the other having been employed in cases extremely similar. It may however be laid down, as a general principle, that every accusation, which, if proved, would subject the person who is the object of it to capital or corporal punishment, transportation, hard labour or lengthened imprisonment, must be submitted to a jury;—that assaults and breaches of the peace, unless accompanied with much violence and danger to life, are never tried in that manner except at the express request of the accused,—and that all those petty offences, against which it is usual to proceed by "signification," are invariably judged by the Court alone. (13) (11) (5)

To return,—When a jury is dispensed with, the cause, on the motion of the Procureur, is sent to proof, "envoyé en preuve," If, on the contrary, it is thought necessary to refer the matter to a jury, the Procureur prays to be allowed to inform against the accused, "qu'il lui soit permis d'informer." In either case, the prisoner is then sent back to prison, or liberated on bail, according to circumstances, until witnesses can be called. (11)

These two methods of collecting evidence are distinguished from each other by several peculiarities. When recourse is had to an "envoi en preuve," on the first day appointed for hearing evidence a list of the witnesses on both sides must be given to the greffier to be inserted in the Act of the Court, after which, even though the cause should be put off, no new witness can be added, nor are any allowed to depose whose names are not so recorded. 2. The case cannot be proceeded with, unless all the witnesses whose names are in the Act be present, or the party who calls them agree to forego the benefit of their testimony. 3. The witnesses are generally heard vivâ voce, and, if possible, all on the same day. Whereas, when an "information" is granted, the taking of evidence may be continued at intervals for an indefinite period, and the prisoner and Crown officer are at liberty to innover, as it is called, or introduce new witnesses, on each occasion. 2. Such witnesses as are present are heard without regard to "defaulters;" and, 3. The whole of the evidence is committed to paper. This is done by the écrivains or attorneys; and each question and answer, as soon as set down, is read aloud, when the prisoner (whose presence is indispensable on these occasions), or the prosecutor, if dissatisfied with the rendering, must propose his objections; and, if they are allowed by the Court, the necessary corrections are inserted. Once signed, however, by the witness, his evidence can no longer be excepted against, either then, or at any subsequent period. At the close of each day's examination, the depositions are collected and placed in the hands of the greffier; and the procureur is permitted to "informer plus outre," to inform farther against the prisoner. (16) (17) (27) (18) (2) (17) (22)

In all criminal cases, the witnesses, whether in support of the prosecution or in favour of the prisoner, are summoned by the procureur, through the agency of the vicomte. In the event of their failing or refusing to appear, they are subjected to a fine; and the officier, that is the vicomte, is directed to seize and imprison them unless they give sufficient sureties for their appearance when wanted. When a witness is on the eve of leaving the island, or unable, from illness or other valid cause, to be present at Court, an act is obtained, at the suit of the procureur, authorising the vicomte to take down in writing, in the presence of the parties, the deposition upon oath of such witness to be afterwards used at the trial. Whilst on the subject of witnesses, I may as well state that, on all occasions, the prisoner has the right of calling as many as he pleases, and that in examining his own, as well as those brought against him, he is allowed the most unrestricted freedom. (15) (19) (23)

When neither party has any longer evidence to bring forward, the case is ready to be submitted to the enditement. This jury is composed of thirteen persons, who, according to the ancient custom, should be chosen from the police of the parish to which the prisoner belongs, but have in modern times, I believe, been frequently, if not habitually, selected from that of the parish where the crime has been committed, to avoid the inconvenience which should otherwise result when several persons from different parishes happen to be implicated in the same accusation. I need hardly mention that such of the members of the police as have been heard as witnesses, or have taken an active part in the capture of the offender, are excluded from the enditement. As every policeman on entering office is sworn to the faithful performance of all its duties, of which this is one of the most considerable, it is not thought requisite to exact an oath from him on each occasion of his serving on this jury. When it becomes necessary to convene it, the procureur addresses a letter to the constable of the parish, requiring him to provide a sufficient number of his officers to act as jurymen (pour passer comme hommes d'enditement) in the forthcoming trial: and in consequence of this order that functionary selects such of his subordinates as he thinks proper, and summons them by means of his vingteniers. (20) constable, or, if he be unable to act, one of the centeniers. Should they not be agreed, the foreman acquaints the Court with the circumstance; on which, being called up in turn, each in a low voice, so as to be overheard only by the jurats and procureur, who gather around him for that purpose, imparts his opinion to the bailli, who notes it down, and, having received the declarations of all the jurors, announces, as the verdict, the decision of the majority, without, however, mentioning the number of votes on either sides. If the prisoner is brought in "plutôt innocent que coupable," he is immediately liberated; if, on the contrary, the verdict is "plutôt coupable qu'innocent," he is said to be criminally indicted, and may then submit to the judgment of the Court, or appeal to the grande enquête. In the event of his preferring the latter alternative, he is sent back to prison until that jury can be summoned, which is effected with the least possible delay. Whatever be the verdict of the enditement, the procureur possesses no power of appeal; neither does he at any time in criminal cases.

On the day appointed, the accused standing at the bar, and in the presence of the full Court, the names of the men of the enditement are called over by the greffier. As soon as they have taken their places in the jury box, the prisoner is asked by the bailli whether he objects to any of the number, and those against whom a valid reason is assigned are struck off; but no peremptory challenge is allowed. The jury being formed, the procureur having first enquired of the accused whether he persists in his former plea or "déclaration," proceeds to read the accusation, the acts and other papers relative to the case, and the evidence, after which the prisoner's counsel is heard in his defence, the procureur next in reply, and (frequently) the business is closed by the president's summing up the case, The enditement then usually retire, taking with them the depositions and other documents. On these occasions they are accompanied by the vicomte, whose duty it is to prevent them from communicating with any person. On their return, their verdict, if unanimous, is delivered by their foreman, who is, habitually, the (22) (24)

The grande enquête consists of 24 men, chosen by the procureur from the prisoner's parish (or sometimes, I believe, for the reasons I mentioned when speaking of the enditement, from the parish in which the offence was committed), and the two adjoining parishes, in equal proportions. When it becomes necessary to call it together, a verbal notice or summons is left, by the prévôt, at the residence of the jurors, at a late hour on the evening preceding the trial, a precaution doubtless originally intended to secure them from being tampered with or even spoken to on that subject. They are always selected from the most intelligent and respectable of the parishioners; but no pecuniary qualification is required of them, or at least none worth noticing, the only regulation on that head, which I am acquainted with, being the 33rd article of the ordinances, framed, in 1591, by the Commissioners, Pyne and Napper, which directs that none shall be admitted to form part of a grande enquête, who, besides being of a good reputation, does not possess real property in the island to the value of three quarters of wheat rent, or above; a considerable sum, without doubt, at that early period; but which, amounting to little more than 50*l*. of our money, is too trifling to answer the intended purpose at this time.

The procedure before the grande enquête is, in almost every respect, the counterpart of that which takes place before the enditement. The full Court being assembled, the greffier, beginning with the jurors of the prisoner's parish, calls aloud their names; and, all having answered and standing in the jury box, the prisoner is reminded by the bailli of his right of challenge, for which, however, as in the case of the enditement, he must show cause. The jury of the first parish being duly formed and seated, the greffier then goes on to those of the other two; and, as the number belonging to each is completed, the same question is put to the prisoner, and the same course followed as in the first instance. When at length the enquête is complete, the jurymen stand up at the call of the bailli; and, each holding up his right hand, the customary oath is administered to them collectively. These preliminaries adjusted, the depositions and other papers before produced to the enditement, together with the act containing its decision, are read. Sometimes, but very rarely, fresh evidence is adduced. The same order in speaking is observed by the advocate of the accused, the procureur and the bailli. The enquête then retires with the vicomte, and, on its return, gives its verdict in the form and manner which has been already described, when speaking of the enditement. If five of its members vote the prisoner innocent, he is acquitted: if twenty concur in finding him guilty, he is duly convicted; and the Court, after hearing his counsel in mitigation, and the procureur on the application of the law, give judgment against him. He is then delivered over to the vicomte, and led back to prison, in irons if his crime be very heinous. This practice was followed in ancient times in nearly every case, and even after a condemnation by the enditement.

(30)

When transportation is the punishment awarded, a copy of the sentence is transmitted to Her Majesty in Council to be confirmed; that formality being necessary to authorize the admission of convicts from Jersey into the penal colonies.

At the close of every criminal trial, the greffier is directed to restore to their respective owners, without cost, such articles as, having been sequestered or recovered by the police, had been placed in his keeping at its commencement.

II. Statutory Offences.

Offences of this description, however serious the penalty attached to their commisson, are never tried by a jury; and the proofs necessary for the conviction of the offender are now sought to be obtained by an "envoi en preuve" only, though it is not very long since an information was occasionally resorted to, for that purpose. The prosecution commences by an "acte de saisie," or a "signification," issued at the suit of the procureur, in those cases in which imprisonment forms part of the punishment, or where the amount, if a fine, is left at the discretion of the Court; but, when the fine is fixed by the law, a bill, or summons, signed by the procureur or his authorisé, is served by the prévôt on the inculpated party, who is allowed to make one default. On repeating it, he is condemned, and the penalty adjudged.

It appears from the records that, in former times, the "inferior number" was in the habit of deciding summarily on matters of this kind; but of late it has been a prevalent practice, when the fine inflicted has exceeded five pounds, to grant an appeal to the full Court, whose award, however, is final.

Before terminating these remarks on the administration of Criminal Law in Jersey, it will not be out of place to give a brief account of the manner in which coroners' inquests are held. When a corpse has been found, or a person has died under circumstances which call for an enquiry, the bailli, on being informed of it, addresses his writ to the vicomte, requiring him to investigate the matter. On receiving this order, the vicomte, accompanied by the procureur, and having collected twelve men as jurymen, repairs to the spot where the dead body is lying.

On arriving there, the members of the inquest, being sworn, proceed to inspect the corpse, hear the report of the surgeon who is generally in attendance, and question, but not upon oath, such persons as are likely to throw light on the occurrence. This done, they retire in private with the procureur and the vicomte, and deliberate on their verdict, which is taken down in writing by the latter; who, before dismissing them, gives each an injunction to appear on the next court-day to confirm it. On that day, all the men of the inquest being present, the report of the vicomte is read by the procureur, after which the bailli, addressing each of them in rotation, enquires his opinion, which is generally, but not necessarily, confimatory of that which he gave before the vicomte. The verdict is then written down by the greffier. When the members of the inquest are not unanimous, the declaration of the majority alone is recorded. Each juryman, on leaving the Court, is entitled to claim half a crown for his trouble from the vicomte, who, as well as the procureur, receives a fee on these occasions. Any person being in the highway or any public place, who refuses to accompany the vicomte as member of an inquest, is liable to be condemned by the Court to a fine of 12*s*. 6*d*., with costs, on the report of that functionary.

I shall now point out what I consider the defects of our Criminal System. (34)

I. The first and most prominent is its utter inadequacy for the repression of petty offences.

As, among the four separate tribunals into which the Royal Court divides itself, there is but one, the "Cour de Samedi," able to take cognizance of criminal matters, and as those Courts never sit simultaneously, it follows that there are seldom more than two opportunities in the course of a week of bringing an offender to justice. And, even were it otherwise, as the presentation of the accused, how trifling soever his fault, must always be accompanied with a report from the arresting officer (which requires time for its preparation), it can never take place until he has suffered a confinement of 48 hours at the very least. Besides, witnesses never being heard on that occasion, another delay ensues until they can be called,—a week,—perhaps more, elapses in this manner; at the end of which the prisoner, perchance, is acquitted or found to deserve a reprimand,—a petty fine, or twenty four hours imprisonment! It is true that in (34) most of these cases the accused is allowed to give bail; but the poor, who form the mass of this kind of offenders, are rarely able to avail themselves of the permission; and the greatest sufferers by this dilatory mode of proceeding are those very classes whose time is most precious, and whose liberty should be the more tenderly guarded, that their inability to labour is followed by the misery and consequent demoralization of their families. The effect of this system is that much petty delinquency is overlooked by the police, through humanity, and allowed to remain unpunished.

II. The second defect of our criminal system is the want of any examination before the accused is committed, or put on his trial.

Every police officer, it is true, before incarcerating a person whom he has seized, is bound to obtain the permission of a magistrate; and, no doubt, the original object of this provision was to ensure that no man should be deprived of his liberty without cause or enquiry: but in practice no investigation does or can take place. A suspected individual is arrested, perhaps late in the evening; the police officer, uncertain when or where he may find a magistrate, cannot conveniently take his prisoner with him in search of one, but generally leaves him in the custody of a fellow policeman, or takes him directly to the gaol, and then seeks for the bailli or one of the jurats, to whom he relates the circumstances of the case; and, having obtained from (34) him a written order, he returns and delivers it to the gaoler, who, forthwith, takes the prisoner in charge. Nor can any blame be justly attached to the police for this rather summary way of proceeding: it is forced upon them by necessity. Again, when the party is brought before the Court, he is sent to trial on the report of the arresting officer, without any further examination, and may have lingered long time in prison, when, perhaps, on evidence being heard he is found to be innocent and the Procureur sees fit to discontinue the prosecution. It must be allowed that, owing to the vigilance of that functionary, a case of such hardship does not often occur; but the fact of its possibility is sufficient to render a change on this point indispensable.

To remove these two glaring imperfections in our practice, I would beg, with all deference, to suggest the following plan.

Let a police court be established composed of the bailli (or in his absence one of his lieutenants), as judge, the Procureur or Avocat Général as prosecutor, and the greffier as clerk, (34) to sit each day (Sundays excepted) from 9 till half past 10 o'clock* in the morning, with power to bail in all necessary cases, and to decide summarily on such as involve a punishment of not more than one month's imprisonment or a fine of 10*l*. Before this Court all persons arrested on suspicion of crime should be brought up within 24 hours afterwards (except such as were seized on a Saturday, who should be presented on the Monday following), and the arresting officer examined upon oath, together with as many witnesses as might be present. If the evidence were conclusive against the accused, he should be immediately sentenced, or, when the offence was beyond the jurisdiction of the judge, be committed to prison, or allowed to give bail to take his trial in the ordinary manner before the Royal Court. When the depositions of the witnesses, without being decisive, were sufficient to justify suspicion of the accused, he should (if unable to furnish bail) be remanded, to allow of calling others, for a period of not more than two days, unless at his own request. In all cases referred to the superior Court, the greffier should be charged to take notes of the evidence, and an authentic copy, together with the act or decision of the Judge, be delivered to the Procureur, to be used by him in the same manner and for the same purposes as the report of the arresting officer now is. It would be better, I consider, that parties thus sent up for judgment were tried by a jury in every instance, as such a regulation would afford the criterion, now wanting, for deciding when this kind of trial is necessary. Justice also requires that, when a person having been brought before the police court is discharged, no record should be kept of the event. It might also be expedient not to allow costs to be exacted in this Court under any circumstances, not even when the party accused is convicted and sentenced, the effect of such a practice being to increase the pain without adding to the exemplariness of punishment. To avoid inconvenience and delays, it would be proper to allow the police to place their prisoners in the custody of the gaoler until they could bring them before the police court, without putting them under the necessity of having recourse to a magistrate, as is now the case, and to give them the power of binding over to appear as witnesses any persons present at an arrest, or whose testimony they might consider necessary.

Some plan of this description, I humbly conceive, would remedy in a great measure the two evils pointed out above (which are the greatest by far of our present system), and with this advantage, that it can be carried out without adding to the number of existing functionaries, and without any of those violent innovations on established usages which are always to be deprecated. Neither need it entail any permanent expense on the country; for, though the present bailli and greffier might require some remuneration for the additional trouble it would impose upon them, it would not be necessary to extend any such gratification to their successors, both those offices being already sufficiently lucrative.

III. The present mode of taking evidence is liable to some objections.

1. In the first place, when evidence is sought by an "Information," both the prosecutor and the accused are allowed to introduce new witnesses as often as they think proper, a liberty which, it is evident at sight, may be greatly abused, and should therefore be restricted. I am inclined to think it would be sufficient for all the purposes of justice to permit the parties to call witnesses on two occasions; each, in the following manner. On the first day of taking depositions, the Procureur should give in a list of witnesses for the prosecution, and, after it had been gone through, the accused should produce the evidence in his own behalf. The Procureur might then bring forward a fresh series of witnesses, and the business should be closed by the prisoner's calling others to contradict them.

2. Secondly, I consider it a defect that none but written evidence should be produced at the trial. Not that I should wish to see the use of written evidence abolished. On the contrary, I think such a measure would be attended with infinite disadvantage to the accused; but, as mens' minds are differently constituted, it must frequently happen that proofs which to the prosecutor appear most convincing fail to satisfy the jury; and it would therefore be preferable to enable them to remove their doubts by summoning the witnesses who had already deposed to appear again at the trial, to be orally examined.

IV. The enditement or preliminary jury, composed of the members of the parochial police, might, I think, advantageously be dispensed with. It serves to protract the trial without accomplishing any useful purpose: and all must allow that, though the practical results have not been correspondently mischievous, its composition is, theoretically, very defective.

V. The present mode of empannelling the grande enquête offers an anomaly which it were well to remove. For to entrust the nomination of a jury to the officer of the Crown, without even the right of peremptory challenge on the part of the accused, as a check on his conduct, is to render this institution nugatory in the very cases where it is principally useful, namely those of a political character. It is but just to acknowledge that, in every instance which has come under my notice, this power has been worthily exercised, and the enquête been composed of men of acknowledged respectability: but nevertheless it were better even for the Procureur himself that it were placed in other hands. I would suggest that, about the middle of each year, the vicomte, or the constables (each in his parish), be commissioned to form a list of all the persons throughout the island whom they consider qualified to sit on a jury; which list should be posted up and for a certain period in the vestibule of the court house or any other public place, to enable those who have a right to be exempted to make good their claim. At the expiration of the appointed time, the vicomte should proceed, in presence of the Court, to draw by lot, from those remaining on the list, the names of 150 persons to act as jurymen during the ensuing year. When a jury was required, the vicomte should select, also by lot, from that number, 50 names on the morning preceding the trial, and summon the parties so designated in the manner now practised. On the day of the trial, the jurymen being present, their names inscribed on separate tickets, and placed indiscriminately in an urn, should be drawn out, one by one, and called aloud by the greffier until they had passed unchallenged to the number of 24. It might be judicious to add three others as supplemental jurymen, with power to vote only in the event of some of the 24 being compelled, through indisposition, to retire. When a second jury was wanted, the 50 men who served in the first might be exempted, and the requisite number chosen from the remaining 100; this second division being in turn excluded, when a third jury was called, which should then be taken from the first and last fifties, and so on for each succeeding jury, which should thus be selected from 100 names on every occasion. A right of peremptory challenge to some extent should, I think, be allowed both to the prosecutor and the accused.

I am inclined to believe that some scheme of this kind, that is based on the principle of committing to some competent person or persons the choice of the whole body of jurymen, would be found more successful, as a means of securing the formation of an impartial and intelligent jury, than the establishment of a pecuniary qualification for the same purposes; because, owing to the great subdivision of property and consequent equalization of fortunes in Jersey, such a qualification, if high, would restrict to a few only the right of sitting as jurymen, and thus render their duties burdensome; while, if low, or even moderate, it would include a great number of persons who, however respectable, are totally unfitted by education for filling an office so important and responsible.

VI. The point is not perhaps of much consequence: but it would be better, I conceive, if the custom of allowing the prosecutor to speak last in criminal suits were changed. It is but equitable that the accused should be fully acquainted with the charges brought against him and the proofs and arguments in support of them, before being called upon to defend himself.

VII. Considering the peculiar duties and extensive powers of the Procureur Général, it appears to me contrary to sound policy that, on the one hand, he should be allowed to practice as barrister, and, on the other, receive such inadequate remuneration. Called upon, as he is, to enforce sternly and impartially obedience to the laws, and to pursue with the same severity the transgressors, be they rich or poor, feeble or powerful, it is surely of moment that he should be independent in fortune, and delivered from a position which in some measure obliges him to court the favour and patronage of his fellow citizens. His occupations moreover, in his public capacity, are more than sufficient to occupy his whole time, without the addition of private business; and, if necessitated to undertake both, he can hardly avoid neglecting the one or the other. It is true that those who have hitherto held this post have been, for the most part, men in easy circumstances, to whom the acquisition of a numerous train of clients might be a secondary consideration: but it must frequently happen that the person most qualified to fill the situation is least able to afford such pecuniary sacrifices; and Her Majesty will be reduced to the alternative of choosing a less worthy representative, or of preferring, as such, one who must often be (34) driven to sustain a painful conflict between his interest and his duty.

Another, and a great, advantage would accrue to the public, if the procureur were removed from the bar, and his salary increased. He might then, after the example of his brethren in France, be permitted to give his opinion on the application of the law in civil cases, and assist the bench in the resolution of technical difficulties, a practice which could not but have a powerful influence in maintaining the uniformity of our procedure, which, from the constitution of the Royal Court, it is evident must frequently be in danger of varying.

Such are, in my estimation, the principal defects of the system of administration now prevalent in Jersey in respect to criminal matters. As to the remedies and improvement which I have taken the liberty to propose, I shall only say, in leaving them with all submission to your consideration, that I shall be satisfied if they can furnish one suggestion which may serve to further the interests of justice and the advantage of my native country.

No. 19.

J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

Answers of J. Le Couteur, Esq., Vicomte of Jersey to the first series of Questions, together with a Plan for some modifications in the Royal Court.

1. They are, first, from having held the office of constable of St. Brélade six years.

The constable is elected triennially, by all males of twenty years of age and upwards, of sound mind, whose names appear on the parish rate book.

The Constable is chief of the police in his parish, with power to search and seize; he has the administration of its revenue, the charge of the roads, and superintendence of its public works. He is, "ex officio," a member of the States or Legislative Assembly, and is therefore supposed to have, according to the most eminent commentator on our laws, Lieutenant Bailli le Geyt, 1660 to 1710, a great knowledge of the police, and the practice of the criminal law as connected with his office.

Secondly, From having sat on the Bench, as a jurat of the Royal Court, above two years.

Thirdly, From having, in conjunction with two more members of the states, made a précis of all the orders of the Sovereigns in Council, collected from the records of the Court and States, for the first time, dating from the year 1504 up to 1832; eight hundred and six of which I have transcribed. They are now ordered to be printed at the charge of the States.

Fourthly, From having held the office of Viscount, or High Sheriff and Coroner of Jersey, years.

Lastly, From having held the command of two militia districts and regiments successively, above twenty years, which has made me acquainted with the militia criminal law.

2. There are two Courts, the Royal Court and the Ecclesiastical Court.

The jurisdiction of the Royal Court I consider to have originated from the ancient Norman Code, and its guide antecedent to the conquest might be solely the grand Coustumier de Normandie.

The composition of the Royal Court, in its present form, is to be found in the charter granted to Jersey by King John, said to be four years older than "Magna Charta," equally valuable, and more gratefully acknowledged, as it was not wrested from the Sovereign, but was spontaneously granted after a personal residence.

The constitutions of King John, which were confirmed by 33 Henry III in 1248, are enrolled at this date in the rolls called Escheats, in the Tower; they are in eighteen articles, as annexed.

These twelve jurats were thus to be natives, elected by the officers of the King and the chief inhabitants; with power, when presided by the Bailly, to try cases, in the absence of the Justiciers, and, with them, all cases whatsoever, excepting high treason or violence offered to a magistrate or the officers of His Majesty during the exercise of their duties, which were reserved to the Sovereign.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

The jurisdiction of the Royal Court now extends over every offence as a court of appeal; its powers have been extended or explained, in some cases abridged, by various orders of the Sovereigns in Council, by ordinances and commissions.

3. The Grand Coustumier, a book, according to Blackstone, "of very high authority,' states, as appertaining to criminal law,

"De chose où il y a peril de vie ou de membre.
"De Haro.
"De suyte de meurtre.
"De Querelles.
"De Roberie
"De Trahison au Duc.
"De Suyte de Mehaing.
"De Suyte d'assault.
"De Trefves Enfrainctes.
"De Reception de criminels
"De Forfaictures."

with some inferior offences which are all cognizable by the Royal Court, excepting high treason, or violence as aforesaid.

November 3rd, 1494. King Henry the seventh, who had resided in Jersey while Earl of Richmond, by an ordinance dated 3rd November, 1494, at the palace of Westminster, ruled: "The captain (now the lieutenant governor) is enjoyned not to interfere in the nomination of the "Dean or Bailly, nor with the jurisdiction of the Court ecclesiastical or secular, which is reserved "wholly to the Bailly and Jurats."

Any difference between the captain and the Court to be referred to the Sovereign in council.

The Governor may arrest, and take bail for, or on suspicion of, high treason; but judgment is reserved to the King in council.

June 17th, 1495.—King Henry VII. further enlarged the power of the Court, and restricted that of the captain; soldiers were made subject to the jurisdiction of the Royal Court.

The captain or his deputy, on suspicion of, or for, high treason, was to arrest the person and property of the accused, with the advice (however) of two jurats, until the decision of the Sovereign.

The captain to aid and assist the jurats for the due execution of their judgments.

No unlawful meetings to be held under pain of imprisonment, corporal punishment and fine, at the King's pleasure.

The King names the Bailly, the Dean, the Viscount and his Procureur; the captain, or the jurats, not to interfere in their nomination.

No jurat to act, until openly sworn in court to administer justice indifferently, under a penalty.

Misconduct in a jurat to be punished by dismissal, and to be held incapable from holding any office.

No captain, his deputy, or jurat, to pardon in cases of murder, theft, or other criminal offence punishable by sentence of death, such being reserved to the Sovereign.

The constables (who seize for criminal offences) to be freely elected by the elders in each parish, without any interference of the captain or jurats.

No murderer, thief, or banished man, to be suffered to remain in the castle (the prison then) or the island. This I hold to be the first authority for banishment and transportation.

The common seal of the island to be opened and set to Acts, in the presence of seven jurats (consenting thereto); and their names to be registered.

No captain, or his deputy, in anywise to disturb the Courts or proceedings, whether spiritual or temporal.

1562. October, 20.—Ordinances of Sir Hugh Pawlet, Governor, Richard Worsley, George Paulet, Geo. Miller, and Peter Smith, Commissioners, sent here by Queen Elizabeth.

Their Commission is duly entered on the rolls of the Court "d'héritage," with extensive powers to make laws, sell crown lands, &c.; their ordinances are framed with the assent and counsel of the bailly and jurats.

These were published, or rather proclaimed, but have not yet been found registered, and are therefore not admitted as law.

1565. June 22.—All suits to be heard, ordered and adjudged in the same Isle, and not within this realme; and all appeals to be made according to the words of their charters "Au Roi et à son conseil."

1572. May 13.—Order of Queen Elizabeth.—That no appeale in any cause or matter, great or small, be permitted or allowed before the same matter be fully examined and ended by definitive sentence or other judgment, having the force and effect of a sentence definitive.

1591. April 3, 33rd Eliz.—Tertullian Pyne, L.L.D., and Robert Naper, Esq., Royal Commissioners, sent here by Queen Elizabeth, assisted by Anthony Paulet, Esq., the governor, the bailly, jurats and states, framed an admirable code of laws "Ordres, Loix et Ordonnances," in thirty eight articles, which we cannot find registered in any public record, though it received the (great or) common seal of the Island, and was signed by the Commissioners, and countersigned by the governor, bailly and jurats, "pour meilleur testimonial des prémisses;" yet it is not admitted as law.

I possess a copy of it under the great seal, verified by the signature of the bailly and three jurats, as a copy made the 6th of May, 1774, from a copy dated the 23rd of March, 1750, also verified by the then lieutenant bailly and two jurats, as a copy of one collated with the true original, the 30th September, 1591, and signed by J. Dumaresq, baïli, J. De Carteret, P. De Soullemont, jurats.

It is suspected that, as it trenched on some Court abuses, it has failed to be registered.

1635. September 24. Art. 1.—Order at the Star Chamber, 12th June, 1635. "Whereas there is no punishment by the laws and customes of that island for accessorys in murther, and felonys after the fact done, videlicit for such as favour and receive the principalls before their convict, it is thought fitt and ordered that such accessorys shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, and for such also who convey felons out of the island after proclamation made for their apprehension and who brake prison, and for the favourers of such offenders and compounders with them, that they be punished by fine and imprisonment.

Art. 6.—Gives power to the governor, bailly and jurats to reform abuses in taverns, to punish drunkards, and to grant licences to alehouse keepers.

Art 12.—Charges the sheriff, under sheriff and other sworn officers of the island to levy the revenues of the Crown upon the bodys, lands and goods of the partys by distress, in or out of term.

1667, May 3.—At the court at Whitehall, ordered, on a dispute whether the punishment of the crime of murder committed "by a soldier of the garrison there did properly belong to the court royal or to the court martial of the island:" That the trial, judgment and execution of the party criminal doth of right appertaine and belong to the court royal of that island.

1671, May 19.—At the court at Whitehall, order regulating the holding of the courts.

Art. 3.—The bailly or his lieutenant to be attended from their chamber by the jurats and officers to the bench; to bear him due respect, especially when he is in the court, &c.

The offender to be suspended till he hath asked pardon before the court, if he be a jurat or officer; if not, to be imprisonened till he hath asked pardon and paid the fine that shall be laid upon him, &c.

Art. 4.—That no jurat plead or give counsel in any cause but his owne; and, if he presume to doe it, that he shall loose his vote for that time: nevertheless, if a jurat shall not be satisfied concerning any point belonging to the cause in hand, and shall desire to be better informed therein to the end he may give right judgment in it, the judge shall cause him to receive satisfaction.

Art. 5.—That the jurats assisting in court do deliver their opinion, not arbitrarily, but according to the laws and custumes of that isle.

Art. 9.—Advocates not to interrupt each other, silence being kept by one while the other pleads; transgressors to be fined by the judge, for the first offence, any sum not exceeding three livres tournois; for the second, to be suspended from his place for one month; and for the third offence to be absolutely put out of his place: any other person to be fined not exceeding three livres tournois.

Art. 2.—And as to Acts of parliament, wherein that island is named or any ways concerned, that your majesty will be pleased to direct that such Acts of Parliament, so soon as they are printed, be transmitted to that island with an order of your privy council annexed, directing the registering and publication thereof.

Art. 6.—The prison being at an inconvenient distance, leave given to erect one in the town of St. Hillary: persons charged by their tenures obliged to fetch the prisoners from Mount Orgueil Castle to the court at St. Hillary, and during the Assizes to attend there and carry the prisoners back at their own cost and charges, &c.

Art. 8.—The bailiff and jurats not to imprison any soldier of the garrison there, upon any pretence whatsoever, except for breach of the peace, without leave of the governor first had and obtained, nor intermeddle with any difference between soldier and soldier.

1689. March 13.—Att the court at Whitehall.—"As to the representation of the deputys of the estates of your Majesty's Island of Jersey of the great defect in their customs of proceedings in criminal causes within the said island, I have considered the same: and, in regard that there is no distinction made there betwixt wilful murder, manslaughter, and chance medley, &c., His Majesty is likewise pleased to order that, if for the future it shall appeare by good evidence to the Royal Court in Jersey, upon the tryal of any persons for murder, manslaughter and chance medley, that there is no premeditated malice, and that the partys are fitt objects of mercy, the judges of the said court do upon such occasions suspend all further proceedings against the criminal, until His Majesty be made acquainted with the state of their respective cases, and his Royal pleasure be signifyed thereupon."

N.B. Le Geyt, the commentator on the laws of Jersey, complains of this inroad on the power of the Royal Court.

1690. December 11.—At the Court at Whitehall.

Upon a complaint made to this Board, by the Deputies of the Estates in Jersey, relating to the officers and soldiers now in that island, His Majesty, &c., "That in all cases between a souldier and an inhabitant, upon breach of the peace, the tryall be left to the civill magistrates, and the souldiers delivered up to the civill officers, and the offender punished according to the law of the place.

"That, in all cases hapening between souldier and souldier relating to military discipline, tryalls be had at a court martial as formerly."

1697. March 25.—Pardon extended to Thomas Court, condemned for homicide.

This order legislates in cases of murder, homicide, &c.

1699. November 30.—At the Court at Kensington (the above explained): which order was grounded upon a representation formerly made to His Majesty, that by the law of that island the punishment was capital in all cases where any person was found guilty of the death o a man, and that there was no distinction of punishment in cases of murder, manslaughter or chance medley: and His Majesty having been since informed that, according to the law and ancient usage of that island, the bailiff and jurats upon the tryall of any person accused for the death of another, unless they find the offence to be murder, do not proceed to inflict capital punishments for the same, but do inflict lesser punishments, according to the nature and circumstances of the offences; His Majesty hath, therefore, thought fitt in Council to order that the said Order of the 23rd of June, 1698, for stay of execution in cases of murder, manslaughter and chance medley, until His Majesty's pleasure should be known, shall be restrained to cases of murder, and other cases where capital punishment is inflicted, and where the said Court shall think the offender a fitt object of His Majesty's mercy, and no other.

The whole case to be transmitted.

1723. November 1.—Letter from the Lords Justices, in the absence of the King, directing the sentence of the Royal Court to be carried into effect against Philippe Ballaine for murder.

1729. March 26.—Order issued, in consequence of a seizure of India goods made by the constable of St. Brélade, and sequestrated by the Court. An important order! as it laid down a rule of practice. Witnesses were to be heard vivâ voce; and the Court was to follow the order implicitly.

1736. May 21.—Pardon extended to J. Bishop and Marie le Maistre, for infanticide, who could not obtain a judgment for want of a sufficient number of jurats on the bench, by petition, after a long imprisonment of three years.

1736. August 11.—Pardon to Matthiew le Porcq (for forgery), recommended to mercy, having undergone banishment four years.

1746, 1748, 1751.—Three several pardons for accidental homicide.

1761. March 10.—Pardon to Jean Cohu (before the close of his trial) for shooting Joseph Nagraaf while stealing apples.

1765. July 26.—Doleance and complaint to the Sovereign in Council of Nicholas Fiott, Esq., against the Royal Court for injustice. Condemned to make "amende honorable" for having been wanting in respect to the Royal Court.

1771. March 28.—Pardon for seditious conduct during an insurrection on the 28th September, 1769.

In the code of laws, approved, ratified and confirmed by the King in Council, under this date, are many fines or imprisonments, imposable for the following offences.

Cattle allowed to run wild.
Against the market laws.
„ the game law.
„ persons having dogs out with them after the close of the shooting season.
„ selling new cider.
„ sabbath breaking.
„ strangers or foreigners selling goods without licence.
„ workmen for irregular hours.
„ thatchers smoking while at work.
„ goldsmiths using improper alloy.
„ a strike among workmen.
„ improper weights and measures.
„ millers, if grinding corn on the Sunday.
„ persons for cutting arenaceous grasses on the sand-banks, or breaking the turf.
„ all military offences in the militia code.
„ erecting horse mills to grind for the public, excepting those who have water or wind mills.
„ illegal modes of fishing.
„ tavern keepers, for keeping disorderly houses.

These, with some others, which have become obsolete, or have since been amended, are contained in the old code of laws.

1779 and 1781.—Two men pardoned; one for accidental homicide.

Same date. June 15.—High treason. Edouard Millais suspected of high treason. The Governor empowered to take depositions in this case.

1790. March 24.—Two more Royal pardons for homicide.

The Mutiny Act to be registered at length.

N.B. February 17.—The Lords of Council will be ready to hear the Deputies of Jersey relative to trials by jury.

October 1.—Burglary. John Rival, tried for getting in at a window of a house in St. Helier, being found guilty by the enditement, submitted to the judgment of the Court, which sentenced him to be whipped, to be banished the island for the space of seven years, and that his personal property, if he has any, be confiscated to the use of the King.

"But the Court, at the same time, considering that there is no positive law or custom in the country which decrees a punishment for the crime in question, and that the judges are obliged, by their oath, to pronounce sentence according to the laws and customs of the island; the Court thereupon judged that the sentence should be suspended until your Majesty's pleasure should be known."

"The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to your Majesty's said order of reference, have taken the said act and proceedings into consideration, together with a subsequent letter of the 23rd of June, 1790, from the Greffier of the Royal Court, written by direction of the said Royal Court, in which it is set forth, That formerly the Royal Court did certainly order the infliction of corporal punishments without seeming to need the authority of a law, or having any fixed rule to go by, as appears by the dissimilarity of punishments inflicted for crimes of the same nature. That the Royal Court exercised also the power of legislation; laws and ordinances were as often enacted by them as by the body of the States: but of this accumulated power of legislation and jurisdiction the Royal Court were deprived by His Majesty's Orders in Council, bearing date the 28th March, 1771, and prefixed to the Code of Laws; which order expressly declares that all other political and written laws heretofore made in this island, and not included in the said code, and not having had the Royal assent and confirmations, shall from thenceforward be of no force or validity. Whereupon their Lordships do agree humbly to report as their opinion to your Majesty, That, as there is no law in Jersey, for so they are informed, to make burglary a capital offence, it cannot be considered as a felony, unless the breaking the house in the night time is accompanied with a theft; but the simple act of breaking into the house, especially if done with an intent to steal, is a very high trespass and misdemeanour, and punishable by fine, imprisonment, corporal punishment, or banishment for a certain time, according to the discretion of the Court; and they are therefore of opinion that there is no defect of law for the punishment of this offence, and the application to Your Majesty to make a law, "ex post facto," to punish this criminal, is highly improper. But, if the States should think it expedient to make the offence of burglary a capital offence, as it is by the law of England, they may, if they shall be so advised, propose a new law for your Majesty's consideration, in order to be enacted and confirmed by your Royal sanction, after Your Majesty shall have signified your allowance to have such a law enacted.

"Upon this ground the committee think it may be advisable, if Your Majesty so please, to order the Royal Court to carry their own sentence into execution." Ordered, &c.

1793 to 1800.—Three men pardoned in cases of homicide.

Five men pardoned in cases of housebreaking.

1800. April 23. Sodomy or bestiality, to be punished by sentence of death.

1804 to 1807. Three men sentenced to death, pardoned.

1811. June 11. Charles Lange, sentenced to death, pardoned on condition of serving His Majesty in the Army for life.

1812. Dec. 9. Several persons, Englishmen, ordered to be arrested for having aided some prisoners of war to escape.

1821. March 31. The Dean of Jersey v. the Reverend Mr. Frossard. Order, annulling the acts of the Royal Court which inhibited the Dean from proceeding in the Ecclesiastical Court against Mr. Frossard.

1821. March 31. Richard Nutt charged with fraudulent bankruptcy in England, and seized.—Order thereon.

1826. Sept. 16.—P. Perrot condemned to a fine and costs, for a libel on the Dean.

1828. March 19.—Three Officers in the Militia ordered to return to their duty; and the judgment of the Jersey Court reversed.

N.B.—I have quoted all these orders of Council, because, as precedents confirmed, they are law. In the new code of laws, printed last year, called "Lois et Réglemens des Etats de Jersey," it will be seen that many of those which I have enumerated have not been published; merely those which have been confirmed since 1771. The law for the markets which is inserted in it, not having received the Royal sanction, has expired.

The articles in the new code, which involve penalties for their infraction, are chiefly these: (See pages 1, 23, 251.)

The militia code, for the artillery, infantry and lads, in this—drunkenness on guard, desertion, or sleeping while on sentry, to be punished with the greatest rigour of the law. For mutiny or insubordination the offender to be seized and sent to gaol. Fines for all other military offences, or imprisonment in default of payment.

p. 31. Fines against persons who refuse to contribute to the support of the public pumps, scavengers, &c.

p. 42. Parish Vestries. This, though not under the head of criminal law, has reference to it; as the officiers du connétable, who form the enditement or the first jury in criminal cases, are elected by the vestry in the eleven parishes of the country, for seven years, and in St. Helier's, the town parish, for four years; they have ex officio a vote at all vestry meetings. The vingteniers too, who are seizing officers next in rank to the centeniers, are also elected by the vestry. A vingtenier may preside at a vestry meeting, or at an enditement in the absence of the constable and the centeniers.

p. 51. Fines against tumultuous meetings, resistance to the authorities while suppressing them, punishable by banishment; damages for injuries done to property payable by the parish.

p. 57. The keepers of disorderly houses or taverns, punishable by fine.

p. 62. Tanners subject to fines for non-compliance with the law.

p. 71. The Market law which expired in 1811.

p. 87. "Le banon" law to regulate the right of common—a mischievions law which has given rise to much ill will and litigation. Heavy fines are imposable for cattle breaking common, &c.

p. 97. Road law—an excellent one requiring merely slight changes for additional power to commute labour for money; with a paid police to levy the fines, and to enforce its provisions.

Fines against drains running on the roads, building along a highway without leave of the Road Committee—encroachments on a road—disobedience of orders whilst at work on the roads—violent driving—riding on carts—with minor clauses—in default of payment, imprisonment.

p. 125. Regulations for the harbours—infractions of these punishable by heavy fines.

p. 134. Anchorage and health boat dues—in default of payment, seizure, confiscation and sale of vessels or goods.

p. 145. The Quarantine law, 6 Geo. IV. cap 8.

p. 199. Fine against the introduction of foreign cider.

p. 203. Fines against the importation of cows, heifers and bulls from France.

p. 215. Vraic—periods for cutting seaweed (a valuable manure): heavy fines against the infraction of this law.

p. 255. Décrets—Bankruptcy law: fine or imprisonment in fraudulent cases.

p. 305. Oaths and declarations—persons making false ones, liable to fine or imprisonment.

p. 317. All infractions of any triennial law of the states may be pursued and punished within a year and a day of the committal of the offence, which gives life to those laws for four years or more, instead of three.

p. 318. The numbers of the houses in the town of St. Hélier not to be altered but by authority, under a penalty.

p. 323. Law affording to the Attorney General summary power to levy fines in certain cases, provided the offender offers to pay the whole amount of the fine if it be fixed, or if it varies in amount the maximum penalty with the costs already incurred, in order to avoid the extra costs which would be chargeable if the suit were preferred before the Royal Court.

p. 339. Criminal process, to take place in or out of term.

p. 381. Law for the oyster fishery, fines on infraction.

p. 395. An Act to regulate the fisheries between the British Islands and France—fines or imprisonment.

p. 450. Law to regulate chimney sweeping.

p. 457. Law for the registry of births, marriages and deaths. Birth of a child to be declared to the registrar within 42 days, under a penalty of £50, excepting certain cases.

No corpse to be interred without due notice to the registrar, under a penalty.

The registrar liable to penalties for improper discharge of duty included in several penal clauses.

p. 449. Law for the levy of duties, on wines and spirits (import): many fines on infractions of it.

p. 525. Law on distilleries, with several penal clauses.

I have given the heads of these laws, or Orders of council, in compliance with the 2nd and 33rd questions of the Commissioners, in order to show over what offences the criminal law of Jersey extends.

I consider moreover that an application of the letter of the ancient law, the various orders of council, and Acts of Parliament sent to this island, whether in criminal or civil cases, to the now accumulated mass of precedents, if studied and adhered to, would furnish materials for a complete criminal code.

The Grand Coustumier de Normandie—Terrien, Godefroy, Basnage, Domat and Berault.

Lieutenant Bailly Le Geyt, an upright judge, and the most learned commentator on the laws of Jersey, whose works are now in the course of publication at the expense of the States, refers to them as commentators, but adheres to Rouillé, as the foundation of our law.

I hold our most undoubted law to be in the various orders of council, whether issued upon appeals from the decisions of the full court here, whether spontaneous from the Sovereign, whether upon petition, or the confirmation of a triennial or immediate law of the States.

But, in modern practice, the old writers have been greatly lost sight of: in the case of Marin, for the murder of Mary Ann Bethel, Coke, Blackstone, Hawkins, Lord Hale, and decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench were quoted: and the following French authors were referred to: Rouillé, Terrien, Domat, Merlin (droit français), Cottu, and the Code Napoleon. Yet it was stated on that trial, by the Advocate of the accused, that Sir John Dumaresq, when chief magistrate, never allowed a lawyer, whether for the Crown or for the accused, to open a book of English jurisprudence.

These deviations from the old authorities and practice have undoubtedly led to much uncertainty and confusion.

4. A party charged with a criminal offence is seized by the constable in his own parish, or by one of the centeniers. The constable by his oath of office is bound so to do. "Vous garderez et ferez garder la paix de sa Majesté, vous opposant, et saisissant de fait tous mutins, séditieux, larrons, homicides, et toutes autres personnes qui interrompent le cours de la paix publique, lesquels vous présenterez en justice pour etre punis, etc." See Code de Loix 1771, page, 296. Whereas the centenier, though he may seize an offender, is bound by his oath of office to report the case to the constable, "dont vous informerez le connétable afin qu'ils soient présentés en justice." The vingteniers and officiers de connétable are not charged by their oath of office to do more than obey, aid and assist the constable and centeniers. The offender is placed in custody; and a magistrate's order for his detention in gaol is obtained.

5 The Crown officer exercises summary jurisdiction, so far as to liberate a prisoner if he finds the charge against him to be groundless or incapable of proof.

The constable, in some cases of drunken riots, releases a person who may have been arrested by the centenier or police for violence, on payment of a small fine, which he is charged to levy for intoxication, swearing, or misconduct on the Sabbath.

p. 323. New code. A late law which was confirmed on the 9th March, 1844, to which I have alluded, gives the Attorney General certain summary powers.

6, The constable frames his report against the prisoner, after his arrest (see No. 4), which he delivers to the Crown prosecutor, with a list of witnesses. The prisoner is usually brought up on the first Court day, or on the Saturday following the arrest. The prisoner is then arraigned; if he has no advocate, the Court names one to conduct his defence. After hearing the charge he prefers his plea, which is recorded by the greffier, or clerk of the Court. In many cases the Attorney General allows bail to be taken by the sheriff, which the Court confirms. In either case,—a remand or a bail,—the Attorney General asks "permission d'informer," or leave to make his case good.

7. The Attorney General sends the list of the witnesses for or against the prisoner to the Viscount, or his Deputy, who issues summonses to them to appear in Court. The notice must be served 24 hours before its sitting. On a subsequent day, the prisoner is again presented before the bailly and two jurats (the inferior Court), to hear the evidence of the witnesses; the charge is again read; when the prisoner's advocate, on that and every subsequent day of trial, after hearing the charge, answers (persiste), if the plea is not altered.

The prisoner may put any questions to the witnesses against him, "à charge," and has power to call any witnesses in his favour "à décharge." After each witness has declared all he knows, his evidence is read aloud to him, and he signs it. The whole is lodged "au greffe." The accused is remanded to gaol, or bailed; and the Attorney General asks leave "d'informer plus outre," to inform further. When the Crown prosecutor informs the Court that he has no more witnesses to call, the information closes. The prisoner must then plead, or may submit to the judgment of the Court, which often happens; in most cases he claims the benefit of a trial before the "enditement."

The case then comes before the full Court, composed by the bailly and seven jurats at least, or the lieutenant bailly and six jurats. The prisoner may challenge the members of the "enditement," formed by the constable, or, in his absence, a centenier (I have seen a vingtenier preside one), and 12 sworn police officers of the parish in which the crime was committed. The evidence against and for the prisoner is read to them in full Court, by one of the Crown officers; the accused makes his defence by his counsel, and the Attorney General his charge and reply; the bailly sums up: after which the enditement retires to confer, in charge of the sheriff, who takes all the written evidence and documents relating to the trial into the jury chamber. Such of the evidence as may seem doubtful is read afresh, and sifted. The foreman (the constable or centenier), when the minds of the jury are made up, collects their opinions; if unanimous, he announces that he will report the verdict; if otherwise, that they will each deliver their verdict in secret.

The sheriff then conducts the enditement into Court to the bailly and jurats who collect round the chief magistrate in order to receive the verdict; when each juryman states "plutôt coupable qu'innocent," or the contrary; if the majority declare him innocent, he is discharged; if guilty, he is criminally indicted; he may then submit to the judgment of the Court, or claim to be tried by the "grande enquête."

The functionaries who have sent the party to trial, that is, who have seized him, DO frequently sit on the enditement.

I do not agree with MM. Dumaresq and Hemery, in their "statement of the mode of proceeding and going to trial," &c., able and profound as that document is admitted to be, where, at page 42, they consider the "enditement to be equally well adapted for this preliminary step, in a criminal suit, as a grand jury in England," because their duties were originally the same. Now, the "enditement" does not find the bill at all; it tries the prisoner, and condemns or acquits him. The grand jury in England knows nothing of the case but what is brought before it: here some of the "enditement" in many cases have assisted to seize the offender; they may have received blows, or been assaulted, which I have witnessed, and are therefore more or less prejudiced against him. Again, should the offender be a personal friend of the police, or inimical to them, a leaning either way must take place: the country police should try the town cases, and the police of town, the cases of the country.

When the prisoner appeals to the grand jury, or Grande Enquête, he is remanded back to prison. As soon as may be, sometimes in two days, the Attorney General secretly summons eight persons or more from the parish in which the prisoner was seized, or the crime was committed, and eight from two of the neighbouring parishes, who are unknown to the prisoner, late on the evening preceding the day of trial, to form the Grande Enquête. These are usually men of the first consideration in their respective parishes. The prisoner is brought to the bar, and, on hearing the names of the jurymen called, may challenge them for cause. When 24 are unchallenged, they raise their right hand and are sworn. The trial proceeds, precisely as before the "enditement:" the grand jury retires with the sheriff to the jury chamber, where the most patient investigation, when necessary, takes place; doubtful evidence is sifted; and, when, as before, prepared, the foreman collects their opinions. If five out of the twenty four declare him to be innocent, and all the others guilty, he is absolved. If twenty or more declare him to be guilty, they proceed, in charge of the sheriff, to the chief magistrate, as the petty jury did, and severally declare their verdict. When unanimous, the foreman announces "Que la Grande Enqueste trouve le prisonnier à la barre plutot [illegible] que [illegible] du crime dont il est accusé."

It will be seen that the criminal code of this island, in a case of life and death, is probably the most humane in the universe: for it may happen that the "enditement" of 13 men, and 19 men of the "grande enqueste," all these last men of substance and considerable education, find a man guilty; yet five men with tender consciences, or religious scruples as to the punishment of death, outweigh the opinions of thirty two men.

Instances have been known where jurymen altered their verdict in going down stairs into Court.

All this practice is derived from the "Grand Coustumier," "de Suyte de Meurdre," Fo. xcij., where we find "que en enqueste de crime de roberie ou de larcin ou d'aultre malfaçon on a accoutumé de prēdre de trois paroisses: c'est assavoir de celle où l'accusé a converse, et celle où il fit la roberie, et de la prochaine paroisse de celle où il a converse," &c. It prescribes the same formality in cases of murder, with exceptions in cases of foreigners.

It also prescribes the secret mode of delivering the verdict. "Le bailly les doibt prendre secretement devāt quatre chevaliers, et demander à chascun par soy ce qu'il scet de la vie à cil qui est accusé et de ses faicts, et ce qu'il en croit." Also, "Que il fault vingt jureurs à ung acord pour condemner l'accusé." The jury were to keep their verdict secret, because of the hatred and inconvenience which might otherwise ensue.

8. By the Attorney General, on the report of the constable or his centenier.

Criminal cases, when once instituted, can only be stayed by the prisoner on change of plea, or by the Court in some cases.

On the 23rd November, 1836, Thomas Wilson was indicted for house breaking and robbery. There were two robberies charged against him: his advocate put in a plea that the Court could not consider the second charge, as he was accused twice for the same crime. The Court ruled that the Attorney General should abandon one of the charges. A plea in bar, "autrefois acquit," was then put in by advocate Hammond, as a prisoner "cannot be put in jeopardy twice for the same crime:" which was overruled.

Where an offender is very young, the Attorney General sometimes, for a first offence, recommends his being given up to his parents; in case of a repetition of the offence, the former would weigh against the prisoner.

9. Answered by replies six and eight; and the charge cannot be altered by the crown prosecutor after it has been recorded by the greffier. Every opportunity and any reasonable time is allowed to the prisoner to rebut any evidence which the Crown prosecutor may advance, to remodel or improve his defence.

10. It is sent to proof; and the Crown lawyer is "permis d'informer."

11. The same.

12. The same.

13. The same: in either case the proof establishes the guilt or innocence of the party.

14. Answered in reply 6.

15. The Attorney General sends a list of the witnesses to the sheriff, who issues a summons in writing to each, under his signature or that of his deputy, twenty four hours before the trial. See the forms annexed.

Witnesses can be compelled by the Royal Court, not by the mere summons, to attend and give evidence under pain of imprisonment, and to produce any documentary evidence the Attorney General might deem to be indispensable, at any period of the trial before the defence.

If any material witness, either for or against the prisoner, is on immediate unavoidable departure, or confined by severe illness, his evidence is taken in writing by the viscount, in the presence of the Crown prosecutor, the prisoner, and his counsel, who cross question the witnesses as they see fit.

16. Answered by reply 6.

17. When it is given.

18. When the case for the Crown has closed.

19. He may cross question the witnesses to any extent; and their evidence is taken in writing and added to their previous evidence.

20. The Crown prosecutor may call witnesses to the very last moment, the object being to obtain the whole truth.

21. All the evidence is carefully taken down by the solicitors, whose turn of duty it may be; it is then read to the witness, who, after verifying it, is desired to sign it by the bailly.

I have frequently seen a witness correct the sense, so as to give his own meaning.

22. The whole written evidence is lodged "au greffe" in charge of the greffier, to be referred to by the lawyers, Court, or juries. I have never heard of a case where it was pretended the evidence had not been correctly taken, because the Attorney General on the one hand, and the prisoner's counsel on the other, are on the watch to see that every word is taken. They vouch for it, as it were.

23. The advocate to the prisoner is allowed every latitude, up to the moment when the Crown prosecutor draws his conclusions.

24. The Attorney General is heard last; and there is no reply, unless as a point of explanation; nevertheless, in Marin's case, the reply lasted three quarters of an hour.

25. The Court decides the law. In Marin's case, for the murder of Mary Ann Bethel, the "Grande Enquête," of 24 of the most considerable men in their parishes, decided the fact "que le prisonnier à la barre est coupable d'homicide sur la personne de Mary Ann Bethel, sous des circonstances aggravantes." This verdict saved his life. Though the judges had no precedent for homicide "sous des circonstances aggravantes:" but the charter of Henry 7th, "no murderer, thief or banished man to be suffered to remain in the castle or the island," besides orders of council confirming sentences of the Royal Court, made the sentence of transportation in this case perfectly legal. The jury decide the fact: and the Court follow precedents, by registered Acts of Parliament and orders of council, or the codes, for the law.

26. Judgment is awarded by the bailli after consulting the jurats.

27. The Court, or any member of it, "desiring to be better informed to the end he may give better judgment in it, the judge shall cause him to receive satisfaction." Order of 19 May. 1671.

28. Much information will be obtained by reading the report of MM. Hemery and Dumaresq, and that interchanged with those gentlemen, by the then Attorney and Solicitor General of Jersey, of which I do myself the honour to forward a copy, for the use of Her Majesty's Commissioners.

Some singular cases which I have met with, I annex.

29. Strictly speaking, there is no appeal from a sentence of death: but the Court always allows time for an appeal to the Sovereign, by fixing the execution for a distant day.

In the cases of homicide and chance medley, which I have quoted, of 1689, the Sovereign directs reference to be made to the King in Council until his pleasure should be known.

30. In cases of imprisonment, the execution takes place from the day of sentence to the expiration of the sentence, unless the last day should be Sunday, when it is usual to give the prisoner the benefit of that sacred day.

In cases of banishment the prisoner, if possible, is sent to his native place or parish with a sheriff's pass.

Transportation beyond the seas takes place under the Order of Council I have quoted, and has been ratified by others; with a warrant from the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Execution is usually ordered for the Saturday following the delivery of the sentence of death, when the sheriff would proceed to it; but, as before observed, time is always allowed to afford the criminal a chance of a pardon,

By the formation of a Prison Board, in 1837, under the same regulations nearly as those in England and Wales, it has been decided, by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that executions, which formerly took place with much parade on Gallows Hill, attended by a multitude who attended them rather as a spectacle and a show than a scene to inspire awe, are in future to take place over the prison wall, facing one of the back streets.

The sheriff sees the sentence carried into effect on the judgment or act of the Court, an authenticated copy of which is his sufficient warrant.

Flogging in the street, and the pillory, of which I have quoted precedents, have become obsolete. Flogging is sometimes awarded to boys, and is carried on in presence of the surgeon to the prison and sheriff or his deputy; the surgeon is the judge how far the punishment may proceed.

31. In the code of laws I enclose, are the oaths required in the various processes I have described.*

32. The Bailly, the Queen's Procureur or Attorney General, the Vicomte or Sheriff, called Viscount in the Queen's Patent granted to me, the Queen's Advocate or Solicitor General, are all appointed by letters patent; the Bailly and Viscount during pleasure, the two others for life.

The Jurats are elected for life by the rate payers, an almost universal suffrage in the 12 parishes.

The constables and centeniers are elected by the same, in their respective parishes, to serve for three years.

The Bailly, Crown officers, and the jurats, may be removed for misconduct by the Crown; all the others by sentence of the Court only.

33. After much consideration of the criminal law of Jersey, I consider that, although it is not absolutely defined, it is still more merciful and mild than if it were so; the latitude which is left in the breast of the magistrate leans to the side of mercy; the jurats here are constantly on the side of the accused, with a stranger perhaps too much so.

I object, as I have stated, to the constable and officers forming the enditement. I consider they should not, at all events in their own parish, or where any one of them may have assisted in taking up the accused.

With respect to the formation of the Court, if our present system is to continue (though I admit it to be unsuited to the age in which we live), if a positive adherence to our charters, those of King John, the Henrys and Elizabeth, is insisted on, they should be fairly carried out, the judges should be elected by the Queen's Ministers and the states, according to the recommendation of Messieurs Osgoode, Swabey and Hobhouse, the last Commissioners who made their Report in 1812.

The reproach which is now levelled at the Court, that it is named through party influence, by persons inadequately taxed, or scarcely in some cases taxed at all, for they may not have paid a rate, would be got rid of, and the fair chain of representation would be kept up as it is in Guernsey.

This would be a return to our original constitution, which existed 400 years, the innovation having occurred in 1605. It would also be of manifest assistance to the Court, and greatly further the ends of justice, to restrict the Crown officers to official duty, paying them a proper salary for the sacrifice of their private practice, which they would necessarily make, instead of their being allowed to plead private causes in opposition to each other, sometimes even cases "en ajonction," where the Solicitor General may plead against his senior.

The following plan has been considered by an eminent authority an easy and practical mode to amend, without destroying, the constitution of Jersey.

"Rough draft of a plan for some modifications in the Royal Court of Jersey without disturbing its constitution."

A fixed salary to be given to the Bailly, Attorney General, Viscount, Solicitor General, Greffier or Recorder, Registrar, the Deputy Viscount, and the two Denunciators.

All their present fees of office, excepting consultation fees, to be paid over to the Queen's receivers, or to a sworn officer for their collection.

SERIES I.

J. Le Couteur Esq., Viscount.

All patronage to be given up to the Crown for the appointment of these officers in consideration of receiving the following salaries.

| Present Salary £ | Officers. | Increase. £ | |
|---|---|---|---|
| 300 | Bailly . . . . | 1000 | with allowance for an office and clerks. |
| 100 | Attorney General . . | 600 | |
| 150 | Viscount . . . . | 500 | |
| 50 | Solicitor General . . | 500 | on the retirement of the present officer, or their consent to the change. |
| .. | 1st Deputy Viscount . . | 200 | |
| .. | 2nd ditto ditto . . | 100 | |
| .. | 1st Denunciator . . | 200 | |
| .. | 2nd ditto . . . | 150 | |
| .. | Registrar . . . | 300 | |
| 45 | Greffier . . . . | 500 | |
| £645 | | £4050 | |

The amount of fees now received by those officers is supposed to be about 4000*l.* yearly: but, as one full third, if not half, more would be raised by an authorized person, which cannot be collected as the business is now carried on, a large profit would remain to the Crown, without taking into account the salaries now paid, nor the large revenue which will fall in on the demise of the Governor of Jersey.

The Crown officers should be restricted to performing the following duties. As public prosecutors; advisers to the Crown; and in every cause, as the "Procureurs du Roi" in France, stating the law of the case to the Court; then drawing their "conclusions," as a guide to the jurats.

By such a course the jurats, who, in nine cases of ten, have received no legal education, would no longer be, as I have frequently felt, perplexed by the Crown lawyers, one pleading a case "en ajonction" for one side, while the other was defending the adverse party, each giving a different version of the same law.

By this alteration, instead of being misled, the jurats would be instructed and guided.

It may be objected that the jurats do not always now follow the law as it is laid down by the Crown lawyers; how should they do so under the circumstances I have described? But, if it were felt that the sole duty of these officers was to enlighten the Court, a vast confidence in their opinions would be suddenly established, the jurats would feel the advantage of a support which they require, the public would possess the double guarantee of a sound legal opinion and the check of the public press, if the Court would venture to set aside the law. It would seem that, without aiming at a complete change, this reform would have a beneficial tendency, by giving dignity to the tribunal, with an ultimate confidence in its decisions, which would neces sarily diminish the appeals to the Sovereign in Council.

Hence, the jurats being elected by the terms of the constitution of King John, all the officers of the Court paid by the Crown (and removable at pleasure) for the mere performance of public duties, a greater dignity would be imparted to the bench.

This plan is suggested in mere deference to the feelings of the people, who are attached to their old venerated constitution. But, if one in harmony with the spirit of the age were in contemplation, the most proper form of a Court in Jersey would be, an open bar, from which to select three judges, natives, or such as have practised at that bar, with the usual officers, to determine all matters, civil and criminal. All appeals to be heard in the Channel Islands by the circuit judge before or after his visit to Winchester. Some of the present jurats to act as justices of the peace for the trial of petty cases, and as in the Courts of Requests, for which duties they would be fully qualified. This system would be more in the spirit of the age: but the people of Jersey are scarcely yet prepared for so entire a reform, though it is believed that a great many of the gentry, farmers and intelligent tradespeople are so.

Jerseymen, as a body, are attached to their ancient and venerated (for, when justly administered, it is a wise) constitution; under it they have risen to singular happiness, contentment and virtue; they are peaceable, industrious, temperate, brave and wealthy; they are thankful to Divine Providence for having so long enjoyed signal blessings. Thus they have cause to fear that any great or sudden change might be for the worse.

No. 25.

Francis Godfray, Esq., Greffier. 20 July, 1846.

Answers of Francis Godfray, Esq., Greffier of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the first series of questions.

1. I was attorney of the Royal Courts, from the year 1801 to 1812, when I was appointed greffier, and have ever since filled the duties of that office.

2. The Royal Court is the only tribunal exercising criminal jurisdiction in the island. Its jurisdiction was established by a charter of King John, when the island was separated from the duchy of Normandy. It extends over all offences and crimes, except high treason.

3. The Vieux Coustumier de Normandie, commented upon by Rouillé and subsequent authors, was formerly the authority principally relied upon in the discussion of questions arising upon the criminal law. It cannot now be called an authority, many of its enactments being no more in use, and others greatly modified on the principle of the English law.

4. When it is suspected that a party has committed an offence, the constable of the parish, or one of the officers next under him (the centeniers), upon receiving information of the offence, proceeds, with the assistance of his subordinate officers, to arrest the party suspected, of which he gives information to the bailiff or chief magistrate, who, if he finds sufficient ground for an accusation, gives a written order to the constable, addressed to the gaoler, authorizing him to detain provisionally in his custody the suspected party: and, the next court day or as soon as possible, the constable presents him before the court, with a report of all the circumstances which have come to his knowledge concerning the suspicion.

5. When the accused party is presented before the Royal Court, and admits the facts laid to his charge, the court exercises summary jurisdiction: and, if he denies the facts and the accusation is not of sufficient gravity to be sent to a jury, the court orders evidence to be heard; and after hearing such evidence it deals summarily with the case.

6. Where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, when the constable presents the accused party before the court, with his report of the informations that have come to his knowledge on the subject, Her Majesty's Attorney General forms his accusation on that report, after which the accused party pleads to the accusation. If he does not plead guilty, he is, according to the circumstances and nature of the case, either sent to prison or admitted to bail for his reappearance, under a penalty fixed by the court.

7. The Royal Court is the only tribunal authorized to take cognizance of accusations, either summarily or otherwise. To constitute a court, the bailiff and two jurats must attend, and may decide on summary accusations. The court, so constituted, is also competent to proceed in all stages of the accusation, until the case comes before the first jury, or enditement, when no less than seven of the twelve jurats, with the bailiff, must be present. The bailiff who has given the order for the detention of the accused party is capable of acting as member of the court.

8. The proceedings against the accused party are instituted by Her Majesty's Attorney General, who may abandon the proceedings at any stage, if he does not find the accusation supported by sufficient proofs. This abandonment has the same effect as an acquitment by a jury.

9. The charge against the party accused is put into a definite form in writing, when he is for the first time presented before the court. The accuser cannot afterwards vary the form or substance of the charge.

10. If the party charged admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, the Royal Court decides whether they are relevant.

11. If the party charged denies the facts alleged against him, the Attorney General is authorized by the court to call witnesses on a future day.

12. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, he is not thereby concluded as to the facts.

13. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the facts, he is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of one or more advocates, and one or more attorneys chosen by him. In cases where the party accused is unable to defray the expense of legal assistance, his legal advisers act gratuitously. Though the accused may retain several legal advisers, only one is allowed to speak in his defence.

15. After the accused party has been for the first time presented before the court, the Attorney General gives the names of his witnesses to the summoning officer, who warns them to attend at court, the day or days appointed to hear their depositions: the accused party causes the names of his witnesses to be given to the Attorney General, who has them summoned to attend in the same manner as his own. If the witnesses do not attend, the court orders them to be arrested by the vicomte or dénonciateur, and produced before the court.

16. Evidence is first received in presence of the court, the next time the accused party is brought forward, after his first pleading to the accusation; this takes place in his presence, and that of the Attorney General.

17. The party accused is present in court when the evidence is produced against him.

18. The party accused is allowed to produce evidence to meet that produced against him, generally on a future day, previous to the pleadings before the last Jury or Grande Enquête. Should the case not have been sent before a jury, the evidence of both parties are heard on the same day, the witnesses to support the charge being first heard, and afterwards those of the accused.

19. The party accused is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him, immediately after they have answered the questions put to them by the Attorney General.

20. Fresh evidence may be produced, either for or against the party accused, at any stage previous to the calling of the first jury or enditement: but in some cases fresh evidence has been further allowed to the accused party, in presence of the first and even second jury; but the accuser is not allowed to do so.

21. When the accusation is of a sufficient gravity to be submitted to a jury, the whole of the evidence received at the respective stages of the proceeding is taken down in writing; but, for offences which are not of a serious nature, the witnesses are heard vivâ voce, and the Court gives judgment.

22. The evidence which is taken down in writing is afterwards read to the first jury or enditement, composed of the constable and twelve of his officers, and also to the last jury or grande enquête, which is composed of twenty four men selected by the Attorney General. The depositions being taken in writing before the Court, in presence of the accuser and the prisoner and his counsel, neither party is allowed to give proof that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to, as either party is allowed to have any error corrected at the time the evidence is taken down in writing.

23. The counsel for the party charged is allowed to be heard on questions of fact and law, and in examining and cross-examining witnesses.

24. The Attorney General has the privilege of being heard the last.

25. The bailiff and jurats are the functionaries who decide both on the law and facts in summary cases; and in other cases they decide on the law only, and the jury on the fact.

26. Judgment is awarded by the Royal Court.

27. The court has the power to adjourn or suspend the proceedings at any stage, in cases where the accused party, by illness, or his counsel, from reasonable cause, cannot attend, or from other unforeseen circumstances which the court finds sufficient.

28. It is sufficiently detailed.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Francis Godfray, Esq., Greffier. 20 July, 1846.

29. When the pleas either of the Attorney General or of the accused party are orveruled by the inferior number of the court, composed of the bailiff and two jurats, the same question may again be brought forward before the full court, composed of the bailiff and not less than seven jurats on the day the first jury is called.

30. When judgment is finally given against the accused party, it is the duty of the Vicomte to see that the sentence is put into execution.

31. Enclosed are the forms used at the various steps of the proceedings with the oaths taken by the witnesses, (No. 1.), as also that of the bailiff and of the jurats when first admitted to office, to which is added the oath of the men composing the last jury or grande enquête. To the first jury or enditement no oath is administered, it being considered that they are acting upon the oath they took at their admission into office. Enclosed is also the form of the oath taken by the constable and his subordinate officers. (No. 2.)

32. The bailiff is appointed by Her Majesty during life or pleasure. The jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers in the island; the constables, as well as the centeniers, their next subordinate officers, are elected by the rate-payers in their repective parishes for three years. The other subordinate officers under the constable are elected by the parish assembly, composed of the principal inhabitants and the constable and the other officers under him. They remain in office, viz.: the vingteniers three years; the officiers du connétable of the parish of St. Hélier four years; and those of the other parishes seven years. Either of the above named public officers, the bailiff and jurats excepted, may be removed by the Royal Court for misdemeanor, or at their own request, by infirmity or old age; but the jurats, who are elected for life, cannot obtain their discharge, or be removed, without an order from Her Majesty in council.

33 and 34. These questions are answered by the enclosed draught of a bill on the mode of proceeding in criminal causes, which was discussed in the States on the 26th August, 1836, and which has remained dormant ever since (No. 3). And also by the accompanying extract of the statement transmitted to His Majesty in council, in the year 1790, by James Hemery, Esq., one of the jurats of the Royal Court, and John Dumaresq, Esq., then an advocate, and subsequently lieutenant bailiff, on the mode of proceeding and of going to trial in the Royal Court of this island, in all causes, criminal, civil and mixed. 1.—A Pierre Le Sueur, Esq., Connétable de la paroisse de St. Hélier.

MONSIEUR,

Lundi, le 25 du courant, je fus informé, vers les dix heures du soir, qu'un rapt avoit été commis sur une jeune fille demeurant dans Halket Street. Je me rendis de suite, accompagné de Mons. Henry Luce Manuel, officier du connétable, chez Mrs. Raymond, qui tient une auberge dans la dite rue, et chez laquelle on m'avoit informé que je trouverais l'individu qui avoit commis le rapt, ainsi que la jeune fille qui avoit du être violée. Mons. le Docteur Harding, médecin accoucheur, se trouvait chez Mrs. Raymond lorsque j'entrai; et il me dit qu'il avoit été appelé pour examiner et donner ses soins à Caroline Elizabeth Raymond, fille de la susdite Mrs. Raymond, et qu'il craignait que cette enfant, âgée de dix ans et quelques mois, avoit été victime d'un attentat sur sa personne. Accompagné du Docteur Harding, je procédai à interroger la dite Caroline Elizabeth Raymond; et elle me déclara que le Vendredi précédent, pendant que sa mère était absente de la maison, le nommé Philippe Le Geyt, un des locataires de la dite maison, l'avoit entraînée contre sa volonté dans un appartement qu'elle me désigna; et que là, s'y étant enfermé avec elle, il avoit commis un assaut grave sur sa personne et avoit cherché à la violer. Après avoir reçu la déclaration de la dite Caroline Elizabeth Raymond, je questionnai Philippe Le Geyt, l'individu qu'elle accusait; il nia avoir eu aucune communication criminelle avec la dite Caroline Elizabeth Raymond: mais je crus, d'après les faits et déclarations de cette jeune fille, devoir saisir le dit Philippe Le Geyt, et avec la sanction de Ph. Le Gallais, Esq, Juré Justicier, le loger en prison. De tout quoi j'ai l'honneur de vous faire ce present rapport.

4.—Extract of a Statement of the Mode of Proceeding and of going to Trial in the Royal Court of Jersey in all Causes, Criminal, Civil and Mixed, prepared in consequence of an Order from the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council, dated the 21st July, 1789, by James Hemery and John Dumaresq, Esqrs., Deputies of the States of Jersey.

WE now come to the proceedings in criminal causes; and we must separate from these the case of high treason, because there is no authority in the island competent to acquit, punish, or even to examine witnesses on the charge. The governor, upon suspicion that this high crime has been committed by any one, is directed by an ordinance of Henry VII., of the 17th of June, 1495, confirmed again by the ordinances of 1591, to seize and imprison the person suspected, calling to his assistance, for this purpose, two of the jurats; but they have no power to proceed further. The inconvenience resulting from this lame authority, in case the accused should be innocent, is so great that we think it our duty to represent it to your Lordships as a grievance. Experience has shown, within some years past, that a loyal subject could be accused of such a crime, and for want of knowing what tribunal to recur to for his trial, remained for many months in confinement.

The proceedings in other criminal suits are as follow:—It is, in the first place, the duty of every constable within his parish, assisted by his officers, to apprehend all culprits, particularly those who may be guilty of offences deserving a corporal punishment, and to present them before the Court. This is enjoined to the constables by the oath they take when admitted into office; and it is moreover

JERSEY.

Answers to Questions.

Francis Godfray, Esq., Greffier. 20 July, 1846.

enacted by the 14th Article of the Ordinances of the Commissioners, in 1562, "that if any transgressor of the ordinances be found deserving corporal punishment, he shall be presented without delay before the Court by the constable and the sworn officers of his parish, that he may be punished according to the exigency of the case."

When an offender is thus taken up the officer of the police puts him in custody, and at the same time informs the chief magistrate of it. On the next Court day he presents him, and gives in a report in writing, containing the accusation and the informations he has received on the subject. The accused is then arraigned, or called upon to say what he chooses in his justification. In doing this the Court usually point out to him the privilege he has of choosing any one of the advocates for his counsel. He then, with the advice of his advocate, makes what is called his declaration (generally not guilty), which is taken down in writing by the greffier.

The next consideration, whether the accused shall be committed or bailed, is at the discretion of the Court. Some great offences have been allowed bail; others, of a much inferior degree, nay, of a most trivial nature, have been refused it. Many instances of this might be quoted; but it would only serve to swell still more this statement, which is already too voluminous.

The 12th Article of the Constitutions of King John enacts: "Item, quod nullus debet imprisonari in castro, nisi in casu criminali, vitam vel membrum tangente, et hoc per judicium duodecim coronatorum juratorum, sed in aliis liberis prisonis ad hoc deputatis."

The same subject is considered, on similar principles, in the 6th chapter of the Grand Coûtumier, which treats of justicement. There we find that "King Philip established a law in Normandy, ordering all bailiffs to swear that they would faithfully observe that no one should be put in prison or confinement except for cause appertaining to the plea of the sword, or for cause involving the peril of life or limbs. And that if any one were taken up for any other cause he should be set free (without taking from him money or gain) upon his giving sufficient bail that he would appear at the term appointed." And further, the same book, treating of Haro, says, "that for crimes, concerning which there is danger of life or limb, the offenders are to be put in prison and held fast; that those actions are called criminal by which a man may lose life or limb; that others are called simple actions, because the defaulter is simply chastised for them, as a child with a rod."

Upon the accused's being ordered to prison or admitted to bail, the King's procureur asks permission d'informer, viz., leave to file an information against the offender, which is granted of course in every criminal suit, and this puts an end to the business for that day.

On some subsequent Court day the prisoner is again brought up, to be present at the examination of witnesses summoned by the King's procureur. This is done before two jurats only. The accusation is then read afresh to the prisoner, as well as his former declaration, and he is asked if he have anything to vary from what he first declared, which he may do in any stage of the proceeding. The prisoner is also allowed to suggest such questions to the witnesses as he thinks proper, and to point out witnesses for his justification or character.

After the witnesses have declared what they know of the matter, their deposition is taken down in writing by the greffier, or by any of the advocates or attorneys who may be present at Court; and it has happened sometimes (however unintentionally) that the depositions taken down have varied materially from the vivâ voce evidence. The depositions are then collected by the greffier, and kept in his possession. The accused is remanded to prison; and the King's procureur obtains leave d'informer plus outre, viz., to call more witnesses.

This calling up of the prisoner before the Court, taking of depositions, and remanding him to prison, may be repeated as often as the King's procureur thinks proper; and it is done frequently, and during a considerable space of time. J. B. Le Blanc Du Hamel was accused of having stolen a watch, and was presented before the Court on the 1st of July, 1766, and committed. This man was brought to Court and sent back to prison seven times before he was tried, which was not till the 27th of October following.

Matthew Alexandre, in an accusation of libel brought on against him by William Charles Lempriere, Esq., lieutenant bailly, was called before the Court on the same charge no less than 13 times at the suit of the two King's officers, who thought proper, in this case, to join in the prosecution, and that during the space of more than two years, viz., from the 15th of October, 1785, to the 17th of November, 1787; on which last day the Court refused the trial by jury to Alexandre, but did not proceed to trial themselves, and no more has been heard of the prosecution since that day.

When the King's procureur declares he has no more witnesses to call, the information is closed; and then, and not before, comes the question whether the prisoner shall be judged by the Court, or whether the constable and the 12 sworn officers of the parish to which he belongs shall be called to indict him.

We need not, as we conceive, point out the impropriety of this course of proceeding. The constable and his 12 officers are styled, in the language of the country, l'enditement; and when the majority of them find a prisoner rather guilty (this is the term of their report) than innocent, he is said to be criminally indicted, and a jury (if demanded by the prisoner) is then called to try the fact. The first inquiry carries in all its parts such striking features of the functions of a grand jury in England, as leave no room to doubt but that they were originally constituted for the same purpose, and (proportion kept) both equally well adapted for this preliminary step in a criminal suit.

It appears, indeed, from a great number of cases in the old books of the Court, that the constable and his officers exercised this function prior to the informations.

By the article of the ordinances of the Commissioners in 1562, which has been quoted before, it would seem that the duty prescribed there to the constable and his sworn officers to present before the Court such offenders as were found deserving a corporal punishment, implies some prior examination on the part of the constable and his officers. And in the 32nd article of the ordinances of the subsequent Commissioners, in 1591, this point is further explained in this way: "When any person shall be lawfully accused, and shall not confess nor be taken in the fact, such person shall be formally indicted (as it is customary in indictments); and if upon this he be found guilty, he may submit to a legal inquest." In the following article of the said ordinances it is provided that witnesses are to be called to give evidence of the facts before the criminal inquest. From all this it appears that the indictment was to be the next step to the accusation, and to take place before the calling of witnesses.

Mr. Le Geyt, who was chief magistrate of this island about a century ago, has left the following observations on the subject:—

"Indictment, in the old style of the bar, signified a denunciation. To indict was to denounce a man in Court as a criminal. It is in this sense that an Act in our Rolls of 1574, the 6th of October, mentions that the King's procurator could not, ex officio, put a man in gaol without a party adjoined or a sufficient indictment. And in 1603, the 8th of October, on the current rumour than Jean René had stolen the purse of one named Du Tot, the constable of Heliers was ordered to summon the sworn officers (in order to proceed to the indictment if he were found guilty), together with the said Du Tot and other informers, who might be made use of in the cause. So early as that time a denunciation or indictment was not received without some plausible foundation. It appears by the records of itinerant judges, that formerly the islanders were indicted for all manner of cases of assize by six men, and no more. The indictment was secret and apart, and none of the men who served in it could make part of the inquest. It is not a hundred years since the indictments were still made by six men. In 1563, the 17th of March, it is mentioned that six men, sworn, made their report that two persons accused were rather thieves than loyal men, &c.; and in 1611, the 20th of July, that the constable and six men, sworn, of the parish of St. Ouen, differing in opinion concerning the crime of Rachel le Blanc, the Court had stayed the proceeding, and deferred it to the next term of Catel, in order to have the advice of the absent justices, the officers being charged to get more ample information. In the same year, on the 5th of December, it is declared that, if the men on oath differ, 12 must be called to form the indictment. From hence, I believe, originated the custom of 12 sworn men assisting the constable or centenier of the parish of the criminal in the indictment, as they do at present, and never fewer.

"There are numberless sentences in criminal matters and inquests in which there is no trace at all of indictment. Indictments are for doubtful cases only. They are now something more than they were formerly. The indictment was, in a manner of speaking, only an official accusation; and it is now a species of sentence and of judgment of credence on all the proofs which the public officers and the private prosecutor, if there be any, may have produced. The indictment follows the information; and the indictment was formerly as the first step in a criminal suit, at least, for want of an accuser. I believe, nevertheless, that it is, even now, allowed to have witnesses and proofs after the indictment, and even on the day on which the inquest is called; for it were to be wished that the men who compose both the one and the other should themselves hear the witnesses vivâ voce."

We see in some old Acts, as Mr. Le Geyt observes, that six men were deemed sufficient for an indictment. We also find in others that anciently a jury might consist of 12 men only in criminal cases; whereas at present the usage is to have 24.

It has been held that, if the Court find from the information they have received that the accusation is sufficiently proved, they have a right to proceed to trial without indictment or jury. And there are many precedents in the rolls which prove that they have exercised this power. We shall take notice of one only, which is that of Elizabeth Le Gros, who, on the 6th of November, 1750, was tried by the Court for the murder of a bastard child, and without indictment, or jury, or confession of her crime, was found guilty by the Court, sentenced to death, and executed; and, what appears extraordinary in this case is, that Phil. Falle, her accomplice, as he is frequently called in the judgment of the Court, was allowed the benefit of a jury, and acquitted on the 4th June, 1751.

It must at the same time be observed that the said late majority of the Royal Court do not claim that power at present, however they may have exercised it formerly; for in their observations to your Lordships, which have been mentioned before, they say that the calling an enditement is only dispensed with "when the prisoner confesses the fact;" for though the Court did formerly proceed without enditement or enquête when the charge appeared to be sufficiently proved, and this agreeably to the coutûme of Normandy, yet this hath not been done for a long time past, and it is now established as an invariable rule to call an enditement when the prisoner has pleaded not guilty.

The enditement then being summoned and present, to the number of 13, including the constable, the prisoner is asked if he have any exception to either of them, and a challenge for cause (the validity of which is decided by the Court) is allowed, but not otherwise. To provide against this, one or two more than the number requisite are usually present. Seven jurats at least must attend upon an indictment. The proceedings are now read through by the King's Procureur beginning by the accusation or charge against the prisoner; then his arraignment and plea; and lastly the depositions.

After this is done, the prisoner is heard in his defence by means of an advocate, and the King's Procureur next in his observations. Then the men of the indictment retire in private with the vicomte, taking with them the depositions and other parts of the procedure to consider the whole matter over again, if they think proper. No oath is administered to them upon this (however solemn) inquiry; yet they are supposed to speak upon oath when they bring in their report, for they are asked by the chief magistrate whether, upon the oath which they took when admitted into office (which may be 10 years back or more), they believe in their conscience the prisoner to be rather guilty than innocent, or rather innocent than guilty, of the crime laid to his charge.

The magistrates, in order to receive the report of the enditement, assemble in a corner of the Court-house, and there call the men up one by one. In this place each gives his opinion or answer to the question just mentioned as he passes, and the whole is conducted with an appearance of mystery. If the majority of the 13 are of opinion that the prisoner is rather innocent than guilty, he is enlarged. If, on the contrary, the majority find the prisoner rather guilty than innocent, he is criminally indicted; and then the prisoner has his option of either submitting to the Court for judgment, or appealing to a jury upon the fact.

In the first case, the Court proceed immediately to sentence. In the other, the prisoner is sent back to gaol, generally in irons, until a jury can be summoned, which is usually done in the course of a week.

This jury is composed of 24 persons, taken from three different parishes, eight of them from the prisoner's parish, and the rest from the two neighbouring parishes in equal proportions. These men of the jury are named by the King's Procureur, secretly, without the knowledge either of the prisoner or of any other person; and the summons they receive is usually served late in the evening preceding the day of their attendance.

We beg leave here to make two observations on the mode of empannelling a jury. In the first place, it seems to us improper that a jury should be named by the King's Procureur, who is officially bound to prosecute the offenders, more particularly as a peremptory challenge of jurors is not allowed the prisoner. In the 33rd article of the Ordinances of the Commissioners, in 1591, it is said that juries shall be indifferently chosen by the officers of His Majesty; but it is not explained who are meant by "the officers of His Majesty," whether the Procureur, the advocate, or the vicomte, or all of them together, for they are all officers of His Majesty, and equally so, by patent.

In the second place, we foresee inconveniences which may arise from the circumstance of taking the jury from the prisoner's parish and the two neighbouring parishes, because it may happen that several persons of different parishes shall be accomplices in one and the same crime, and then they must be tried by separate juries. Whereas if juries were chosen from the district where the fact is supposed to be committed, this inconvenience would be removed.

When the Court are met for the trial by jury in a criminal cause, all the jurats are obliged to attend; seven at least must be present. The prisoner is then brought to the bar, and the men of the jury are called over one by one. The prisoner may challenge any of them for cause only, as in the case of an indictment. When 24 are passed without challenge, the jury are sworn in a body together, and they take their places. Here the same order is observed as at the indictment, and the papers read, together with the record of the indictment. No vivâ voce evidence is produced to the jury, or any other matter brought than what appeared before. The prisoner makes his defence again, and the King's Procureur is also heard; after which the jury retire.

At the return of the jury into Court, the same mysterious proceedings take place again as upon the indictment, and the same question is put to each of them. The chief magistrate, after that, resumes his chair, and delivers the verdict of the jury, without mentioning the number that have cast the prisoner, or the number that have acquitted him; but the result of the whole, which is admitted to be that if 5 out of the 24 do not find the fact, the prisoner is acquitted. If, on the other hand, 20 or more find him guilty, he is duly convicted of the crime, and the Court proceed to judgment.

We shall venture to make a few remarks on these modes of trial, first by indictment, and then by inquest, and submit, with great deference, to your Lordships whether this might not be better regulated to answer the purposes of justice and general conveniency. In the first place, we conceive it unnecessary that there should be two trials for the same accusation. An appeal from one tribunal, who is supposed to have examined, as fully and as scrupulously as possible, all the circumstances for and against the prisoner, to another tribunal who can do no more, is likely to create mutual prejudices and unfriendly dispositions. One solemn and regular trial would tend better (as we humbly presume) to the conviction of the guilty, as well as to the protection of the innocent. But, then, the previous inquiry by the constable and his officers, in the shape of a grand jury, and according to the ancient system, should be renewed, and they should all of them be sworn before the Court, and informed of their duty in that respect by the magistrate; after which they should retire, as they do at present, with the vicomte, and examine the accusation and witnesses upon it if necessary. It would also be better to take the constable and officers from the parish where the crime is supposed to have been committed, than from the prisoner's parish, for the reasons before mentioned.

As to the number which at present compose the jury in criminal cases, and the form and effect of their report, we humbly conceive it also liable to great objections. It seems to us that 12 men, agreeing in opinion, are quite sufficient to establish a verdict. A concurrence of opinion imposes on a jury the necessity of investigating the truth at a time when they are left to themselves, and perhaps best able to discover it. Neither does the number of 24 seem proportionate to the extent of this island; yet, if that number were summoned, and the prisoner allowed to challenge peremptorily one half of them, no inconvenience, as is conceived, would arise from it. On the one hand, the punishment of an offender could leave no remorse with the Court or jury on account of some of the jurors supposing him innocent; on the other hand, no person would be punished but by the concurring voice of at least 19 of his fellow subjects, viz., 7 of the enditement and the 12 jurors. And if a prejudice should remain in favour of the present form, because offenders are not convicted but by the opinion of 20 of their equals, the enditement might consist of 15 instead of 13, then the full number of 20 must meet in opinion for the conviction of the guilty.

We hope your Lordships will pardon our having presumed thus far. These suggestions are offered with the utmost deference, and proceed from our most anxious desire to obtain some regular and fixed rule in criminal causes in this island.

ANSWERS TO THE SECOND SERIES OF QUESTIONS.

No. 1.

SERIES II.

Bailiff and Jurats of Royal Court. 10 Aug., 1846.

The Answer of the Bailiff and Jurats of the Royal Court of Jersey to the Second Series of Questions.

1. A person is not considered responsible before he is seven years of age, nor until he has attained years of discretion. Although we know of no distinction in this respect between different offences, it is probable that, if a capital crime were committed by an infant between the ages of seven and fourteen, the amount of responsibility would much depend upon the degree of intelligence which the party accused would be found to possess.

2. If it were a minor offence, the Court would order the lunatic to be placed under the care of a Curateur, whose duties are analogous to those of a Committee of a Lunatic in England. Should the party accused be acquitted of a capital crime on the ground of insanity, or if in the course of the proceedings it should be clear to the Court that the accused was decidedly mad, the Court would refer the proceedings to her Majesty in Council, and remand the accused until her Majesty's pleasure should be known thereupon. Incapacity to distinguish right from wrong.

3. In general, she is not responsible when she commits an offence in the presence or by the coercion of her husband; but we are of opinion that for treason, murder, and other heinous crimes, and for certain misdemeanours, she would be considered responsible.

4. With the exception stated in the answer to the preceding question, we are not aware of any.

5. 1st. If not the actual perpetrator, but present at the time of the offence, and assisting the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching, or otherwise, he would be found guilty of aiding, assisting or participating, as the case may be.

2nd. If not present, but that he instigated or assisted by counsel or otherwise the actual perpetrator before the time of perpetration, then he would be found guilty accordingly.

3rd. If not present, but that he, after the perpetration, assisted by counsel or otherwise the actual perpetrator, he would be found guilty as an accessory after the fact.

6. The act of accusation generally charges the accused with the offence, or with having aided, assisted or participated in the commission of the crime. He may also be charged with a specific crime, as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence.

7. He may be charged alone. It is not necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been convicted previously.

8. There is no distinction.

9. In Jersey the distinction between principals of the first and second degree does not exist. All persons present, or who in any manner are aiding, assisting or participating in the commission of an offence, may be convicted.

10. Yes. The person who is proved not to have participated in the crime is acquitted.

11. Both these questions may be answered affirmatively.

12. In cases of délits or misdemeanours, the party charged must be prosecuted within a year and a day. But, for murder and other heinous crimes, a prosecution by the old Norman law must have been instituted within twenty years from the commission of the crime. But we have no decision on the subject.

13. In the Island of Jersey or on the high seas.

14. None.

15. "Crimes et délits." "Crimes" are punished capitally or by fine and imprisonment, with hard labour and pillory, with banishment or transportation. "Délits" by fine or imprisonment, with hard labour, or both, and sometimes whipping.

The Answers of Philip Le Maistre, Esq., Jurat of the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey, to the Second Series of Questions. P. Le Maistre, Esq.

1. There is no age, specified by law, at which a person is not responsible to the criminal law. Lads from eight to twelve years of age, and upwards, are almost weekly punished by sentence of the Court, the punishment being solitary confinement, or private whipping. A distinction is made with respect to offenders of tender age committing a capital offence.

2. If for a misdemeanour, the prosecution would instantly be abandoned; but if for a capital crime, it cannot be abandoned until a verdict setting forth that the party charged had committed the act while labouring under insanity. If it were alleged that the accused party is of unsound mind, the Court would appoint two or more medical referees to examine the party, charging them to give evidence upon oath as to his state of mind.

3. In cases of misdemeanour, the Court has held that a married woman, living under the same roof with her husband, is not responsible to the criminal law, except in capital crimes.

4. I am not aware of any distinction being made in that respect.

5. (1.) He is found guilty as an accomplice.
(2.) Likewise found guilty as an accomplice.
(3.) Firstly, Found guilty of having aided and assisted the actual perpetrator.
Secondly, Subject to punishment at the discretion of the Court.

6. He cannot be charged with the principal offence, but merely of a specific crime, as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence.

7. The party participating is always charged together with the actual perpetrator; but he could be charged alone if the principal offender had absconded and was not within the reach of justice; it is not, therefore, necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been convicted previously, whatever may be the nature of the offence.

8. The answer to this question is, I think, contained in the previous one.

9. The Court, to my knowledge, has never construed a party to be present when he was actually absent, such distinctions being unknown in this bailiwick.

10. Any number may be charged in a single prosecution. When a party is charged in a joint offence, and it is proved that he did not participate in it, the Jury is bound to return a verdict of Not guilty, and he is liberated instanter.

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party. An offence committed by the party alone cannot be charged in the same prosecution with one committed by him jointly with another person.

12. There is no limitation as to the time within which a prosecution must be instituted in criminal cases.

13. It must have been committed within the bailiwick.

14. None whatever.

15. In the absence of statute or written law respecting the mode of procedure in criminal cases, the classification of offences is left to the Public Prosecutor (the Attorney General), who prefers an indictment against the prisoner according to the nature of the offence; and each offender is dealt with and punished in conformity to usage, custom or precedent.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES II.

J. Hammond, Esq. 31 July, 1846.

No. 3.

The Answers of John Hammond, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the Second Series of Questions.

1. We have no law defining or declaring at what period of nonage a party will not be legally responsible for a criminal offence. Judging by the practice observed in our Court, I would consider that in this respect we would follow the rule, depending, not so much upon the age, as upon the offender's understanding and mental capacity, having regard, nevertheless, to the youth of the party charged, especially as related to the amount of punishment. I remember no instance where a party under the age of puberty has suffered for a felony; it would be otherwise in some instances for a mere misdemeanor. The quotation in the margin expresses closely the practice that would, I think, be followed in Jersey.*

2. The fact of the prisoner's insanity at the time he committed the act, for which he stood charged, would have the effect of staying proceedings, if ascertained before he was regularly arraigned: and ulterior measures would be adopted by the Court consequent upon that fact†. If brought to light by the evidence upon the trial, it would give rise to an acquittal; and precautionary measures for the future would be taken to protect society. As regards the test of unsoundness of mind that would be received by the Court, I conceive that the general principles of law would be the guide. The usual definition or distinction of knowledge between right and wrong would be probably the basis of such an investigation: but I think another definition of aberration, namely, whether the individual charged had at the time of committing the imputed act any power of control over his actions, and also the difficult but important question of the derangement of the moral faculties of the individual, would likewise be taken into consideration. Such a question would, of course, be mainly regulated by the facts of the case, which are too numerous and multiform to be minutely enumerated. The old "coutume" on this subject is laid down by Terrien, as quoted in the margin‡.

3. and 4. In cases of theft, I conceive that, were a married woman, coerced by her husband, present or aiding in consequence of such coercion, she would not be responsible to the law for the deed; neither would she be amenable for harbouring or sheltering her suspected or guilty husband. I do not think this irresponsibility, resulting from the peculiar relation of life between the husband and wife, would be extended to any other party where threats or coercion had been exercised, unless the threat or menace really involved imminent and immediate danger of life or limb. These remarks do not relate to any local law on this subject, as we have none.

5. With respect to the supposed cases here laid down, we would, in their investigation, be guided by the general principles regarding principals and accessories.

In the (1) instance, I consider the party present, under the circumstances described, would be deemed a principal.

In the (2) as an accessory before the fact.

In the (3) as an accessory after the fact.

We have a local law to this effect. "Ceux qui seront accessoires en crimes de meurtres, ou qui en félonie, après le crime commis, recevront ou favoriseront les coupables avant leur conviction, ou qui emporteront ou favoriseront l'évasion des coupables hors de l'île, après que proclamation aura été faite de les appréhender; et ceux qui briseront la prison, ou assisteront tels délinquants, seront punis par amende et emprisonnement."

6. If a party were assisting, by watching, during the commission of an offence, I conceive that he would, in that case, be considered as a principal, though not the actual perpetrator of the deed, nor actually present where it was committed.

7. In the mode of prosecuting for offences where there are principals and accessories, or where the prisoner or prisoners may be the one or the other, there is no fixed rule by our practice, as to the order in which they may be tried. The more usual mode is to charge the party or parties accused as principals, and by a second count as participators; and, if the evidence only reaches him or them in the second capacity, he or they are acquitted of the first part of the accusation, and convicted on the second clause. By our practice, an accessory may be charged and convicted either before or after a prosecution against a principal.

8. I know of no legal distinction consequent upon the difference of the offence; but I know of no party having been prosecuted here, as an accessory before the fact in murder, before the principal was proceeded against; at least, no such case has occurred in the course of my practice.

9. My answer to question 6 will illustrate what I consider constructive presence. But on all these points, as before stated, we have no legal code defining these distinctions.

10. More than one party can be charged in a single accusation. If after investigation it appears that one or more of the parties arraigned are not guilty of participation, they are discharged forthwith.

11. Several offences may be included in a single prosecution against the same party; and he may be accused of having committed an offence alone, in the same prosecution in which he is tried for an offence committed by him jointly with others.

12. On this question, the law is thus stated by Terrien.

* On a douté si un impubère pouvoit être poursuivi actione furti; et l'on a décidé que l'impubère ne peut être coupable de ce délit s'il n'ést proche de sa puberté, et s'il ne connoit qu'en dérobant il fait mal, quando malitia supplet ætatem. Si la foblesse de l'age n'empêche pas qu'on ne punisse les délits des impubères, elle fait au moins modérer les pein es.—Roupeau de la Combe.

S'aucun est en telle manière forcené que l'on doye douter de sa forcenerie, qu'il ne trouble le pays ou par feu ou par aucune chose qui soit contraire au commun salut, il doit estre lié et gardé par ceux qui ont ses choses, qu'il ne mefface à nully. Et s'il n'a rien, tout le voisiné doit mettre conseil et aide du sien à refrener sa forcenerie.

J. Hammond, Esq. 31 July, 1846.

"L'en doit sçavoir qu'aucun ne peut suyr de meffait qui dedans l'an et jour n'ait esté monstré à la justice, et dequoy la clameur n'ait esté faite si comme elle doit. Mais de meurdre peut on suyr quand certain signe et enseignes en sont monstrées par loyal tesmoignage du pays, par qui l'en sache certainement du meurdre qui a esté fait.

Plainte d'excez et mal-façons de corps se doit faire dedans l'an et jour du délict; mais suite d'homicide et d'autre crime publique ne se prescrit que par le laps de ¶ vingt ans."

The prescriptions here stated, would, I conceive, be adopted by the Court. Perhaps, if there had been a proceeding par contumace, ¶ this term might be extended to thirty years.

13. Within the bailiwick of the island.

The Court has also, sometimes, taken cognizance of offences committed on the high seas.

14. None.

15. Our practice, which may be considered based upon our common law, the "ancienne coutume" of Normandy, recognises a classification of offences, which affects both the punishment to be inflicted and the mode of trial.

All felonies are tried by juries. So are larcenies, embezzlement, and great violence upon the person, which may not come under the denomination of felony.

Slight misdemeanors, breaches of the peace, actions for contravening prohibitory regulations and enactments emanating either from the island legislature or from the Imperial Parliament (when such Acts of Parliament have force of law in the Island), and adjunct causes, are prosecuted before the Court without a jury.

These several offences are designated "crimes"—"délits"—"infractions ou interruptions de la paix publique"—"contraventions aux lois"—et "causes en ajonction."

The Answers of Francis John Le Couteur, an Advocate of the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey, to the Second Series of Questions.

Francis John Le Couteur, Esq.

1. A person is not responsible to the criminal law before he is seven years of age. There is no distinction in this respect between different offences.

2. If it appears that the party charged was of unsound mind at the time of the offence, he is acquitted on the ground of insanity. A party is not responsible to the criminal law, when it is clear that he is not a free agent, that is, unable to distinguish right from wrong.

3. A married woman might be considered not to be responsible to the criminal law, if, when she committed an offence, there was compulsion on the part of her husband.

4. Yes, such as that mentioned in the preceding answer.

5. If not the actual perpetrator, but present at the time of the offence, and assisting the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching, or otherwise, he would be found guilty as an accomplice.

If not present, but that he instigated or assisted, by counsel or otherwise, the actual perpetrator, before the time of the perpetration, he would be found guilty as an accomplice.

If not present, but that he, after the perpetration, assisted, by counsel or otherwise, the actual perpetrator, he would be found guilty as an accessory after the fact.

6. In the several cases supposed in the last question, the party so instigating or assisting can be charged with the principal offence; though he may also be charged with a specific crime as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence.

7. In the several cases above suggested, the party participating is generally charged with the actual perpetrator. He may, however, be charged alone; nor is it necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been convicted previously.

8. There is no distinction, in this respect, as to different offences.

9. All persons in any manner assisting in the commission of an offence are found guilty accordingly.

10. More than one person can be charged in a single prosecution. If that which is charged as a joint offence is proved to have been an offence in which one of the accused parties did not participate, he is of course acquitted.

11. Yes. Yes.

12. A prosecution, for minor offences, must be instituted within a year and a day; for murder and other heinous crimes, within twenty years.

13. In order to subject the offender to a prosecution by the criminal law of Jersey, the offence must have been committed in the island or on the seas.

14. There is no distinction, with respect to apprehension, trial or punishment, or any of the incidents thereto respectively, between offences committed in different places within the territory subject to the criminal law of Jersey.

15. Larceny is punished with imprisonment; robbery, according to the gravity of the offence, with imprisonment and hard labour, or transportation; murder, with death; which, however, has recently been commuted by the crown, in one instance, to transportation for life.

if he is of sufficient discretion to be responsible for his acts. I do not think that there is any case of a child under ten years of age tried for a crime,

2. If a party, charged with a misdemeanour, appears to be insane, the Court orders six of the principal inhabitants of the parish in which he resides to be summoned at the suit of the Attorney General; they are questioned upon oath, whether they believe him to be of sound mind, and able to take care of his person and property; and, if they report, as their opinion, that he is of unsound mind, or unable to take care of his person and property, the Court orders that a curateur or guardian shall be appointed to his person and property. If the party charged is accused of a crime, the jury that tries the offence decides if the person charged was of an unsound mind at the time of the offence, or at the time of the trial. There is no positive test of the unsoundness of mind, required to prevent a party from being responsible to the criminal law: that question is left to the decision of the jury.

3. A married woman is considered not to be responsible to the criminal law for a theft, a larceny, or the receiving of stolen goods, when she has acted under the coercion of her husband, or in his presence, which is considered as coercion.

4. If a person has committed an offence through coercion and bodily fear, he would not be held responsible: but the degree of coercion and fear necessary to excuse him is left to the Court or jury to decide.

5. An accessory before the fact is liable to the same punishment as the principal offender. An accessory after the fact, as well as a receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, is liable to fine and imprisonment.

6. The party is generally charged with the principal offence, and also with having aided, assisted or participated in the offence.

7. He is generally charged together with the actual perpetrator; and they are both charged with the principal offence, and also with having aided, assisted or participated in the offence. But he may be charged alone; and it is not necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been convicted previously, especially if he is out of the island, or if it has not been possible to arrest him.

8. There is no difference in this respect as to different offences.

9. The law has not defined the limit of actual or constructive presence.

10. More than one person can be charged in a single prosecution. All parties to an offence, whether principal or accessories, are generally charged in the same prosecution; and they are generally all charged with the principal offence, and also with having aided, assisted or participated in the offence or crime. The accusation is so worded that, if one of the parties charged is found Not guilty, the other may be found Guilty.

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party. An offence committed by the party alone may be charged in the same prosecution with one committed jointly with another person.

12. A prosecution for a misdemeanour must generally be instituted within a year from the commission of the offence. A crime may be prosecuted within twenty years of its commission.

13. The offence must be committed in the island of Jersey, or on the high seas.

14. There is no distinction with respect to apprehension, trial or punishment, or any of the incidents thereto respectively, between offences committed in different places within the territory subject to the criminal law of Jersey.

The connétable, centeniers, vingteniers and officiers du connétable cannot act except within their own parish.

15. The law of Jersey assigns different punishments to different crimes and offences. The other part of the question has been answered previously.

FRANCIS GODFRAY, Advocate.

No. 6.

Francis Godfray, Esq. Greffier, and James Godfray, Esq.

Answers of Francis Godfray, Greffier, and James Godfray, Advocate, of the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey, to the Second Series of Questions.

1. By the law of Normandy in which our jurisdiction has originated, the age before which persons were not considered responsible to the criminal law was ten years and a half.

From this age to that of puberty (fourteen), if they were found to have sufficient capacity to distinguish good from evil, they were punishable, though not to the utmost rigour of the law.

After the age of fourteen they were fully responsible to the criminal law.

These rules appear to have been generally followed in Jersey.

In this respect no distinction is made between the different offences.

2. If at any stage of the proceedings it is proved that the accused party was of unsound mind at the time he committed the offence, the Queen's Attorney General may be allowed to drop the prosecution. Should the unsoundness of mind not be sufficiently proved to warrant the prosecution being dropped, the trial takes its course: and the question, as regards the unsoundness of mind, and the test of such unsoundness, is submitted to the Juries. In the cases where the prosecution is dropped, or where the offender is acquitted on the ground of unsoundness of mind, and that fear for public safety is apprehended of his future conduct, he is detained.

3. A woman is considered responsible to the criminal law unless she had been acting under the immediate control of her husband.

4. A party responsible to the criminal law is relieved from such responsibility by having acted under the control of another party, as in the case above mentioned. Les insensés, les furieux, et ceux qui sont en enfance, are also relieved from such responsibility.

5. When a party is charged with an offence, if it appears that he was not the actual perpetrator, but present at the time of the offence, and assisting the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching, or otherwise, he is considered to be punishable in the same manner as the actual perpetrator, as are also other accessories before the fact; but the Court generally uses its discretionary power in treating them with less severity according to the degree of guilt.

As regards accessories after the fact, we have in the records of the Royal Court of Jersey an order in Council, dated 1635, June the 12th, from which is the following extract.

"First, whereas there is no punishment by the laws and customs of that island for accessories in murders and felonies after the fact done, viz., for such as favour and receive the principals before their conviction, it is thought fit and ordered that such accessories shall be punished by fine or imprisonment; and for such also who convey felons out of the Island after proclamation made for their apprehension, and who break prison, and for the favourers of such offenders, and compounders with them, that they be punished by fine and imprisonment."

6. The party instigating or assisting can be charged with the principal offence in the two first cases supposed in the fifth question. He is chargeable with a specific crime, as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence, where he is suspected of having procured the instrument of the crime, or of having otherwise aided and abetted in the perpetration of the principal offence.

7. In the several cases above suggested, the party participating can either be charged alone, or together with the actual perpetrator, at the option of the Attorney General. If he is charged alone, the previous conviction of the actual perpetrator is not necessary; the proof of the offence being sufficient to warrant the charge.

8. We have no distinctions in this respect as to different offences.

9. Respecting the legal limit of actual or constructive presence in the cases severally contemplated in the above questions, it is considered that every kind of accessory is subject to prosecution.

10. More than one person can be charged in a single prosecution. (Vide copy of charge, "No. 2," forwarded with Mr. James Godfray's answers to the first series of questions.)

If that which is charged as a joint offence be proved to have been an offence in which one of the accused parties did not participate, such party is liberated, and the trial of the other is continued.

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party; as also an offence commited by a party alone may be charged with one committed by him jointly with another person.

12. There appears to be no limitation as to the time within which a prosecution must be instituted in cases of capital crimes.

Respecting other offences, one year is considered as the limit. No other distinction is made.

13. An offender is subject to prosecution in Jersey only for offences committed within the Island, or on the high seas.

14. There is no distinction with respect to apprehension, trial or punishment, or any of the incidents thereto respectively, between offences committed in different places within the territory subject to the criminal law of Jersey.

15. Crimes et délits are the designations by which offences are known in Jersey.

Crimes are punishable by death, transportation, banishment, the pillory, imprisonment (with or without hard labour or solitary confinement, for the whole or part of the imprisonment), or fine, according to the nature of the offence and degree of guilt.

Délits are punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both (with or without hard labour or solitary confinement for the whole or part of the imprisonment), and whipping. This last mode of punishment appears to have fallen into disuse.

The Answers of Robert Pipon Marett, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey to the Second Series of Questions.

Rob. Pipon Marett, Esq.
19 Aug., 1846.

Before replying to the second series of questions proposed by the Royal Commissioners, I must observe that, in Jersey, there does not exist any criminal code; that no attempt has ever been made at systematic and comprehensive legislation on the subject of crimes and punishments, and consequently that the fundamental rules of criminal law, to which those questions principally refer, are not to be found laid down in any positive enactment. The only way of arriving at a knowledge of the general principles by which the Jersey Court is guided in the administration of criminal justice, is the examination of its practice in particular instances; but, as it may be supposed, cases are not very numerous in so small a community; so that it is impossible to give a precise and satisfactory reply to the Commissioners' inquiries, no opportunity having occurred, in Jersey, of deciding on the points of law to which they relate. All that can be said is, that, in the determination of new and difficult questions, the Royal Court of Jersey has generally shown a disposition to conform itself to the jurisprudence of the English Tribunals.

1. I am not acquainted with any judgment of the Jersey Court which defines the age at which criminal responsibility begins. In cases of petty delinquency committed for the first time by children from ten to twelve years old (and I do not remember to have seen any brought up for judgment who were under the first mentioned age), the Court has generally been satisfied with delivering the offenders to their parents, with an injunction to the latter to correct them, and watch over their behaviour for the future, but has invariably punished them when found guilty of a second offence, thus in some measure acknowledging the principle that infants of the above mentioned ages are responsible to the criminal law, when it is apparent that they have not erred through ignorance or want of discernment.

2. When it is found that the person accused was labouring under mental disease at the time of the offence, he is necessarily acquitted, but is confined in the Public Hospital until seven of his relatives, friends or neighbours can be convened for the purpose of appointing a guardian (Curateur) to his person and property, to whose care he is then committed. In misdemeanours and other trifling offences, over which it exercises a summary jurisdiction, the Court may, if it think fit, adopt this course at any stage of the proceedings; but it cannot order the nomination of a guardian when the accusation is of so serious a nature as to require the intervention of a jury, until a verdict declaratory of the state of mind of the accused has been recorded. With regard to the test alluded to in the latter part of this question, the law of Jersey does not recognize any such; nor do I see how it is possible to establish a standard by which to estimate the degree of general intelligence requisite to render a party responsible to the criminal law, when it is considered how subject the human mind is to be partially disordered. A person almost idiotic may still possess a power of distinguishing right from wrong, sufficient to make him amenable to the laws, while a man of the most unclouded reason and soundest judgment in ordinary occasions may be subject to periodical aberrations of intellect, or paroxysms of monomaniacal hallucination, which so far destroy for the time his moral perception as to justify his exemption from punishment for any crime committed under their influence. It is evident, therefore, that the criminality of every act must entirely depend upon the peculiar circumstances under which it took place, without reference to the measure of reason possessed by the agent at other times: and, as these vary in each individual case, they can only be left to the appreciation of the Court or the jury.

3. It has been the invariable practice of the Jersey Court to punish married women for criminal acts committed by them without the participation of their husbands, or even in conjunction with them when it has appeared that the women were the principal agents or advisers, or spontaneously took part in their perpetration; but it has been judged that a married woman living with her husband, though separated from him in respect to property, was not accusable for receiving into a house, of which she was the lessee in her own name, goods introduced by her husband, though she knew them to have been stolen by him. (1844, Reg. v. Wellman and others.)

4. It would appear, from the case just quoted and from several others of a like nature to be found in the records, that the Court of Jersey, in cases of misdemeanour at least, recognizes the principle that persons, otherwise responsible to the criminal law, are not liable to punishment for offences committed by them by compulsion or while under a control which they were unable to resist.

5. The object of this question I conceive to be to ascertain what would be the fate of a person, in Jersey, if, being accused of the actual perpetration of a crime, he was found not to have been the actual agent in its commission, but to have participated therein in the several ways enumerated in the question. Supposing my interpretation to be correct, I answer that in Jersey, when there is any uncertainty as to the precise manner in which a suspected person has partaken in the perpetration of a crime, it is usual so to frame the accusation, by the introduction of appropriate clauses, as to secure his conviction whether he may have been a principal in the first or second degree, or an accessory before the fact, so that it can never be a question whether a party, not the actual perpetrator, but present at the time of the offence—or guilty of having before the time of its perpetration instigated another to commit it, though not himself present at the commission—can be convicted on a charge of actual perpretation. With respect to accessories after the fact, they could only be acquitted on an accusation of being the principal offenders.

6. As I have stated in the preceding answer, accusations are usually so worded as to include principals of the second degree, and accessories before the fact, who are always punished with the same severity as the principal offender; but persons who have become implicated in a criminal transaction by receiving stolen property—screening the offender—or favouring his escape from justice, in short, accessories after the fact generally, cannot be convicted on a general charge of participation; but it is necessary that the accusation should specify the particular act which subjects them to prosecution.

7. In Jersey every criminal may be tried alone, whatever be the nature or degree of his offence: nor is it necessary that the perpetrator of a crime should have been convicted, or even apprehended, to allow of the participator in its commission being brought to justice. All that is required is, that the perpetration of the crime, and his share in it, should be proved.

8. I am not aware of any distinction in this respect as to different offences.

9. A party is considered to have been present at the commission of an offence, however distant he may have been from the spot where it actually occurred, who, at the time of such offence, was engaged in any other act designed to further and ensure its successful perpetration.

10. Any number of persons suspected to have cooperated in the commission of a crime may be joined in one prosecution; but the accusation is considered to apply to each of them individually; and the conviction or acquittal of one of the parties, thus jointly charged, does not in any measure affect the fate of the others.

11. Whatever the number of offences imputed to a party, they may be joined in the same prosecution, whether he has committed them alone or in combination with other persons. And, where several individuals are joined in one prosecution, the offences committed by each of the co-accused alone may be charged therein, as well as those in which they have all participated.

12. That class of offences to which, in my reply to the first series of questions, I have given the name of statutory must, unless the law which created them contain some provision to the contrary, be prosecuted within a year and a day from the time of their commission. With regard to "common law offences," I conceive that the rule laid down by Terrien, in his commentaries on the Norman Coûtume, would be binding in Jersey, though I am not aware of its ever having been acted upon in respect to those crimes which he designates as "crimes pub- liques;" an opportunity for so doing not having occurred.—"Plainte d'excez et mal-façons de corps se doit faire dedans l'an et jour du délict. Mais suite d'homicide et d'autre crime publique ne se préscrit que par laps de vingt ans; comme il est dit de crime de faux." In l. querela. C. de fals. Terrien. Livre XII., p. 502.

13. The jurisdiction of the Jersey Court, in regard to offences committed on land, is limited to the island itself, and the rocks around its coast: but it takes cognizance of all crimes wheresoever occurring at sea, when the ports of Jersey happen to be the first at which the guilty parties arrive after their perpetration.

14. The administration of the criminal law of Jersey is vested solely in the Royal Court; and the mode of prosecuting an offence before it is the same wherever that offence may have been committed.

15. The procedure with respect to offences created by prohibitory enactments, which are usually styled "contraventions," differs, as I have already explained in my previous communication, in many particulars from that which is followed in regard to offences punishable at common law. Of this last class, the less important, generally designated as "délits," are in most cases summarily judged by the Court alone, while those of a more aggravated character, to which the name of "crimes" is applied, are invariably submitted to a jury. It must be said, however, that the line which divides crimes from délits is not at all clearly defined, and that all these terms are commonly used without any kind of critical precision.

Answers of John Le Couteur, Viscount of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the Second Series of Questions.

J. Le Couteur, Esq. Viscount.

1. By the ancient military law up to 1831, boys of 13 years of age were called up for instruction in military exercise: but their parents were held responsible for their appearance and conduct.

Lads of 13 and 14 are constantly punished for theft.

The distinction for different offences is made by the Crown Lawyer, under judgment of the Court.

2. The proceedings would be stayed on its proof; the certificate or evidence of competent medical men, in addition to evidence, would be a sufficient test.

1742, October 5th, case of Jean Gasnier, charged with the murder of his father in law. Proceedings stayed, previous to the sitting of the petty jury (enditement), owing to his dérangement, and the case referred, by the balance of the Lieut. Bailly, to the Sovereign in Council.

3. None that I have met with.

4 to 12 inclusive, referred to the Deputy Viscount.

13. In the Bailiwick of Jersey, or for any crime committed on the high seas in a vessel coming direct into the ports of Jersey.

14. None.

15. The only classification of offences would come under the heads of criminal law, civil law (causes civiles et mixtes), and ecclesiastical law.

In all three, offenders are punishable by either imprisonment or fine, or both.

JOHN LE COUTEUR, Viscount.

Answers of John P. de St. Croix, Deputy Viscount of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the Second Series of Questions.

Jno. P. De St. Croix, Esq.

4. Yes, in that of a wife under the control of her husband, and a child under the control of a parent.

5. The indictment being framed upon the report of the police of the parish in which the offence is committed, it is usual for the police to endeavour to obtain as much information as possible, relative to the facts connected with the offence previous to the report being entered before the Court, so that, if there are several offenders concerned in the same offence, they are included in the reports, and the indictment is framed accordingly. The offenders may be charged in the same indictment upon several counts, so as to include all the offences mentioned; and the jury may find a prisoner guilty of one or more of the counts contained in the indictment, or otherwise, as the case may be.

The following is an extract from the code of laws, of 1771, page 171, applicable to this question.

"Conformément à l'ordre duconseil de 1635, le 12 Juin, 'ceux qui seront accessoires en crimes de meurtres, ou qui en félonie, après le crime commis, recevront ou favoriseront les coupables avant leur conviction, ou qui emporteront ou favoriseront l'évasion des coupables hors de l'isle, après que proclamation aura été faite de les appréhender, et ceux qui briseront la prison, ou assisteront tels délinquants, seront punis par amende et emprisonnement."

6. The answer to the fifth question also applies to this one.

7, 8, and 9. I know of no cases in point, nor of any law applicable thereto; these questions had better be submitted to the law officers of the Crown.

10. Yes; the accused party who did not participate is immediately released.

11. Yes.

12. I know of no limits affecting the institution of a criminal prosecution.

ANSWERS TO THE THIRD SERIES OF QUESTIONS.

No. 1.

The Answer of the Bailiff and Jurats of the Royal Court of Jersey to the Third Series of Questions.

1. The reply to this question will be found in the answer of the 17th query to the First Series.

2. When a case is to be tried by a jury on an act of accusation or indictment, the evidence of the witness is written down in answer to questions, also reduced into writing, put to to him at the time by the Attorney General and the counsel for the accused. If the case be proceeded with upon the Report of the police officer, or without any formal act of accusation, then the evidence is not written down, but is taken by the Court vivâ voce. There is no difference made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings.

3. An oath is administered to every witness before he deposes. There is no difference made in this respect at any stage of the proceedings.

4. When an individual has attained years of discretion, and is of sufficient intelligence to understand the solemnity and importance of an oath, he may be allowed to give evidence before the Royal Court.

5. We are not aware that any case is to be found in our records upon this point: but we have no doubt that the want of religious belief would be held to be a valid objection to the competency of a witness.

6. Conviction of one or more crimes which render a person infamous would also render him incompetent as a witness for or against a party charged with an offence.

7. This competency would be restored by a pardon or reversal of the judgment.

8. A party charged with an offence may be admitted as a witness for the Crown, but not for another party charged with the same offence.

9. Yes, upon the application of the Attorney General.

10. It is usually required that such evidence should be confirmed by extrinsic evidence, and in such case to the extent that may satisfy the jury that the witness has declared the truth.

11. The husband cannot be admitted as a witness for or against the wife, nor the wife for or against the husband, when either of them is charged with an offence; except when a crime has been committed by one against the other, and there are no other witnesses of the facts.

12. Witnesses within the degree of uncle and nephew cannot be heard for or against each other, except in the case of a crime committed against the witness by a relation within the prohibited degree, or which has taken place in the family circle when there are no other witnesses of the facts.

13. The party charged is never questioned by the prosecutor or by the Court.

14. The statements of the party charged, and his conversations with third persons, are admissible in evidence against him.

15. Statements made by the party charged under the influence of a promise or threat would not be admissible in evidence.

16. The confession of a party charged with an offence would be considered as conclusive evidence of his guilt, unless he should on his trial adduce evidence in proof of his innocence.

17. The examination of all witnesses is confined to those facts which they know of their own knowledge. But a witness may give evidence of the dying declaration of a person deceased, who at the time of making such declaration believed himself to be dying.

18. A witness will not be permitted to state in evidence the contents of a written document without producing it or shewing it, or shewing to the satisfaction of the Court that it has been lost or destroyed, or otherwise accounting for its non-production.

19. If the Attorney General had in his possession an important document, the production whereof were required by the party charged, the Court would rule that it be produced. But we do not think that the party charged could be compelled to produce a document which might criminate him. The refusal of the prosecutor to produce the document in his possession would authorise the introduction of other evidence of its contents. The refusal would be established by act of the Court.

20. When there are attesting witnesses to the execution of a written instrument, they ought all, if possible, to be produced. In case of the death or absence of all or any of the attesting witnesses, proof of their handwriting, and of that of the party executing the instrument, would be required.

With respect to the age of an instrument, the question can seldom, if ever, arise in Jersey, where a general registry exists; and we are not aware of any decision upon the point.

21. Acts of the Court, contracts or deeds of conveyance, and other documents passed, or acknowledged by or before the Court, being registered, prove themselves. But acts or documents of other public bodies or persons in authority, if the authenticity of them be denied, must be proved by witnesses.

22. Evidence in favour of the character of the party accused may be given at any stage of the proceedings prior to a Grande Enquête. Such evidence may be contradicted. Evidence of particular acts of good conduct may be received for the party accused.

23. A witness can refuse to answer a question on the ground that the answer may subject him to criminal liability: but he cannot refuse to answer because it may subject him to civil liability, or that it may discredit him.

24. Evidence may be given of the bad or good character of a witness: but such evidence should be confined to general reputation. Such evidence, if given, is allowed to be met by opposing evidence to rebut the character given.

25. A witness may be asked, with a view of impeaching his present testimony, what he has formerly said. Evidence may be given to contradict his answer.

26. The general rule is, that two witnesses are necessary to establish a fact; but the evidence of one credible witness, whose testimony is corroborated by extrinsic evidence, would be held sufficient to establish a fact.

27. In criminal cases the witnesses are not paid.

Answers of Philip Le Maistre, Jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the Third Series of Questions.

P. Le Maistre, Esq.

1. Witnesses for or against a party charged are always heard in presence and hearing of the prosecutor and accused party, but not before the Court which has to decide the charge, depositions being taken only before the bailli and two jurats, who form the nombre inférieur (inferior Court).

2. The evidence is taken down in writing, in answer to written interrogatories on the part of the prosecution and of the party charged. The same course is pursued at every stage of the proceedings.

3. In every case, and at every stage of the proceedings relating to a criminal charge, witnesses depose under the sanction of an oath.

4. This is left entirely at the discretion of the Court, there being no age fixed by law before which a person cannot give evidence.

5. I am not aware that any person has ever been excluded from giving evidence on the ground of want of religious belief; nor do I think that that question has ever been mooted before this Court.

6. The laws of Jersey have not provided against this contingency; but the evidence of a person having been previously convicted of felony would be received with a good deal of caution; indeed, it would be dispensed with altogether, if possible.

7. I know of no instance of the competency of a witness having been restored; I, therefore, cannot state in what manner it would be done, there being no law to that purpose.

8. A party charged with an offence can be heard as a witness, either for or against another party charged with the same offence: but it is had recourse to only where no other satisfactory proof can be adduced. It is then styled "Jurer pour la Reine" (turning Queen's evidence),

9. Yes.

10. The extent of the extrinsic evidence would rest entirely with the Court.

11.—12. An order in Council of the 14th December, 1842, has provided for these cases in the following manner:—

"Article 1. Les parens ou alliés qui, à cause de leur parenté ou alliance, ne seraient point témoins idoines dans les causes ordinaires, pourront (à l'exception du mari et de la femme) être entendus comme informateurs dans une poursuite criminelle, pour des faits réputés criminels, commis vers eux, ou qui auront eu lieu, au sein de la famille, lorsqu'il n'y aura point d'autres témoins de ces faits."

"Article 2. L'époux ne pourra être entendu contre son conjoint, excepté dans le cas d'une poursuite criminelle, pour un crime commis contre son conjoint, lorsqu'il n'y aura pas d'autres témoins des faits."

13. The Court never questions the party accused touching the offence with which he is charged, nor in explanation of the evidence relating to it.

14. Some of the police have often made it a practice of extorting confessions from parties accused of crimes and misdemeanours, which confessions were afterwards embodied in the report of the constable, and consequently admitted in evidence against them: but the attention of Sir Edward Gibbs was called to that important fact; and His Excellency adopted certain measures to prevent the reoccurrence of such an unwarrantable practice; so that the evil complained of has ceased to exist, or at all events it has diminished in a considerable degree.

15. Those statements or confessions are undoubtedly made under the influence of promise or threat; but, it being unknown to the Court, they are received as part of the evidence.

16. The confession of a party charged would be conclusive evidence of his guilt if he did not retract it; but he is, notwithstanding that confession, permitted on his trial to adduce evidence in proof of his innocence. Sometimes, in cases of misdemeanor, or petty theft, &c., a party charged admits the facts stated in the report in order to avoid a long imprisonment; or, if is he not a native, it is not uncommon in parties accused to offer to leave the island, in order to avoid any further prosecutions; which, if accepted, subjects such offenders to banishment of from three to five years.

17. The examination is confined to those facts which the witness knows of his own knowledge. The declaration of a person who, at the time of his making it, believed himself to be dying, would be received, provided such evidence be attested by two competent witnesses.

18. A witness may state in evidence the contents of a written document; but the Court would order the production of it. If it were lost or destroyed, the evidence of the contents would be deemed sufficient.

19. The Court could not compel a party to produce a written document which would go to incriminate him, but would permit the introduction of other evidence of the contents. The refusal would be established by an act of the Court to that effect.

20. The evidence of two witnesses is required to prove the execution of a written instrument; all the attesting witnesses must be produced. In case of the death of any of them, proof of their hand-writing would be required. The age of an instrument in criminal proceedings makes no difference in the mode of proof. There is no period after which execution of the instrument is presumed without proof.

21. An act of the Court is considered authentic when it is signed and attested by the clerk (greffier) of the Court.

22. Evidence of the character of the party accused may be given for or against him at any stage of the proceedings. It may also be contradicted. Evidence of particular acts of good or bad conduct may be given in proof of character.

23. A witness is not compelled to answer a question which might subject him to criminal liability, or discredit him.

24. Evidence can be given of the good or bad character of a witness upon general reputation or particular facts. It may be met with to any extent by the opposite party.

25. A witness can be cross-examined to any extent as to facts bearing upon what he has formerly said. Evidence can be given to contradict this answer.

26. Two witnesses, at least, are necessary to prove particular facts; but an indefinite number can be heard.

27. Witnesses in criminal proceedings are not paid for their attendance.

Francis John Le Couteur, Esq.

The Answers of Francis John Le Couteur, Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the third Series of Questions.

1. All evidence must be given in the presence and hearing of the prosecutor and accused party, and of the president or vice president, and two jurats. The jury decides on the charge; and a quorum of at least seven jurats is required. There is no difference made, in this respect, at any stage of the proceedings.

2. The evidence is taken down in writing in answer to oral interrogations on the part of the prosecution and of the party charged. There is no difference made in this respect at any stage of the proceedings.

3. It is required by the law of Jersey that all evidence relating to a criminal charge shall be given under the sanction of the oath of the witness.

There is no difference made in this respect at any stage of the proceedings.

4. A person cannot give evidence before he is seven years old.

5. Yes.

6. Conviction of a criminal offence renders a person incompetent as a witness.

7. The competency of such a person can be restored by a pardon.

8. A party charged with an offence is capable of being a witness for the crown, but not for another party charged with the same offence.

9. It is in the discretion of the court to direct whether a party so charged should or should not be permitted to give evidence for or against another party charged with the same offence.

10. It is necessary that the testimony of such a witness should be confirmed by extrinsic evidence, to the extent that he may satisfy the jury.

11. The husband cannot be a witness for or against the wife, nor the wife for or against the husband, unless a crime have been committed by one against the other.

12. Incompetency does arise within the degree of uncle and nephew.

13. It is not competent to the prosecutor or to the court, at any stage of the proceedings, to question the party charged touching the offence with which he is charged, or in explanation of the evidence given by any of the witnesses produced in support of the charge or for the defence.

14. Statements of the party charged, or his conversations with third persons before or after he has been charged with the offence, are admissible in evidence either for or against him.

15. If such statements have been made by the party charged under the influence of a promise or threat, they are inadmissible in evidence.

16. The confession of a party charged with an offence is conclusive evidence of his guilt. He is, notwithstanding such confession, permitted on his trial to adduce evidence in proof of his innocence.

17. The examination of a witness, whether against or in favour of the party accused, is confined to those facts which the witness knows of his own knowledge. He may not be examined as to what he has learned touching the matter in dispute from declarations, written or oral, of third parties. There is, however, an exception in the case of a person who, at the time of his making a declaration, believed himself to be dying.

18. A witness will not be permitted to state in evidence the contents of a written document without producing it, or showing to the satisfaction of the Court that it has been lost or destroyed, or otherwise accounting for its non-production.

19. If either the accuser or the accused seeks to give evidence of the contents of a written document which is in the hands of the opposite party, the party in whose possession it is can be compelled by the Court to produce it.

20. When there are attesting witnesses to the execution of a written instrument, they ought all to be produced. In case of the death of all or any of the attesting witnesses, proof of their handwriting is required. As to the age of an instrument, there is no decision upon that point.

21. All acts of the Court are registered by the greffier (or clerk) in the rolls of the Court; that is deemed sufficient proof. But acts of other bodies or persons acting in the execution of any specific authority must be proved by witnesses.

22. Evidence in favour of the character of the party accused can be given, after the witnesses for the prosecution have all been heard. Such evidence may be contradicted. Evidence of particular acts of good conduct can be given in proof of character.

23. A witness can refuse to answer a question put to him, on the ground that the answer may subject him to criminal liability; but he cannot refuse to answer because it may subject him to civil liability, or that it may discredit him.

24. Evidence can be given of the bad or good character of a witness. Such evidence is not confined to general reputation; it may introduce particular facts. Such evidence is allowed to be met by opposite evidence to any extent.

25. A witness may be asked, with a view of impeaching his present evidence, what he has formerly said; and evidence be given to contradict his answer.

26. The general rule is, that two witnesses are necessary for the establishment of a particular fact.

27. In criminal cases witnesses are not paid.

No. 4.

Answers of John Hammond, Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the Third Series of Questions.

J. Hammond, Esq.
24 August, 1846.

1. All the evidence in criminal trials is taken in presence of the prosecutor and the accused, in open court, except when, for reasons stated in a previous answer, it is necessary to hear evidence before the Viscount; and then it is also taken in presence of the prosecutor and the accused. The witnesses do not depose before the jury; the evidence is only read over to the jury (as already explained), in the absence of the witnesses. There is no difference of proceeding respecting the evidence during the progress of the trial.

2. The witnesses depose orally in open Court on questions put by the prosecutor, the Court, or the prisoner. The questions and the witnesses' answers are then reduced to writing; and, at the close of the examination, the witnesses subscribe their name to their respective depositions.

3. All the evidence on the trial must be given on oath. In answer to the latter clause of this question it may be proper to remark, that persons giving evidence at a coroner's inquest are not on oath; and therefore in cases of murder or manslaughter, where a verdict has been given by that body, the information on which the decision of the members of the inquest is founded is not given under the sanction of an oath.

4 and 5. We have no definite law regulating the questions here referred to. Capacity of understanding and religious belief are both required to render the testimony of an individual valid; and, before a person of tender years be sworn, it is usual for the Court to inquire of the proposed witness, not only his or her age, but also to ascertain his or her knowledge of the nature of an oath, and how far he or she is influenced by religious belief. So with regard to adults, if the objection be raised, the Court will, before admitting the witnesses, question them on their belief in God, and on their view and conception of the responsibilities of the oath about to be administered to them.

6. By our practice, I conceive that a person convicted of a crime subjecting him or her to a "punition infamante" is thereby rendered incompetent to give evidence.

7. A pardon from the Sovereign would restore the convicted person's competency.

In consequence of questions having arisen at different times as to the right claimed by persons calling themselves "Quakers," or declaring their conscientious objections to take an oath, to be heard as witnesses on their mere affirmation,—the States of the island framed the law, quoted in the margin,* in order to assimilate our procedure to that observed in England, as enacted by the two statutes therein referred to. This law has not yet received the sanction of Her Majesty in council. It will be observed that, by the 6th and 7th Articles of this law, it is proposed to regulate, for the future, concerning the matters adverted to in the 6th and 7th questions.

8. The only case in which a party charged, jointly with another or others, with a criminal offence can be heard as a witness is when such party is admitted king's evidence (A jurer pour le roi).

9. This depends entirely upon the discretion of the Court, who decides after hearing the prosecutor for, and the other parties charged against, such a proceeding.

10. The unsupported testimony of an accomplice would not, I think, satisfy a jury and operate the conviction of the co-accused. Some corroborating evidence would, I apprehend, be required: but its nature and extent must depend upon the circumstances of the case.

11 and 12. The questions herein referred to are now regulated by the following law. I add the preamble, as it refers to the law as it stood previous to this enactment.

"L'an 1842, le 14 Décembre,

"Considérant que, par l'ancienne loi du pays, expliquée par plusieurs jugemens du corps de la cour, les parens ou alliés, jusqu'au dégré d'oncle et de neveu, ne peuvent être entendus comme témoins ou informateurs en matières criminelles, d'où il peut resulter des abus, ce mode pouvant quelquefois assurer l'impunité à un criminel qui aura commis un crime au sein de sa famille, lorsqu'il n'y a pas d'autres témoins que les parens au dégré prohibé; ont resolu, moyennant la sanction de sa très Excellente Majesté en Conseil, d'établir le réglement suivant."

Article 1. "Les parens ou alliés qui, à cause de leur parenté ou alliance, ne seroient point témoins idoines dans les causes ordinaires pourront (à l'exception du mari et de la femme) être entendus comme informateurs dans une poursuite criminelle pour des faits reputés criminels, commis vers eux, ou qui auront eu lieu au sein de la famille, lorsqu'il n'y aura point d'autres témoins de ces faits."

Article 2. "L'époux ne pourra être entendu contre son conjoint excepté dans le cas d'une poursuite criminelle pour un crime commis contre son conjoint, lorsqu'il n'y aura pas d'autres témoins des faits."

This law was confirmed by an order of council on the 1st of February, 1843.

13. At no stage of the proceedings is the accused subjected to any interrogatories, either on the part of the prosecutor or of the Court.

14 and 15. Declarations made by the party charged under the supposed circumstances (provided they be not the result of the coercion of menace, or the enticement of promise) may be received in evidence: but statements arising from threats or promises are inadmissible.

16. The free and voluntary confession of guilt, on the part of an accused person, is always strong evidence against him; but, except reiterated in his plea before the Court, no extra-judicial confession will debar him of all his usual means of defence, either by evidence or otherwise.

17. In Jersey it is a received principle of jurisprudence that hearsay evidence is not admissible. This principle would equally apply to the testimony of a dying person, or who considers himself so.

The declaration of a person at the point of death in consequence of violence upon his person will, under those circumstances, be received after his death through the medium of the testimony of third persons.

The more usual mode, when practicable, is to reduce such declaration into writing at the time it is made by the dying person, and then to prove it subsequently in Court by the persons present. But, should cirumstances not admit of writing down the declaration of a dying man, I consider that his oral communication to those around him would be received in Court through the medium of those who heard him, although such declaration was not made under the sanction of an oath, in consideration of the peculiarly solemn position of the individual at the time of making it.

18. I conceive that in the supposed case a witness would be allowed to depose respecting a written document, the substance of which was pertinent to the question at issue, and might state ecclésiastiques de cette île, sur sa déclaration et affirmation solemnelle, au lieu d'être tenu de prendre le serment ordinaire.

ART. 2.—Toute personne, membre d'une des dites sociétés religieuses, sera aussi admise à substituer au serment ordinaire sa déclaration et affirmation solemnelle devant tous Magistrats ou autres fonctionnaires publics autorisés à recevoir ou à administrer un serment, en produisant au Magistrat ou autre fonctionnaire un certificat qui constate qu'elle est membre de l'une ou de l'autre de ces sociétés.

ART. 3.—La déclaration et affirmation solemnelle mentionnée dans les deux articles précédents sera faite dans les termes suivans:—"Je, A. B., étant membre de la société religieuse des "Quakers" (ou de la société religieuse des frères unis appelés "Moraves," selon la société dont le déclarant est membre), solemnellement, sincèrement et en toute vérité déclare et affirme."

ART. 4.—Toute déclaration et affirmation faite en conformité à la présente loi aura la même force et authenticité que le serment devant les cours de justice et autres autorités où un serment est requis.

Celui qui volontairement et sciemment aura fait une fausse déclaration, laquelle, si elle avoit été faite sous la foi du serment, l'eût rendu passible du peine du parjure ou de quelqu'autre punition, sera sujet aux mêmes peines et pénalités ou sera sujet aux peines et pénalités attachées au faux serment par quelque loi spéciale lorsque la déclaration et affirmation aura été substituée au serment requis par cette loi.

ART. 5.—Dans les accusations et poursuites pour le crime de faux en écriture authentique ou privée, ou vers une personne qui auroit circulé une pièce fausse, ou s'en seroit servie, ou qui auroit aidé, assisté, ou participé à l'un ou à l'autre des dits crimes, toute personne au préjudice de laquelle le crime auroit été commis sera reconnue témoin ou informateur idoine et admise à déposer nonobstant l'intérêt qu'elle puisse avoir dans l'issue du procès.

ART. 6.—Toute personne atteinte et convaincue d'un crime qui n'entraine point la peine de mort, et qui aura subi la peine prononcée contr'elle, rentrera dans ses droits civils comme si elle avoit reçu un pardon sous le grand sçeau ou par un ordre de sa Majesté en Conseil, sauf néanmoins que la présente disposition n'empêchera ni n'adoucira la peine qui seroit attachée à un crime subséquent.

ART. 7.—Toute personne condamnée pour un crime au-dessous de félonie (sauf le crime de parjure ou subornation de témoins), et qui aura subi la peine prononcée contr'elle, sera admise à déposer comme témoin ou informateur devant toutes cours et dans toutes procédures civiles et criminelles.

the general tenor and scope of such document if the witness was the legitimate possessor of such a deed, and could explain satisfactorily why he could not produce it.

19. During the course of my practice, no case that I can recollect has ever come under the notice of the Court where this question has occurred. Nor is it likely to arise, if we consider the nature of our criminal proceedings.

There is no other accuser than the Crown Officer, who, in his official capacity, is public prosecutor: and therefore the fact of his suppressing or withholding any documents which have come into his hands in his aforesaid capacity, and which may tend to throw light on the question pending between him and the accused, can scarcely be supposed. On the other hand, I conceive that no accused person could be compelled, or even called upon, to produce evidence against himself. But, under the supposed circumstances, I presume that the best evidence which the nature of the case would admit of would be received by the Court.

20. Documentary evidence is not often had recourse to in criminal cases: but I presume that, as to the mode of receiving and establishing such evidence, there would be no difference between civil and criminal cases. If the instrument were holograph, the individual's handwriting, as well as his signature, would have to be proved. If there were witnesses to the deed, those witnesses must be heard. If one or more were dead, their death must be proved to justify their not being produced: and their attestation must be proved by other evidence. The mode of proof would not necessarily be affected by the age of the instrument; the validity of the instrument itself might; for instance, if it were a private deed (sous seing privé), it might be obsolete and null by age. As regards public documents duly registered and enrolled, I conceive their validity would be the easier recognised from the fact of these documents having been received and admitted, and known for a long period. These remarks, however, are not founded on any law of the island.

21. We have no peculiar rules respecting the proof of these documents. Acts of courts of justice, or of corporate bodies, are received under the respective seals of the court or body whence they emanate, accompanied with those formalities, if any, which may be peculiar to the country or body where the deed has originated.

22. Pending the trial, evidence as to character may be given for the party accused; and specific acts may be particularized to give weight to such evidence, which is always open to the cross examination of the Crown Officer. If the accused is convicted, the prosecutor may bring forward previous convictions against the convict, to justify a motion for the severity of a proposed punishment.

23. By our practice, no man ought to be exposed to self-crimination by his answers to questions put to him as a witness; and, if he have a reasonable apprehension that his answer to a question proposed may tend to subject him to criminal liability, he may refuse to give it. I question whether the rule, with us would be extended to the other two supposed cases.

24. Evidence can be given of the character of a witness. If in a sinister sense, it is usual (though in criminal cases not absolutely necessary) to precede such evidence by a recusation against the objectionable witness. Particular facts may be shown in evidence; and the other party has full power to rebut by proof the evidence adduced.

25. A witness can be questioned as to what he may have previously said, whether judicially or extrajudicially; and evidence may be given to show any discrepancy or contradiction in his declarations.

26. The general rule recognized in this bailliwick is, that two witnesses at least are required to establish a particular fact.

27. In criminal prosecutions witnesses are never paid.

No. 5.

The Answers of Francis Godfray, Advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the third Series of Questions.

Francis Godfray, Esq.

1. This question has already been answered. When a witness is produced against or for a party charged with an offence, the evidence must be given by the witness in the presence and hearing of the Attorney General (who is ex officio the sole prosecutor of all crimes and offences), the accused party and his advocate, and before the Royal Court.

2. This question has also been answered previously. If the offence is to be tried by the Royal Court, the evidence is given vivâ voce. If the offence is to be tried by a jury, the evidence is written down, as I have already stated. The question is put to the witness when he appears before the Royal Court; the question is then written down by an attorney and read aloud by him; the witness answers vivâ voce; and his answer is written down and read. When the witness has answered all the questions put to him by the Attorney General and the Court, if he is called to support the accusation, the party charged may cross question him, or put him any other questions which he thinks proper. If the witness is called for the defence, the Attorney General may question him when he has answered all the questions put to him by the party charged, or his advocate.

3. It is required that all evidence relating to a criminal charge be given under the sanction of the oath of the witness.

4. The law has not fixed the age before which a person cannot give evidence.

5. A person may be excluded from giving evidence against a party charged with an offence, on the ground of want of religious belief.

6 and 7. I do not consider that a person who has been condemned à une peine infamante can be heard as a witness in a criminal prosecution, especially whilst he is undergoing his punishment.

8. A party charged with an offence is not capable of being a witness, either for or against another party charged with the same offence.

9. The Court cannot direct whether a person so charged should or should not be permitted to give evidence for or against another party charged with the same offence. The only exception is, when a party charged offers "de jurer pour la Reine;" the Court may, with the recommendation of the Attorney General, allow him to be heard as a witness; but then he stands acquitted, unless it appear that he has been guilty of perjury.

10. In case such evidence is admitted, it is necessary that the testimony of such a witness should be confirmed by extrinsic evidence.

11. The husband and wife cannot be heard for or against one another, unless for an offence committed by one of them against the person of the other.

12. No person within the degree of uncle and nephew to the person charged can be heard for or against him, unless for an offence committed in the presence of the family, and when no other witnesses were present.

13. It is not competent to the prosecutor or to the Court, at any stage of the proceedings, to question the party charged touching the offence with which he is charged, or in explanation of the evidence given by any of the witnesses produced in support of the charge, or for the defence.

14. The statements of the party charged, or his conversations with third persons, before or after he has been charged with the offence, are admissible in evidence against him.

15. If statements have been made by the party charged under the influence of a promise or a threat, it renders them inadmissible in evidence.

16. A party charged is, notwithstanding his confession, permitted on his trial to adduce evidence in proof of his innocence.

17. The examination of a witness, either against or in favour of a party accused, is confined to those facts which the witness knows of his own knowledge. He cannot be examined as to what he has learned, touching the matter in dispute, from declarations, written or oral, of third parties. The solemn declaration of a person who believes himself to be dying at the time he makes it is received in evidence.

18. No.

19. A party may give evidence of the contents of a paper in the possession of the other party; but there are no means of forcing a party charged to produce any document he may have in his possession. The Attorney General, being the prosecutor, could not refuse to produce a document that would throw light on the accusation.

20. All deeds relating to landed or real property must be passed before the Royal Court, and are signed by the bailli and two jurats: they are immediately registered in a public office, called the registrar's office; and the original is returned to the purchaser—sometimes a copy is given to the other party, equally signed by the bailli and jurats. The original document, or a copy taken from the registrar's office, and signed by the enregistreur, is received in evidence. When there are witnesses to the execution of any other instrument, they must all be produced; the law never requires more than two attesting witnesses to any document. In case of the death of all or any of the witnesses, proof of the handwriting of the witnesses is required.

21. The production of the record of the Court, or the copy of any act of the Court, duly signed by the greffier, is a sufficient proof of such an act.

22. The party accused may produce evidence in favour of his character. Such evidence may be contradicted. Evidence of particular acts of good character may be given in proof of character.

23. A person may refuse to answer a question put to him, on the ground that the answer may subject him to criminal liability, but not on the ground that it may subject him to civil liability, or that it may discredit him, provided the question is material to the trial.

24. Evidence may be given of the bad character of a witness; and it is not confined to general reputation: it may be met by opposite evidence, to repel the charge against the witness.

25. A witness may be asked, with a view of impeaching his present evidence, what he has formerly said; and evidence may be given to contradict his answer.

26. Two witnesses are generally necessary to establish a fact.

27. Witnesses are not paid for their time or expenses.

Francis Godfray Greffier. and James Godfray, Esqrs. 12 August, 1846.

The Answers of Francis Godfray, Esq., Greffier, and James Godfray, Esq., Advocate, of the Royal Court of Jersey, to the third Series of Questions.

1. When a witness is produced against or for a party charged with an offence, the evidence is given by the witness in presence and hearing of the prosecutor and accused party, and of the Court.

There is no difference made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings, except where a witness is on the eve of his departure from the Island, or where he is prevented by illness, or other reasonable causes, from appearing before Court; in which cases the "Vicomte" is authorized by the Court to take down in writing the deposition of such witness, which is always done in presence of the accusing and accused party.

2. Where the Court does not exercise summary jurisdiction, the witness, being called upon to depose, first gives a vivâ voce statement of what he knows respecting the facts contained in the charge.

This statement is immediately taken down in writing by an attorney appointed for the purpose; and then he gives evidence in answer to questions put to him, in writing, at the time, on the part of the prosecution and of the accused party, which evidence is in like manner taken down in writing.

Where there is exercise of summary jurisdiction, the evidence of the witnesses is given orally, except in the cases mentioned in answer to the first question, in which the Vicomte takes the evidence down in writing, in order to insure its production at Court when required. No other difference is made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings.

3. It is required that all evidence relating to a criminal charge be given under sanction of the oath of the witness. There is no difference made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings.

4. There is no precise age before which a person cannot give evidence.

5. A person can be excluded from giving evidence, for or against a party charged with an offence, on the ground of want of religious belief.

6. The conviction of infamous crimes renders a person incompetent as a witness for or against a party charged with an offence.

7. The competency of such person as a witness can be restored by means of a pardon from Her Majesty.

8. A party charged with an offence can be heard as Queen's evidence against another party, charged with the same offence, but not otherwise.

9. The Court has the discretionary power to direct whether a party so charged should or should not be permitted to give evidence against another party charged with the same offence.

10. It is necessary that the testimony of such a witness be confirmed by extrinsic evidence in the essential points, and that to such extent as may be thought sufficient to establish the veracity of what he has stated.

11. The husband cannot be a witness for or against the wife, nor the wife for or against the husband, where either of them is charged with an offence, except in case of a prosecution for an offence committed by the husband against the wife, or vice versâ, and that there is no other evidence to the fact.

12. Persons who from consanguinity or affinity could not be competent witnesses in ordinary suits can (with the exception of the husband and wife) be heard as witnesses in criminal prosecutions for facts considered criminal, committed against them, or which have taken place in the family, in cases where there is no other evidence to these facts. The extent of such consanguinity or affinity does not go beyond the degree of uncles and nephews.

13. It is not competent to the prosecutor, or to the Court, at any stage of the proceedings, to question the accused party touching the offence with which he is charged, or in explanation of the evidence given by any of the witnesses produced in support of the charge, or for the defence.

14. The statements of the accused party, or his conversations with third persons before or after he has been charged with the offence, are admissible in evidence, either for or against him.

15. Such statements are rendered inadmissible in evidence if they have been made under the influence of a promise or threat.

16. If the confession of an accused party is made after the charge has been read to him in presence of the Court, such confession is conclusive evidence of his guilt; but an exception to this rule was made in a late instance, where a party charged was, after having pleaded Guilty, allowed to change his plea, and the trial was afterwards carried on as if he had at first pleaded Not guilty.

17. The examination of a witness, whether against or in favour of the party accused, is, in general, confined to those facts which the witness knows of his own knowledge; but he may sometimes be examined as to what he has learned touching the matter in dispute from declarations, written or oral, of third parties. In the case of a person who at the time of his making a declaration believes himself to be dying, it is a general rule that the witness be examined thereon.

18. A witness is not permitted to state in evidence the contents of a written document without producing it, or shewing, to the satisfaction of the Court, that it has been lost or destroyed, or otherwise accounting for its non-production.

19. If the accused party seeks to give evidence of the contents of a written document which is in the hands of the accuser, who is always the Attorney General, this officer is in duty bound, and the Court can force him, to produce it. If, on the other hand, the accuser seeks to give evidence of the contents of documents which may be in the hands of the accused, he (the accused) cannot be compelled to produce them; but the accuser may be allowed to prove their contents. In case of refusal, the fact of such refusal would be established in the act of the Court.

20. The signature (which is not attested by witnesses) to a written instrument must be proved by witnesses acquainted with the handwriting of the party executing such instrument. When there are attesting witnesses to the execution of the instrument, all of them, if possible, must be produced.

In the event of the death or absence from the Island of all or any of the attesting witnesses, proof of their handwriting is required. If it is impossible to procure any proofs of an instrument, on account of the remote period of its date, the Court has the discretionary power to judge of its validity.

21. The acts of the Royal Court are proved by the signature of the greffier. Those of other bodies or persons acting in the execution of any specific authority are proved by witnesses, in case the signature of the party attesting such acts be doubted.

22. The party accused can produce evidence as to his good character, at any stage of the proceedings; and the accuser may produce other evidence to contradict it. Evidence of particular acts of good conduct may also be given in proof of character.

23. A witness can refuse to answer a question put to him on the ground that the answer may subject him to a criminal liability, but not otherwise.

24. Evidence can be given of the bad or good character of a witness. This evidence must be confined to general reputation; but it may introduce particular facts. Such evidence is allowed to be met by opposite evidence, to such extent as may be thought necessary to establish the reputation of the witness.

25. A witness can be asked, with a view of impeaching his present evidence, what he has formerly said; and evidence can be given to contradict his answer.

26. The general rule is, that two witnesses are necessary for the establishment of a particular fact; but one witness is considered sufficient if his deposition is confirmed by circumstantial evidence.

27. Witnesses are not paid, either for the expense to which the inquiry has put them or for their time.

The Answers of J. Le Couteur, Esquire, Viscount of the Island of Jersey, to the third Series of Questions.

1. It must, excepting the case of illness or departure which I have stated, in which the evidence is taken before the Viscount. None.

2. Answered by reply 21. Series 1.

3. Certainly on oath. None.

4. I know of no law absolutely fixing the age—it would much depend, in the case of a child, on its intelligence.

5. I have never met with such a case.

6. Conviction for perjury would render a person incompetent.

7. It could not, unless it were by a long course of subsequent unimpeachable conduct.

8. When king's evidence.

9. Answered by the previous reply.

10. The additional evidence of one or more credible witnesses would be required to insure conviction.

11. The new code of laws, page 314; rules "l'époux (the husband or wife) shall not be heard against the 'conjoint'—except in a criminal suit, for a crime committed by the 'conjoint,' when there shall be no other witnesses of the fact."

12. Any relatives may be heard if no other witnesses are to be found.

13. It is not competent.

14. They are not admissible.

15. I have never known statements to be made under such influence.

16. It is—and judgment immediately following on it. No such evidence has ever been offered that I have met with.

17. I have constantly seen it confined to what the witness knows of his own knowledge, "les ouï-dires" not being received as evidence.

The evidence of a dying man, solemnly taken, as in the case of Centenier Le Cronier, who was murdered by Le Gendre, was received.

18. In criminal cases not.

19 and 20. Referred to the deputy Viscount.

21. Authenticated acts of the Court may be had by either party; or the records themselves may be produced in court (for which certain fees are paid); registered acts of parliament, acts of the states, acts of parochial assemblies, would be received, when presented by an officer in whose custody they are usually.

Reports of the Viscount, his deputy, the denunciators, the constables or centeniers are presented or confirmed by themselves in Court.

22. I have heard evidence in favour of character given on the close of the defence.

The Crown lawyer would undoubtedly rebut the evidence if he believed it to be false.

23. Certainly: in either case, no man would be compelled to criminate himself.

24. It can: it might affect his reputation; or a particular fact, such as perjury, might be adduced.

25. It is constantly done: no doubt it could.

26. The Grand Coustumier, edition 1539, chap. lxii., folio 85, states, in the commentary on the text, "Le texte veut innuer que toutes raisons de faict, qui sont proposées en Court et nyees, s'il n'y a tesmoing, cest assavoir preuve, sont reputées vaines, car tesmoing est cy prins pour preuve et non pas pour un tesmoing seul." Hence, in criminal cases, two witnesses are always required in order to convict.

In cases of violations of five articles of the road law, which involve fines up to twenty livres, or imprisonment in case of insolvency, a single witness is sufficient to convict.

27. No witnesses are paid in criminal cases: nor is the sheriff paid for issuing the summonses.

20. The witnesses to its execution; one of the attesting witnesses will be sufficient; in case of death their hand writing must be proved.

None; but an instrument after a lapse of ten years is of none effect unless it has been registered in the records of the Court.

Mr. F. Godfray, Greffier, and Mr. C. De Ste. Croix.

31 August, 1846.

1. (To Mr. Godfray.) What office do you hold?—I am greffier.
2. How long have you held that office?—Since the year 1812.
3. By whom were you appointed?—By Lord Hawnes.
4. Had you held any office before?—I had been attorney, or écrivain, to the Royal Court.
5. How long had you practised as an attorney?—From the year 1801 to the year 1812.
6. Exclusively in Jersey?—Yes; always in Jersey.
7. Do you practise still?—Being greffier, I do not practice as an attorney.
8. Have you any partner?—No.
9. By the constitution of the Court, is practising as an attorney incompatible with the office of greffier?—I do not think it is.
10. There is no rule against it?—I believe not.
11. Do you know whether it has ever been the case that a greffier has practised as an attorney?—When I was appointed, I was told by the then bailiff, Sir John Dumaresq, that I could practise as an attorney. However, from circumstances, I was obliged to give it up.
12. Do you recollect whether your predecessor practised?—No; he did not.
13. Probably you do not recollect what was the case with the person who preceded him?—I recollect the latter part of his time, but not when he was first appointed.
14. Can you say whether or not it has ever been done?—I do not think it has.
15. What are the duties of écrivain?—To act as solicitor in causes, to assist the advocate to pass public deeds, that is public contracts of sale and purchase of landed property; and he has another public duty, which is to take down the depositions of the witnesses in criminal matters, and also in civil matters. In civil matters he is paid; in criminal matters he is not.
16. (To Mr. De Ste. Croix.) What situation do you fill?—I am commis au greffe.
17. How are you appointed?—I am appointed by the bailiff, with the sanction of the greffier, and subject to the recall of the greffier: and I am paid by him. I am sworn by the Court.
18. Do you hold your office at the will of the greffier? Could you be dismissed by him?—I should suppose so.
19. When were you first appointed?—In the year 1833.
20. What had you been before?—I was écrivain of the Royal Court.
21. How long had you been so?—I had been so for ten years.
22. Are you so now?—I am so still, though I do not practise. I have also held the situation of advocate of the Ecclesiastical Court, and notary.
23. Have you any partner?—No.
24. Has there been any practice, analogous to that which Mr. Godfray has mentioned, that gentlemen filling your office have not practised as écrivains?—I am not aware that there has been. My reason for giving up practice, except in a few cases of a friendly nature, was that I thought, when I was appointed to my office, its functions were not compatible with my practising.
25. Has that been the general understanding before your time, do you think?—I do not think, as a matter of fact, as far as my knowledge goes, that the greffier or the commis au greffe has ever practised. The latter I do not consider a regular office, by the constitution of the island. It is entirely one of convenience, and exists by the sufferance of the Court.
26. (To Mr. Godfray.) Can you refer the Commissioners to any list of the records of the Court?—This (producing the same) is the one which was put into my hand when I was appointed.
27. What is the date of this catalogue?—3rd December, 1812. It is a report by three Jurats, James Hemery, James Hammond and Charles de la Garde, made in consequence of an Act of the Royal Court.
28. Of what do the documents under the first title consist;—"Inventaire des Rolles de la Cour Royale de l'île de Jersey?"—Of Acts of the Court and political orders.
29. When do they begin?—In 1504. There are very few of that date. They begin more regularly in 1524. I should mention that, up to the year 1797, criminal causes were treated in the Cour de Cattel. From that period they have been kept in separate books.

30. What is the date of the earliest book which you can produce?—The earliest is from 1524 to 1528 (producing the same).

31. That book consists of Rolls of the Court of Cattel?—Yes.

32. From 1524 down to the present time, have you the Rolls complete?—I believe they are complete. None of them is missing; but some of them are in a very bad state.

33. From 1524 down to 1797, in those records of the Cour de Cattel, there are both criminal and civil records; but subsequently to 1797 the criminal records have been kept apart?—Exactly so.

34. (To Mr. De Ste. Croix.) Will you state the form in which the proceedings of the Court are entered?—The entries in the book of criminal proceedings are made in the following order. The date before me is July 29th, 1846. It commences by a list of the bailli, or his lieutenant, and the jurats present, called the Entitulement. That is followed by a list of the absent jurats, stating those who are prevented attending by illness, and those who are defaulters without any excuse. This is before "Le Corps de la Cour," or "The Full Court." Each decision of the Court is entered separately. The first Act on the 29th of July is a Report of a Coroner's Jury, commonly called Levée de Corps. That is followed by a trial before the enditement. The roll of this trial consists, first of the name of the prisoner, then a recital of the accusation at length, and then it enumerates the persons composing the enditement. The Act then states the reading of the depositions, and the pleading of the prisoner. The prisoner pleads every time he is brought before the Court. The evidence previously taken in writing is then read.

35. The entry apparently contains a recital of the fact of the evidence being read, but not the evidence itself?—That is all. There may be documentary evidence also; all of which is referred to in that summary manner. The prisoner is then stated to be heard in his defence, by means of his advocate; and the Procureur Général de la Reine is heard. Les hommes de l'enditement then retire to confer in private. Being returned and agreed, they make their rapport to the Court, by means of their chairman, who is generally the constable. The Act of the Court then contains the finding, and states that the prisoner is endité criminellement. He then demands the benefit of the grande enquête; upon which, at the request of the Procureur Général, he is remanded to prison.

Juillet 29.—L'an mil huit-cent quarante-six, le vingt-neuvième jour de Juillet. Par devant Edouard Léonard Bisson, Ecuyer, Lieutenant de Messire Jean de Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli de l'Ile de Jersey, assisté de Philippe De Ste. Croix, Philippe Winter Nicolle, Charles Bertram, Jean Le Couteur, Philippe Picot, Philippe Le Gallais et François Arthur, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Philippe Marett,
Philippe Le Maistre, et Edouard Nicolle.
} Ecuyers, Jurés, sont en défaut excusés par maladie.

Jean Pelgué, Ec^r., Juré, est en défaut à assister à la Cour.

Messieurs Philippe Hellem, Helier Simon, Daniel Aubin, Philippe Renouf, fils Josué, Charles Huet, Charles Sullivan, Jean Moisson, George Le Gros, jun^r., Jean Coutanche, Jean Francois Lesbirel, Jean Le Ber, and Jean Philippe Ouless, actionnés par le Procureur Général de la Reine pour faire leur rapport à la justice, comment ils croient en leurs consciences que la mort est arrivée à M. Henry Edom, mort en la paroisse de St. Hélier, et ouir sur ce le rapport du Député Vicomte, ont fait leur rapport à la justice, d'opinion uniforme, comme ils avaient fait par devant le dit Sieur Député Vicomte, qu'ils croient en leurs consciences que le dit Henry Edom s'est lui même donné la mort en se pendant par le cou dans un moment d'aliénation mentale.

Pierre Marie Le Gendre, sous accusation d'avoir, mardi 19e jour de mai, 1846, ou vers ce tems là, commis un assaut grave sur la personne de la nommée Bridget Brown, et d'avoir attenté à sa vie, en lui portant un coup de couteau ou de quelqu' autre instrument, qui l'atteignit sur le derrière de la tête et lui causa une blessure grave; et d'avoir par là, le dit Pierre Marie Le Gendre, mis la vie de la dite Bridget Brown en danger; le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au rapport du centenier Le Bailly, de la paroisse de St. Hélier, et en l'Acte de la Cour, daté l'an 1846, le 23e jour de mai, convenu à l'instance du Procureur Général de la Reine, pour ouir le rapport des hommes de l'enditement de la paroisse de St. Laurens sur la dite accusation. Messrs. Jean Morel, Centenier, Edouard Laurens, Daniel Le Sueur, George Esnouf, Philippe Remon, Jean Rondel, Jean Remon, Jean De La Cour, Jean Tocque, Jean Crill, George Biguerel, Jean Le Cornu, Jean Gibaut, actionnés par le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine, pour passer comme hommes d'enditement à la charge ou décharge du dit Pierre Marie Le Gendre sur la dite accusation. L'accusation a été lue au dit prisonnier, qui a sur ce plaidé et fait sa déclaration, qui a été rédigée et logée au greffe. Lecture a été donnée des dépositions des témoins ci-devant rédigées par écrit et logées au greffe, et des autres pièces de la procédure; le dit prisonnier a été entendu en sa défense par le moyen de son avocat; et le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine a été ouï; les hommes de l'enditement se sont retirés, avec les pièces de la procédure, pour conférer dans le particulier; et, étant de retour, et à un accord, ils ont fait leur rapport à la justice, par le moyen du dit centenier, que le dit prisonner est plutôt coupable qu'innocent d'avoir commis un assaut grave sur la personne de Bridget Brown, le jour mentionné dans l'accusation, en lui faisant une blessure à la tête avec une pierre ou quelqu' autre instrument. Lequel verdict la Cour a reçu, nonobstant la prétention du défenseur de l'accusé qu'il n'est pas recevable, ne constatant pas la nature de l'instrument avec lequel la blessure a été causée. Partant le dit prisonnier demeure endité criminellement; et il a été renvoyé en prison, jusqu' à ce que le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine fasse convenir la grande enquête du pays, dont il a demandé le bénéfice.

36. Will you state in what form the record is made of the proceedings before the grande enquête?—In the case of the grande enquête, after the entitulement, the entry commences with the name of the prisoner. It recites the accusation, and that the prisoner has been found guilty by the enditement. The names of the grand enquête are given, stating for what purpose they are summoned by the Procureur Général.

JERSEY.

Mr. F. Godfray, Greffier, and Mr. C. De Ste. Croix.

31 August, 1846.

37. Is there any entry of any challenge on the part of the prisoner?—No; that does not appear; the names only are given of the twenty four persons accepted by the prisoner.

38. Supposing the prisoner were to challenge one of the grande enquête, there would be no entry of the challenge?—No: if the challenge were allowed, the party would be removed from the jury box, and replaced by another. The plea of the prisoner is the next entry. In the case before me, there are some objections taken by the prisoner, which being over-ruled, the depositions are read, as in the case of the former proceeding. Then the defence of the prisoner is heard; and then the Procureur Général. The men of the grande enquête withdraw, with all the documents, and, on their return, make their report. In the case before me, they were divided; consequently they made their report individually to the bailiff. The accusation was one of murder. More than a sufficient number were of opinion that the prisoner was plutôt coupable qu'innocente du crime d'homicide volontaire. Then follows the entry of attainder and conviction. The prisoner is then heard by her advocate in mitigation; and then the procureur makes his conclusions. The next entry is the sentence. If the sentence be in conformity with the conclusions of the Procureur Général, the record states it. The prisoner is then remitted till the pleasure of Her Majesty is known respecting her destination.

Avril 21. L'an mil huit-cent quarante-six, le vingt-unième jour d'Avril.

Par devant Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli de l'Ile de Jersey, assisté d'Edouard Léonard Bisson, Charles Bertram, Jean Le Couteur, Philippe Picot, Jean Pelgué, Phillipe Le Gallais, et François Arthur, écuyers, Jurés.

Après le serment de Pierre Marett, écuyer, Phillipe Marett, écuyer, Juré Justicier, a été exoîné par maladie.

Phillipe Le Maistre, Edouard Nicolle, } Ecuyers, Jurés, sont en défaut excusés par maladie.

Marie Le Noble, aliàs Marie Anne Le Noble, femme de Pierre Marie Le Gendre, et séparée de lui quant aux biens, sous accusation d'avoir, vendredi, le 27e jour de Février, 1846, ou vers ce tems là, commis le crime de meurtre sur la personne de Monsieur George Le Cronier, en portant un coup de couteau au dit Sieur Le Cronier, qui l'atteignit à l'abdomen, et lui a causé la mort; lequel Sieur Le Cronier était alors un des centeniers de la paroisse de St. Hélier, et agissant en exécution des devoirs de sa charge; le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au rapport du connétable de la paroisse de St. Hélier, et en l'acte de la Cour, daté l an 1846, le 11e jour de Mars; et la quelle Marie Le Noble, aliàs Marie Anne Le Noble, femme du dit Pierre Marie Le Gendre, et séparée de lui quant aux biens, a été enditée criminellement sur la dite accusation, comme paraît par acte de la Cour, daté l'an 1846, le 18e jour d'Avril; convenue à l'instance du Procureur Général de la Reine, pour ouir le rapport des hommes de la grande enquête du pays, dont elle a demandé le bénéfice, et voir ensuite ordonner par justice sur la dite accusation. La prisonnière, avant que de plaider à l'accusation, ayant soumis à la considération de la justice la question suivante, savoir: Que la procédure dans cette poursuite est irrégulière et nulle, pour les motifs suivans:

2°. De ce que les pièces de la procédure n'ont point été confiées au dit officier, pour être soumises à l'examen des dits membres de l'enditement; que par conséquent la pratique voulue et usitée en pareil cas n'a pas été observée.

3°. Que, si les membres de l'enditement se sont retirés pour délibérer, accompagnés d'une autre personne non compétente, cela ne peut suppléer à l'irrégularité et illégalité signalée plus haut.

Partant, la prisonnière ayant soumis humblement à la Cour que la dite procédure, et l'acte du dit jour 18me avril, 1846, sont nuls et sans effet,—

Attendu que la procédure a eu lieu de la manière usitée dans ce bailliage;

Qu'après que les hommes de l'enditement eurent, le dit jour 18me Avril dernier, prononcé leur verdict, il fut annoncé par le chef magistrat à la prisonnière, laquelle, par l'organe de son défenseur, demanda et obtînt le bénéfice de la grande enquête du pays;

Que l'acte fut lu publiquement en présence de la prisonnière, sans aucune objection ou réclamation de sa part, et reçut la sanction unanime de la Cour;

Attendu que Jean Philippe De Ste. Croix, écuyer, exerçait le dit jour les fonctions de Député Vicomte, des insignes de la quelle charge il était revêtu;

Que la présence momentanée à l'audience de Jean Le Couteur, écuyer, Vicomte, en son caractère privé, ne suffisait point pour interrompre le dit Sieur Député Vicomte dans l'exercise de ses fonctions;

Que ces deux fonctionnaires n'exerçaient point alors simultanément les devoirs de la charge de vicomte;

La Cour d'opinion uniforme a écarté la prétention de la prisonnière.

Monsieur Elie Amy.

Actionnés par le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine pour passer comme hommes de la grande enquête du pays à la charge ou décharge de la dite Marie Le Noble, aliàs Marie Anne Le Noble, femme de Pierre Marie Le Gendre, et séparée de lui quant aux biens, sur la dite accusation. Les hommes de la grande enquête ont été assermentés, comme en tel cas est requis et accoutumé. L'accusation a été lue à la prisonnière; et elle a sur ce plaidé et fait sa déclaration, qui a été rédigée et logée au greffe. Lecture a été donnée des dépositions des témoins, ci-devant rédigées et logées au greffe, et des autres pièces de la procédure. La prisonnière a été entendue en sa défense, par le moyen de son avocat; et le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine a été ouï. Les hommes de la grande enquête se sont retirés, avec toutes les pièces le la procédure, pour conférer dans le particulier: et, étant de retour, ils ont fait leur rapport à la justice; savoir: un nombre suffisant d'entr' eux, qu'ils croient en leurs consciences que la dite Marie Le Noble, aliàs Marie Anne Le Noble, est plutôt coupable qu'innocente du crime d'homicide volontaire. Partant elle en demeure dûment atteinte et convaincue. Ensuite, après qu'elle a été entendue par le moyen de son avocat, la Cour, conformément aux conclusions du dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine, a condamné et condamne la dite Marie Le Noble, aliàs Marie Anne Le Noble, a être déportée à tel lieu qu'il plaira à sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil d'ornonner, pour le terme de sa vie naturelle. Tous ses biens meubles et héritages, si elle en a, demeurent acquis et confisqués au bénéfice de Sa Majesté, ou du Seigneur auquel il appartient. Et elle est renvoyée en prison, jusqu'à ce que le bon plaisir de Sa Majesté soit connu touchant la dite déportation; auquel effet le greffier est chargé de transmettre copie authentique du présent acte au clerc en attendance du Conseil Privé de Sa Majesté.

39. (To Mr. Godfray.) What are the principal points in which the old records differ from the modern ones?—There is very little difference. The records are much more regular since the division in 1797. The Cour de Cattel was very much overloaded with both civil and criminal business.

40. Will you produce to the Commissioners, on a subsequent day, some one of the earliest records which you can find complete?—I will do so.

41. Have you among the muniments, in the form of a charter, the constitutions of King John?—We have not. A great number of the records were consumed by a fire in the early part of the 16th century.

42. Does either of the two sets of ordinances in the reign of Henry the Seventh exist?—No. We have a copy authenticated by the jurats.

43. Does the charter of Queen Elizabeth, of the 27th of June, 1562, exist in the shape of a charter?—No.

44. Does the charter of Charles the Second exist in any such form?—No.

45. Are the ordinances of the Commissioners who came over in the reign of Queen Elizabeth in existence?—Yes: we have them. Those of 1597 have not been considered as law. I believe they were not approved by Her Majesty. The question was brought before the Court about 16 years ago, as to whether they were to be considered as law: and the Court decided that, there not appearing any Order of Council confirming them, they were not binding.

46. Are the ordinances of Henry VII. considered as law in the island?—Yes; they are. There is also an ordinance of Henry VIII. One of the ordinances of Henry VII. requires the entries to be signed by the Jurats. We suppose that that ordinance must have been altered.

47. You suppose it must have been altered because the practice has been altered?—Yes. The charter of neither of the Henrys has been registered.

48. Are the entries signed in civil matters?—No.

Mr. François Godfray,
Mr. Charles De Ste. Croix, } further examined.

49. (To Mr. De Ste. Croix.) Can you now lay before the Commissioners some of the earlier entries of Acts of Court?—This (producing the same) is of the year 1646. 4 September, 1846.

50. Is that the earliest which you can find?—It is not the earliest; but it is the earliest that I find complete. In this entry there is the accusation, the report of the coroner's inquest, the enditement, and the grande enquête.

51. The enditement appears here to follow the coroner's inquest?—It took place on the same day.

52. Then there was no act of the Procureur Général?—It is all at the instance of the Procureur Général.

53. The inquest itself is understood to be so, is it?—It is. In fact he may be said to preside at the inquest.

54. Technically, it is at his instance that it is presented to the Court?—Yes: it is actionné by the Procureur Général. The Commissioners will observe that this proceeding bears but one date, because the proceedings at the ordinary Cour de Cattel always bear date the first day of the Assize in which they are held. In the old records the days of adjournment of the ordinary Court are numbered in the margin, deuxième, troisième, quatrième, and so on, but always under the date of the Assize. In the modern entries we say deuxième jour, troisième jour, but also stating the date. There is considerable singularity in the above record. The Act of the grande enquête is much more in detail. It contains the interrogatory to the prisoner and his answer.

55. It appears from this record that, though the prisoner was acquitted, he was nevertheless ordered to be remanded to prison till a communication had been made to the Lieutenant-Governor. Will you explain that?—At that time the powers of the Governor were very great. There were very few strangers; and any of them might be sent out of the island by the authority of the Governor, a reason being assigned for it.

56. How would such a prerogative of the Governor be put in motion? Would it be by any formal Act of the Court?—So far as the powers of the Court are concerned, here, the prisoner is discharged from the accusation; but it does not clearly appear that he was innocent.

57. Is there anything answering to that now?—It is never done in practice; though I believe the Governor has the power of doing it still.

58. In the case before us, the prisoner, being in fact acquitted, is sent back to prison till the pleasure of the Governor is known? Would that be done in any case now?—No: the prisoner, if he were acquitted, would be at once enlarged; and then the Governor might have him taken up again if he saw cause.

59. Suppose a foreigner were to be tried for a crime, and to be acquitted, would he be in any case retained in custody?—He would be discharged at once.

60. Suppose that he is tried and acquitted, but that he is a dangerous person, and a person whom it would be proper to remove from the island: the Governor having the power to remove him, and not the Court, what would be the course taken? Would the Court commit him to prison, or order him to be committed to prison?—In any case of imminent danger, I imagine the Court would remand him, stating the reason why they did so, till the Lieutenant Governor should be in possession of the facts.

61. Mr. Godfray. There have been instances in which persons whom the Governor ordered to quit the island have not gone of their own accord. The Governor has had them taken up and brought before the Royal Court; and the Court enforced the order of the Governor.

62. Would that be a formal act of the Court?—There is no act of the Court. I only know of two instances of that kind, because, when the Governor has ordered strangers to go away from the island, they have generally obeyed the order.

63. Mr. De Ste. Croix. It is a prerogative which has not been enforced much since the peace: but there have been several instances of it.

64. (To Mr. Godfray.) The natural course appears to be that, the Governor having the power, he would act by his own officer, without the necessity of any proceeding before the Court?—That is the general course: but there have been rare instances in which the Governor has thought it proper to have the authority of the Court also. I have here the order of the Privy Council, of the 12th of June, 1635, in reference to strangers. "For the better government of the isle, it is likewise thought fit that the names of all strangers coming into the isle should be delivered unto the Governor, or Lieutenant Governor, within twenty four hours of their coming thither; and that no strangers dwell or marry in the isle without leave of the Governor or his lieutenant."

The following is the article of the code of the 28th of March, 1771, on the same subject.

"Conformément à certain ordre du Roi et du Conseil, daté le douzième jour de juin, 1635, entériné aux Rolles de la Cour Royale le vingt-quatrième jour de Septembre en suivant; et à certaine lettre des Seigneurs du Conseil de sa Majesté, datée le vingtième jour de Février, mil six-cent soixante, entérinée le vingt-septième avril mil six-cent soixante-cinq:—

"Il est ordonné qu' aucun habitant de cette isle, soit tavernier ou autre, ne recevra aucun étranger dans sa maison, ni ne permettra à aucun d'y rester plus d'une nuit, sans en avertir le connétable de la paroisse, à peine de dix livres d'amende, tiers au Roi, tiers aux pauvres, et tiers au délateur.

"Le connétable de la paroisse de St. Hélier sera sujet de faire rapport à M. le Gouverneur, dans vingt-quatre heures, de la connoissance qui lui aura été donnée de l'arrivée des étrangers, ou aussitôt qu'il lui sera possible; et les connétables des autres paroisses dans huit jours pour le plus tard, ou aussi-tôt que possible; si tels étrangers étoient suspects. Les étrangers ne seront point soufferts à demeurer en cette isle, ni à épouser des femmes du pays, sans la permission de M. le Gouverneur, selon qu'il est dirigé par le dit ordre de sa Majesté et de son Conseil, du douzième Juin, 1635; et s'ils contreviennent, ils seront contraints de vider le pays."

65. Mr. De Ste. Croix. There is also a record of the 13th of April, 1699 (producing the same). It varies from the other, inasmuch as the proceedings, with the exception of the grande enquête, are held at the extraordinary Court.

(The same is read as follows.)

"A la Cour Royale de l'île de Jersey, l'an mille six-cent nonante-neuf, le treizième jour d'Avril, Rachel de Queteville, femme de Jean le Maistre, accusée d'avoir pris et volé des gerbes chez M^e Geo. Poindestre, et trouvée saisie du blead ꝑvenu des d^tes gerbes, ꝑ le cons^le et off^rs de S^t. Sauveur, est envoyée prisonnière jusq^e à autre ordre, inst^ce des off^rs du Roy. L'an mille six-cent nonante-neuf, le quinzième jour d'Avril, Rachel de Queteville, cejourd'huy produite en Cour, est renvoyée de-rechef prisonnière jusq^e à autre ordre; et permis aux off^rs du Roy d'informer.

Ces vingt quatre hommes ayant été convenus en qualité d'hommes d'enquête, à la charge ou descharge du crime de larçin, dont Rachel De Queteville serait accusée, ont déclaré croire en leurs consciences qu'elle n'est coupable du d$^{t}$ crime; c'est pourquoy elle demeure libérée de prison.

66. There appears a considerable difference between this entry and those of the present day, particularly in reference to the enditement?—There is a considerable difference.

67. This entry does not contain the act of the prisoner demanding the grande enquête?—No; it does not. It is very summary indeed; and so is the act of the grande enquête.

68. All this is antecedent to the form of "plutôt coupable qu' innocent?"—Yes.

69. What is the form of registering Orders in Council?—Orders in Council are found registered in three different books; namely, in the records of the States, in those of the Cour de Cattel, and in those of the Cour d'Héritage (the two ordinary Courts). The reason of those orders being found registered in the books of the States and of those two Courts I conjecture to be this: that, after their arrival, they were presented on the earliest day of the assembling of one of those bodies: either the States, the Cour d'Héritage or the Cour de Cattel registered, and ordered to be published in order to give them the earliest possible force. One registration was sufficient: and that registration contained the order for publication which gave them their sanction. The inconvenience of that proceeding has been found subsequently; and we have now a book specially devoted to the registration of Orders in Council.

70. Is the registration an Act of the States now?—No. Orders in Council are almost always addressed to the Bailiffs and Jurats, so that the registration is ordered by that Court. The Order in Council must be registered by the Court, in order to be published, before it has the force of law. It does not operate ipso jure.

71. Has there not been a recent decision of the Privy Council, that even without registration such an Order becomes law?—Not an Order of Council.

72. Mr. Godfray. I believe there has been something of the kind: but I think such an Order never could be enforced here unless it had been registered.

73. Mr. De Ste. Croix. This (producing the same) is the book in which Orders in Council are now registered. In civil cases the register is at the suit of the party wishing to have the Order registered. He actions the other party to appear before the Court, in order that the Order in Council may be registered. A general Order in Council is produced generally by the Attorney General, and read by him.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq., (Procureur Général) examined.

T. Le Breton, Esq.
7 September, 1846.

74. The gentlemen of the bar who have favoured the Commissioners with the answers to their queries state, as might be expected, in answer to the first question, that they have acquired their experience by practising at the bar. Do you happen to know, as matter of custom, whether the gentlemen who practise at this bar usually educate themselves at the English bar, or at the French bar, or exclusively here?—Never exclusively here: both in France and in England. In France, of course, to obtain fluency in the French language, which they cannot obtain either in England or in this country.

75. Is it generally in both places, or only in one?—Generally in both.

76. Have any of the gentlemen practising here been called to the English bar?—Mr. Godfray has.

77. (To Mr. Godfray.) Did you practise in England at all?—No.

78. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Is the ordinary course of study for the gentlemen of the bar to make themselves familiar with the foreign systems of law?—There is no regular course of study at all. It is left entirely to the gentleman's own ideas of what is the best course to adopt.

79. If you had a nephew or son whom you proposed to bring up to this bar, what advice should you give him as to his course of study?—I should give him the advice, after he had finished his education, to make himself acquainted both with French and English law.

80. After he had finished his school and collegiate education?—Yes; or even without a collegiate education.

81. Do you know at all, historically, in what the limitation of the number of the bar originated?—No: it has always been so limited; but when the limitation began I am not aware. That might be ascertained, perhaps, by making some researches.

82. (To Sir John De Veulle.) Do you know?—No.

83. (To Mr. Le Breton.) They are entirely selected by the bailiff, I believe?—Yes, entirely.

84. Will you give the Commissioners the names of the gentlemen who constitute the present bar?—Mr. Hammond is the oldest, I think; Mr. Le Couteur, the next; Mr. Francis Godfray, the next; Mr. Peter Le Sueur, the next; Mr. James Godfray, fifth; and Mr. Robert Pipon Marett, the sixth.

85. Have all those gentlemen pursued the course you were speaking of?—I am not aware. I could not answer for all of them.

86. The Attorney and Solicitor General, I suppose, are considered to be members of the bar?—They are.

87. Speaking of all those gentlemen, you would probably say that not having studied at either the French or the English bar is a case of exception?—I should think so.

88. The Attorney General is the Procureur, and the Solicitor General the Avocat, de la Reine?—Yes.

89. Has there been any custom for the gentlemen of the bar to practise in any department of the law here? For instance, as écrivain or greffier?—An avocat may do the business of écrivain also of right.

90. Are they selected in any instance from the écrivains?—Not particularly so. I am not aware of any instances.

91. Sir John De Veulle. None of the present bar are so, I think.

92. Mr. Hammond. The appointment would depend upon the bailiff, and is quite irrespective of their previous occupation.

93. Mr. Evans. There is nothing to prevent any person not brought up to the law practising. The écrivain takes proceedings as an attorney would. The only distinction is, that an écrivain can pass contracts, as it is called, which a person not brought up to the law cannot do.

94. Is the number of écrivains limited?—No.

95. (To Mr. Le Breton.) With respect to the gentlemen who sit as judges, the Jurats, do they make a point of going through any legal education previously to their election as Jurats?—No.

96. They have, in point of fact, political functions of considerable importance to discharge, have not they?—Yes; they act as judges in Court, and as members of the States; they have political as well as judicial functions.

97. Have not some of the gentlemen who are Jurats had opportunities of becoming conversant with the law? Mr. Le Gallais, for instance?—He was deputy vicomte for a great number of years, and in large practice as an attorney.

98. By attorney do you mean écrivain?—Yes; Mr. Marett was, a long time, member of the bar; he was so when he was elected a Jurat.

99. Will you be good enough to mention the names of the present Jurats?—Mr. Phillip Marett, Mr. Phillip Le Maistre, Mr. Edward Léonard Bisson, Mr. Phillip De Sainte Croix, Mr. Edward Nicolle, Mr. Phillipe Winter Nicolle, Mr. Charles Bertram, Mr. John Le Couteur, Mr. Phillipe Picot, Mr. John Pelgué, Mr. Phillipe Le Gallais, Mr. Francis Arthur.

100. (To Mr. Marett.) You were a member of the Bar, we understand, before you filled the office of Jurat?—Yes: I was at the bar.

101. As Mr. Le Maistre is not present, perhaps some gentleman may know what was his occupation previous to his becoming a Jurat?

102. Mr. Le Breton. He was a country gentleman, I believe.

103. Vicomte. I think he had been constable and centenier.

104. Mr. Godfray (Advocate). He had been nine years constable.

JERSEY.

T. Le Breton, Esq.

7 September, 1846.

105. (To Mr. Bisson.) Had you had any opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of law, previously to your filling the office of Jurat?—I had no occupation whatever before I was Jurat.

106. Mr. Edward Nicolle. Mr. Bisson had been for some time at Caen.

107. (To Mr. Bisson.) Did you fill any parochial office previously to your becoming a Jurat?—I was elected a constable; but I was not sworn in.

108. (To Mr. Phillipe De Sainte Croix.) Had you given any attention to the profession of the law before you were a Jurat?—No: I was a merchant before I was elected a Jurat.

109. Had you acted as constable?—No: not at all.

110. Do you still continue a merchant?—Yes.

111. Had you served any of the parochial offices?—I had been twice elected constable of St. Héliers: for six years I exercised that office.

112. (To Mr. Edward Nicolle.) Did you give any attention to the study of the law before you were a Jurat?—No: a good deal to justice, as far as I could; but very little to law.

113. (To Mr. Phillip Nicolle.) Had you given any attention to the study of the law before you were a Jurat?—I am a merchant by profession. I have been in the office of police officer and centenier. I was twice elected centenier, and served three years: the last time, I declined serving.

114. Three years is the amount of your service?—Yes.

115. Were you constable also?—No: I had not been constable before I was elected a Jurat.

116. (To Mr. Charles Bertram.) Had you given any attention to the study of the law before you were elected Jurat?—I had been three years centenier, and three years constable of Grouville parish.

117. Had you any opportunity of studying the law, or knowing the practice of it, except in those offices?—No.

118. You are a proprietor?—Yes.

119. You do not carry on any trade?—No: I never did.

120. By proprietor you mean a landowner?—Yes.

121. (To Mr. John Le Couteur.) Will you have the goodness to answer the same question?—I have served the office of constable of St. Mary's.

122. Had you had any opportunities for any previous study of the law before you became Jurat?—No.

123. Nor subsequently?—No.

124. Are you in business?—No: I am a proprietor.

125. (To Mr. Phillip Picot.) Will you be kind enough to answer the same question?—I have stated, in answer to the first series of questions, that I had served the offices of centenier and constable of Saint John's parish.

126. Are you in trade?—No: I am a holder of land.

127. (To Mr. John Pelgué.) Will you be kind enough to answer the same question?—I had been two years in a denunciateur's office. Previously to that, I had been constable, and had become acquainted with the criminal law in that way, I was oftentimes called upon to perform the duty of a member of the "enditement."

128. You are a landed proprietor, I believe?—Yes; I am a landed proprietor.

129. (To Mr. Le Gallais.) Will you be kind enough to answer the same question?—I had been twenty five years in practice as an écrivain. I also held the office of deputy vicomte.

130. (To Mr. Francis Arthur.) Will you answer the same question?—I served the parish of St. Ouen for nine years as chief of Police.

131. I believe you are a landed proprietor also?—Yes: I am.

131. (To Sir John De Veulle.) Prior to the Constitutions of King John, is there any evidence of the existence of the office of Bailiff?—Yes: I believe there is.

132. It would appear that the effect of the Constitutions of King John, if those were really the origin of the twelve jurats, was to abridge the power of the Bailiff?—Yes; because that officer then held the two swords.

133. Can you say whether there was any officer in the old Norman law answering to the jurat, as forming part of the body of the Court?—I am not aware of there being any.

134. Mr. Edward Nicolle. I should say it was the seigneur, who administered justice, assisted by his franc tenants.

135. Can you give any passage confirmatory of that opinion?

136. Vicomte. I should think there was such a passage in Rouillé. It shall be looked out by a future day. I consider that the seigneur sat, and, with the assistance of his franc tenants, adjusted all difficulties.

137. As subordinate to the Bailiff?—Yes; I should say so. At that time we had prevôts, who are now sunk into very subordinate officers; but they were then very important officers.

138. Is there any qualification for the office of Jurat except the being elected?

139. Mr. Evans. There is a qualification that they must have 30*l.* a year; and they cannot carry on the trade of brewer, baker, butcher or tavern keeper.

140. Is that 30*l.* a year proceeding from land?—Yes: 40 quarters of wheat rent, which is equivalent to about 30*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.* in money now. It was much higher formerly. The value of a quarter is 15*s.* 3*d.* British, and 16*s.* 8*d.* Jersey.

141. They take an oath of office, of course?—Mr. Le Breton. Yes: the following is the oath of office, as it is set forth in the code of 1771. (*The same was read.)

142. There is no religious qualification, is there?—No.

* See the oath set out at p. 78.

143. Mr. Nicolle. There was formerly, previously to abolishing of the Test and Corporation Acts: but there is none now.

144. Mr. Evans. The oath of allegiance and the oath of supremacy were required to be taken formerly. Since the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act, the Declaration which is contained in the Act of Parliament has been substituted for it.

145. Mr. Le Breton. An oath of office is taken still. The following declaration is made, that they will not use the power of their office to endanger the Church of England.

"Je, A. B., certifie et déclare, solemnellement et sincèrement, en la présence de Dieu, sur la vraie foi d'un Chrétien, que jamais je n'exercerai aucun pouvoir, autorité ou influence, que j'ai ou que je pourrai avoir en vertu de la charge de , pour ébranler ou affoiblir L'Eglise Protestante, telle qu'elle est établie par la loi en Angleterre, ou pour troubler la dite Eglise, ou le clergé de la dite Eglise, dans la possession de tous les droits ou priviléges auxquels la dite Eglise, ou les dits Evêques, et le dit clergé, ont ou pourront avoir droit par la loi."

146. Before the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, they took the oath of supremacy?—No: I believe they only took the oath of office; but the above declaration has been added since the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and is required to be made within six months of their taking office.

147. Mr. Evans. I believe the truth to be this. The Acts of Parliament were transmitted here to be registered; the islands not being named in them, the States adopted an Act of their body, which was confirmed by an Order of Her Majesty in Council, requiring a declaration of the same description as that contained in the Act of Parliament.

148. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Do you remember any recent instance of the exception mentioned in the 5th Article of the Constitutions of King John taking place: "Exceptis casibus nimis arduis, et si quis legitimé convictus fuerit a fidelitate Domini regis tanquam proditor recessisse?" What is the meaning of that?—Proditor, as I understand it, refers to the concealing a theft, or to misprision of treason. No case has happened, within my knowledge, of any person being taken up and not tried here under that article.

149. I suppose the phrase "exceptis casibus nimis arduis" refers to cases of treason, also to cases of dispute arising between members of the States, or members of the Court and the Governor?—That is the interpretation which has been generally given to that clause.

150. Do you remember any instance of the Court putting a construction upon it?—There is one instance of a man of the name of Milais, in 1781. The following is the Order in Council with respect to it:—"At the Court of St. James's, the 15th of June, 1781, Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty, Lord President, Earl of Hillsborough, Earl of Clarendon, Earl Nugent, George Germain, Viscount Townshend, Viscount Stormont, Lord Amherst.

Whereas there was this day read at the Board a Report from the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the affairs of Jersey and Guernsey, dated the 12th of this instant, upon considering the case of Mr. Edward Milais of the Island of Jersey, confined on suspicion of a treasonable correspondence some time since, but now enlarged upon bail: His Majesty, having taken the same into his Royal consideration, is pleased, with the advice of the Privy Council, to order, as is hereby ordered, that the Right Honourable Gentleman Conway, Governor of His Majesty's said Island of Jersey, do forthwith appoint such persons as he shall judge proper to take informations upon oath touching the matter with which the said Edward Milais stands charged (which oath the persons who shall be so appointed are hereby authorized and empowered to administer); and that the said Governor do cause all such informations, properly authenticated, to be transmitted to the Right Honourable the Earl of Hillsborough, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, in order to be laid before His Majesty in Council for the further signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereupon. Whereof the Governor of his said Island of Jersey for the time being, and all others whom it may concern, are to take notice, and govern themselves accordingly."

151. Mr. Dupré. After the attack of the French there was a person taken up on suspicion; the case was inquired into by the Governor and the jurats; he was sent up to London; and no trial in consequence took place.

152. (To le Greffier.) I suppose there would be a record of that?—I believe there is.

153. Mr. Dupré. I believe there is a case of a man of the name of Junot, in the 16th century.

154. Was it a case of treason?—Yes. The case was not proceeded with.

155. Mr. Marett. There is a reference, in the printed statement of Hemery and Dumaresq, to a case in which a person was kept in prison for a considerable time without any redress; and it was thought a case of very great hardship.

156. (To Sir John De Veulle.) It appears that most of the Jurats have filled the office of constable or centenier, or some other parish office; is it necessary that a person should have filled some or one of those offices in order to be Jurat?—I believe not.

157. (To Mr. Le Gallais.) You have stated that you were écrivain before you became Jurat; I make no doubt you ceased to practise as écrivain after you became Jurat?—Yes. I held the office of écrivain and Deputy Vicomte at the same time.

158. Is there any law to prevent a person from acting at the same time as écrivain and Jurat?—I believe there is; it is never done.

159. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do those six gentlemen, who are admitted to practise as barristers, in point of fact, all practise? Do they all attend the Courts?—Not all of them.

160. How many of them do not?—Two do not regularly practise.

161. There is some formal obligation, is not there, to attend regularly?—Yes.

162. Where is that regulation to be found?—It is to be found in the oath administered to advocates, every six months, at the sitting of the Cour d'Héritage.

163. Mr. Francis Godfray, (Avocat.) There is no obligation on an advocate to attend,

JERSEY.

T. Le Breton, Esq.

7 September, 1846.

unless he has causes, except at the Cour d'Héritage. If he fail to attend the Cour d'Héritage four terms, which would occupy two years, he would lose his place, in the absence of a sufficient excuse.

164. As to the Criminal Court there is no obligation to attend, is there?—Not unless he has a cause.

165. Supposing the six counsel happened all to be away, except Her Majesty's officers, does the Court lose the means of assigning counsel to a prisoner?—Then the advocate would be told that he was appointed, and he would act for the prisoner.

166. Supposing he were in London, or in Paris?—If he is absent from the island he cannot attend, of course.

167. Mr. Marett. The practice has been, when a prisoner did not wish to have either of the advocates who happened to be present, for the Bailiff to summon them all, and to allow the prisoner to choose the advocate he thinks proper.

168. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Will you point out any passage in the Code which forbids a Jurat acting as écrivain?—The following passage, in page 163, appears to me virtually to do so:—" Les Jurés ne plaideront, ni ne donneront point conseil, en aucunes autres causes que celles où ils seront intéressés; celui d'entre eux qui entreprendra de le faire sera privé de sa voix dans l'affaire dépendante; cependant, lorsqu'un Juge ne sera point satisfait sur quelque point de la contestation, et qu'il désirera d'être mieux informé, afin de donner une saine opinion, le Chef Magistrat y fera pourvoir."

169. Mr. Marett. It appears to me that that practically forbids their practising; because, as all the Judges serve in turn, at all causes indiscriminately, they cannot tell when any one of them may be called on to act.

170. Mr. Evans. There is another part of the Code which says that a Jurat shall not be procureur or attorney.

171. Mr. Godfray, (Greffier.) It is not in the Code; it is in the Regulations of the Commissioners of 1562. " Item, que les Jurés, ne aucun d'Iceux, ne le Vicomte, ne le Dénontiateurs, ne le Greffier de la Cour, dorénavant ne seront receus à estre meneurs, procureurs, ou attournés d'aucun, ne de plaider en Cour pour aucun, quel qu'il soit, fors po$^{r}$ leurs pŕs cães, mais soy comporteront indifférent selon le devoir de leurs offices, entendu, toutefois et quantes, si aucun son Testament ou dernière volonté comet et établit, ou choisit l'un des dits jurez, ou le Vicomte, Dénontiateurs, ou le Greffier, ou aucun autre, pour estre meneur ou tuteur des enfans du dit décédé, qu'adonc celui qui par le dit décédé sera ainsy choisy et nomé pourra estre meneur ou tuteur des enfans du dit décédé sans préjudicier ne enfreindre c'este présente ordonance non plus et quantes si elle n'avoit oncques esté faite."

172. Mr. Evans. The question was decided at the Privy Council upon that very order; and Lord Lyndhurst, who was presiding at the time, adopted the law as laid down there.

173. Mr. Le Breton. The following is the law relating to the bailly's power over the Jurats and other officers of the Court:—Les Jurés, et les autres officiers de la Cour, doivent accompagner le Bailly, ou son Lieutenant, de son appartement au siége de Justice, et lui porter respect comme à celui qui représente la personne de Sa Majestie, et qui est son premier ministre dans ce lieu là; et, en particulier, lorsqu'il est en Cour, ou executant le devoir de sa charge; le délinquant doit être suspendu, si c'est un juge ou autre officier, et tous autres seront punis par emprisonnement, jusqu' à ce qu'ils aient réparé leur faute, en demandant pardon, et satisfait à la peine pécuniare qui leur aura été imposée, selon la nature de l'offense."

174. Mr. Dupré. It has frequently occurred that a prisoner was not satisfied with the advocate assigned to him; or it has happened that the advocate he had selected was not present. In that case, the Bailiff has generally summoned either all the advocates, or that particular advocate.

175. Sir John de Veulle. I recollect a case where the defendant could not find an advocate. I summoned all the advocates, that he might have a choice of one.

176. Mr. Le Breton. Those were not criminal cases, but civil cases.

177. (To Sir John de Veulle.) Have you the power of dismissing?—No.

178. Mr. Marett. It is a power of fine and imprisonment.

179. Mr. Evans. That is vexata quæstio. The Advocates will say no; the Court will say yes.

180. Vicomte. The Bailiff may suspend: there is an order of council to that effect.

181. Mr. Le Breton. The following is a passage from the code of 1771, showing the power which the bailiff possesses over the Advocates.

" Les parties, ni leurs avocats, ne s'interrompront point en plaidant; mais le demandeur établira ses raisons, le silence étant gardé par la partie adverse; après quoi, celle-ci fera sa réponse, observant le même ordre: et de cette manière procéderont par voie de réplique ou duplique, si tant est que l'affaire le requierre: et quiconque transgressera cette régle, si c'est un avocat, sera puni par amende, à la délibération de justice, laquelle n'excédera point trois livres tournois pour la première offense, et sera interdit pour un mois pour la seconde, et pour toujours en cas d'autre récidive: et, si c'est un particulier, on lui infligera une amende qui n'excédera point trois livres."

183. (To Sir John de Veulle.) Jurats occasionally act for each other, I suppose?—Yes; they are bound, if they cannot be present themselves, to request another Jurat to sit in their stead.

184. Supposing there were an instance in which a Jurat practised as écrivain, and his cause came on, he would not be subject to that particular law if another gentleman sat for him?—In point of practice there is nothing of that kind occurs.

185. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) You say, if the avocat fails to attend the Cour d'Héritage, and to renew his oath, he cannot plead during the term unless he gives sufficient excuse for his absence. If he continues absent for a certain time, does he lose the privilege of pleading altogether?—There is no example of it. I suppose it would take place.

186. Mr. Marett. If an advocate omits to appear at the Cour d'Héritage during four successive terms, he is liable to lose his place. Strictly speaking, an advocate who omits to renew his oath regularly can be prevented pleading during that term till he has renewed his oath. The Bailiff would have the privilege of reappointing him. The following is the oath taken by the advocate.

"Vous jurez et promettez, par la foi et serment que vous devez à Dieu, que bien et fidellement vous exercerez l'état et charge d'Avocat en la Cour Royale de notre souverain Seigneur le Roi . . . . par la Grâce de Dieu, Roi de la Grande Bretagne, &c., en cette son Isle de Jersey, la Majesté duquel vous reconnoissez sous Dieu, suprême Gouverneur en tous ses Royaumes, Provinces, et Dominions, quittant, et renonçant à toutes autres superiorités foraines et étrangères; vous garderez le droit de sa Majesté et de ses sujets, et soutiendrez l'honneur et gloire de Dieu et de son Eglise. Vous défendrez et maintiendrez les priviléges, franchises, coutumes et libertés de l'isle, vous opposant à quiconque les voudrait enfreindre. Vous n'entreprendrez ni ne soutiendrez, soit en demandant ou défendant, aucune cause qui vous paraîtra dénuée de tout droit, ou intentée ou soutenue par méchanceté. Vous ne controuverez aucuns faits, si vos cliens ne vous les ont affirmés pour vrais. Vous ne proposerez ni alléguerez aucun fait, coutume ni usage, que vous saurez être contraires à droit et justice; et si aucune chose touche le droit de sa Majesté, vous en informerez la Cour, et le maintiendrez. Vous ne ferez aucun marché ni contrat avec vos cliens, d'aucune cause en litige ou contentieuse, ni de partie d'icelle. Vous vous contenterez de gages et salaires raisonnables, et assisterez aux veuves, pauvres, orphelins, et personnes indéfendues. Et finalement en vos conclusions, vous vous conformerez selon le bon avis de Monsieur le Bailly, ou de Monsieur son Lieutenant, et de Messieurs de Justice, assistant aux Cours, selon le devoir de votre charge."

187. It would amount to a cession of his place: the Bailiff could fill up his place?—Yes.

188. (To Sir John de Veulle.) Do you assent to that?—Yes.

[The Witness withdrew.]

John Hammond, Esq., examined.

189. The gentlemen who have answered the queries of the Commissioners state that among the authorities there are the precedents of the Court. In what shape are the precedents accessible?—They are in the Court Rolls, and in the custody of the clerk of the Court, or greffier; and in all criminal cases, where an advocate charged with the defence of a prisoner wishes to refer to those, he applies at the office of the clerk of the Court, and has an inspection of the books.

190. How does he know how to search?—By his own industry, nothing more; we have no printed reports.

191. And no digest?—None.

192. I suppose some of the gentlemen who are here keep notes?—Yes; but they are principally in civil cases. I am not aware, as to criminal precedents, that they are to be found anywhere else than in the Court Rolls.

193. There would be some points of evidence which would be frequently recurring?—All defence in criminal causes is gratuitous. Of course, therefore, the advocate has the inspection of those Court Rolls gratuitously. But, when the prisoner is in circumstances of being able to defray the expense, I conceive it follows the ordinary rule, that is of paying for the precedents which may be obtained, or for the services of the advocate, as the case may be.

194. In cases where the French and English law were at variance, supposing no precedent in the Jersey law, and no definite article in any part of the codes, what is it which induces an advocate to choose to which he shall resort?—I can only judge from my own mode of proceeding, that, where I find any principle of law analogous and favourable to the arguments I have to put forward, in one or the other (I am speaking of the Norman law and of the English), I would bring it forward as a principle of law; not quoting it as the law which necessarily guides us, but as a principle whence our own law would be deducible. The Attorney General, in all probability, would have his authorities.

195. (To Mr. Arthur, Jurat.) In the French Code Pénale it is laid down that an attempt to commit a crime accompanied with an inception of the Act, and only stopped by something with which the prisoner has nothing to do, is tantamount to committing the crime itself: the English law makes it a much less offence than the crime, and turns it from a felony into a misdemeanour. Which of those would be preferred? The advocate, Mr. Hammond, says he would prefer which ever suited him.—I think the English law.

196. As being milder, or from a general preference to the English law?—I think the English law would be preferred.

197. (To Sir John de Veulle.) By the French law, the punishment of beheading attaches to certain crimes: there is nothing of that sort here?—Of course not.

198. Is there anything like restitution in criminal cases?—I think the Code Napoleon is never quoted; certainly not once in one hundred times.

199. (To Mr. Hammond.) The code of 1771, I suppose, is undoubted and peremptory law now, except where it has been since altered?—Yes. A good many of its provisions have been abrogated; but we find very little there to assist us in criminal proceedings.

200. Is there anything in the code of 1771 relative to Criminal Law?—There is one particular part, as to accomplices. "Conformément à l'Ordre du Conseil de 1635, le 12e juin, ceux qui seront accessoires en crimes de meurtres, ou qui en félonie, après le crime commis, recevront ou favoriseront les coupables avant leur conviction, ou qui emporteront ou favoriseront l'évasion des coupables hors de l'isle, après que proclamation aura été faite de les appréhender, et ceux qui briseront la prison, ou assisteront tels délinquants, seront punis par amende et emprisonnement."

201. With that exception, is there any criminal enactment in the code of 1771?—I am not aware of any: I do not think there is any whatever. There is a kind of police regulation as to the paving of the streets.

202. At the time of the code of 1771, the criminal law would consist of its enactments and the common law?—Yes; that would be all.

203. Subsequently to 1771, the laws would be the laws of the States, confirmed by Orders in Council; Acts of Parliament in which the island is named; and Acts of Parliament registered in compliance with an Order in Council; those would be the subsequent laws?—If the islands were not named in the Act of Parliament, the more usual mode is to make the local law in harmony with the provisions of the Act of Parliament, getting that law confirmed by the Council: it then becomes a local Act.

204. That would be an Act of the States confirmed by the Council?—Yes, the initiative being in some measure taken by the States on those occasions.

205. Has the law of the island followed the changes in the English law to any extent, with reference to the criminal law?—Not by any enactments.

206. Breaking open a house, for instance, at twelve o'clock at night, with intent to steal. We used to hang for that; now we do not, unless under particular circumstances. How is that here?—There is no doubt that, as to the punishment for such a crime, it was death; and that has been put into execution. But subsequently the punishment would not be death, but in all probability transportation, perhaps also depending much upon the particular circumstances of the case. But we have no law enacting that in so many words. The practice has changed with regard to the punishments without any definite law making those changes.

207. That is a difficulty we feel about this law. It would appear, from the answer given just now, that there is a recognised common law antecedent to any code. That common law must be common law to this moment, unless some code has changed it. I understand you to say it has been changed without any statutory alteration?—The administration of it has been changed. The definition of the crime is the same; but the mode of punishing it is changed. The last case in which a person suffered death for burglary was about forty or fifty years ago, We have had many convictions for it since.

208. Is it now legal in Jersey to hang for burglary?—The punishment is death, according to the common law.

209. Is it legal?—I should think that that might be the punishment, certainly.

210. (To Sir John de Veulle.) Is that your view of the law? Can the law not formally abrogated cease to be law?—No: it does not cease to be law.

211. Mr. Hammond. The pillory was a very common punishment here, and scourging. It has been practised since I was at the bar, on many occasions, for forgery, robbery, larceny, and also burglary. In later years there has been no such punishment. The generally substituted punishment has been transportation for a period of years. We have no definite law stating that for such a crime such punishment should be awarded; but a change has taken place in the adjudication of punishment by a kind of consensus on the part of the authorities, without any written law to guide it.

212. What makes transportation on conviction for burglary legal? What is to prevent a man bringing a writ of error, on an action for false imprisonment in such a case?

213. Sir John de Veulle. The Act of Court is confirmed by an Order in Council.

214. Mr. Francis Godfray, (Advocate.) When the first person was transported, it was said it was quite illegal; but the Court transported the man; and Her Majesty, not in Council, but the Secretary of State, I think, stated that this man would be sent to Botany Bay.

215. Mr. Philip Nicolle. There was an Order in Council allowing us to transport.

216. Sir John de Veulle. The punishment of transportation is of very modern origin: and, in every case when a man has been transported, that I am aware of, the Court sends up the Act to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council makes an Order in Council ordering the transportation.

217. If that were so, the effect would be that an illegal sentence would be made legal by an ex post facto law.

218. Mr. Hammond. In the strict sense, that is the technical way in which one would view it.

219. Mr. Francis Godfray, (Advocate.) The Court has no power to transport a person to a specific place. They may banish him. The Court has done it: but it has been confirmed by the Council.

220. In England we have no power to transport except by Act of Parliament.—No: it was so stated to the Court the last time they did it; but it was overruled.

221. Sir John de Veulle. I am told that there is an English Act of Parliament giving us power; but I never saw it.

222. Mr. Hammond. There is no register of such an Act of Parliament that I am aware of.

223. Mr. Francis Godfray, (Advocate.) The Order that comes before the removal of the prisoner is only to state the place where the prisoner is to be taken. It is not to be supposed that the Order in Council comes to confirm the judgment of the Court. The Court have no power to transport the prisoner. As for an Act of Parliament authorizing the Court of Jersey to do so, there is no such Act.

224. (To Mr. Hammond.) In cases of rape, for instance, what would be the punishment?—I consider that by our common law the punishment is death.

225. Has that ever been altered?—Not by any legal enactment.

226. Therefore the punishment which is inflicted for that would be subject to the same remarks as have been made as to burglary?—I conceive it would be so. I do not know a case where there has been a conviction for rape of late. There have been some accusations; but they have not been found, I think. The last, I think, was found merely as an assault.

227. Colonel Le Couteur states, in his answers, that there is an Order in Council making the crime of an unnatural offence punishable by death?—That is in 1799.

228. Vicomte. The following is the Order in Council to which I referred.

"Aux Etats de l'île de Jersey; l'an mil sept-cent nonant-neuf, le dix-huitième jour d'Octobre. D'autant qu'il s'est élevé des doutes touchant le genre de punition qui doit être infligé sur le crime de sodomie, et paroissant que les lois du pays ne sont pas suffisamment claires et précises sur ce sujet, les Etats ont jugé expédient d'établir pour loi permanente, moyennant la sanction de Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil, Que quiconque se rendra coupable, après l'émanation et promulgation de ce présent acte, du crime abominable de sodomie ou de bestialité, et en sera dûment atteint et convaincu, selon les coûtumes et usages de cette île, sera puni de mort, et souffrira le même supplice, les mêmes confiscations et forfaitures de ses biens, que la loi inflige présentement sur ceux qui sont convaincus de quelque crime capital. Partant les Etats très humblement supplient Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil d'accorder son Approbation Royale à la présente ordonnance, afin qu' elle ait force de loi dans cette île, et y soit à jamais observée comme telle."

229. With the exception of the instance of manslaughter and the instance of the punishment for an unnatural offence, have you any statute law in this island for the classification and punishment of offences?—None whatever.

230. Will the gentlemen of the bar be so good as to listen to the following paper which was forwarded to the Commissioners by the Vicomte? (*The same was read.)

231. (To Mr. Hammond.) What is the general practice which the Privy Council appear to rely on. They say that, though there is nothing making it one of the highest offences, yet it is in itself highly criminal; and apparently it assumes that, whenever a thing is of a generally criminal nature, the Court may punish it in some way short of capital punishment?—On the principle, I suppose, that where there is a crime there must be a punishment. I think I could cite cases where there has been the punishment of death for burglary contemporaneous with 1771.

232. The paper which has just been read, though it disallows an ex post facto law, appears to recognise as existing in Jersey some general principle by which, when there is something in its nature offensive or criminal, the Court may apply a discretionary punishment short of capital punishment?—The practice which has obtained is quite in conformity with that view; for the punishments are not all alike.

233. It says that, though this is not a felony as it would be in England, it is a misdemeanor by the common law of Jersey, and a criminal act of which the Court may take cognizance?—I know that we have had two or three accusations laid by the Crown for entering a house at night, accompanied by the intent to commit felony.

234. Is there not a general principle running through the law of Jersey, that a thing which is found to be dangerous or wrong, or which interferes with the comfort of the subject, may be treated, though not capitally, yet upon general principles as something highly offensive and therefore punishable by the Court in any way short of capital punishment?—I should say, Yes. And I am inclined to answer in the affirmative, from the practice which has obtained.

235. Mr. Evans. At common law the Court have that power.

236. (To Mr. Hammond.) Is the forging of a bill of exchange a crime in Jersey?—Yes. It has been prosecuted and punished as such, as a forgery.

237. How is that punishable?—Formerly, in my practice, in general it was punished by the pillory, by scourging and banishment: there was also cutting off the lower part of the ear.

238. By what law is forging an acceptance of a bill of exchange made a crime?—By no other than the common law.

239. That is the law of Normandy?—Yes.

240. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) I think it would be better to refer the Commissioners to the report which was drawn up by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, at the request of the Privy Council, as to what was the criminal law of the island then. Otherwise it would appear that we had no criminal law before the year 1771; whereas we had the old Norman law. It would be of no use for us to quote all those to the Commissioners. It would be better to hand the book to the Commissioners.

241. (To Mr. Hammond.) Do you consider that the report made by Messrs. Pipon and Durell, who were the law officers of the Crown in 1790, is an authority binding upon the Court?—It is an authority which we, as advocates, constantly cite, and I believe the Crown officers also, in reference to the basis from which the definition of crimes is drawn, and the source whence those gentlemen gain those definitions. We consider it a high authority in that respect.

242. It is cited as an authority by the Court?—The then Attorney General was a man of great acumen, and took a great deal of trouble in it.

243. Mr. Evans. The Commissioners will understand that the common law was left precisely as it was subsequently to 1771. The code of 1771 does not affect the common law at all.

244. Here are two Orders in Council which were sent to us by the Vicomte. The first is of the 13th of March, 1689, and the other of the 30th of November, 1699. (The same were read.†) It should seem that it was supposed that by the common law there was no distinction as to homicide in this island?—I should not be inclined to acquiesce in that.

JERSEY.

J. Hammond, Esq.

7 September, 1846.

245. You rather agree with the later representation than the earlier?—I consider there was a distinction from the earliest time.

246. Do you find that in the Coustumier?—Yes; and in Rouillé.

247. Vicomte. The following is an extract from an Order in Council of the 12th of June, 1635, a translation of which forms a paragraph in the Jersey code of laws of 1771, under the title of Loix *:—

"First, whereas there is noe punishment by the lawes and customes of that island for accessories in murder and felonies after the fact donne, vizt. for such as favoure and receave the principalls before theire conviction, it is thought fitt and ordered that such accessories shall be punished by ffyne and imprisonment; and for such also who convaye ffelons out of the island after proclamacon for their apprehension, and who breake prison, for the favourers of such offenders and compounders with them, that they be punished by ffyne and imprisonment."

248. There being only the common law to rely upon, and no statute law, the alteration in the state of affairs must have created a great many crimes which could not have existed previously. To criminal acts of that kind, have the Court the power of applying punishments?—I think the range is pretty wide.

249. For instance, obtaining money under false pretences, which would be a common fraud: what is the punishment for that?—That would be a fraud under aggravated circumstances. If there be embezzlement under those circumstances, we have nothing to define how it shall be denominated.

250. What would you charge in your indictment?—Simply "under false pretences." We make use of the language made use of in the law of England.

251. For embezzlement, for instance, a clerk or servant taking his master's money?—We have the expression "crime de péculat." In Terrien there is a great deal about it. We should punish for fraud or peculation. Cases have been brought before the Court here of that kind.

252. Is not it the fact, that the Court applies its power of punishment to those cases as they arise, considering them as offences against society?—Yes: and I consider that there is nothing to regulate it in a definite way. You could not open a book to refer to the particular punishment which should be awarded.

253. Nor a definition of the crime?—No.

254. (To Mr. Dupré, Avocat Général.) How would you frame an accusation for obtaining money under false pretences?—There have been one or two cases lately, which I will search for.

255. Mr. Hammond. It would be "sous de faux prétextes."

256. That is taken from the English law, in fact?—The phraseology of the accusation is taken from that. I think the circumstances would be related in the mise en accusation.

257. Mr. Dupré. The frame would be, under such circumstances having obtained from such a person under false and criminal pretences.

258. You are aware that ours is statutory in England entirely?—Yes.

259. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) Before the statutes were established, there was a power of punishing a person under the common law.

260. Mr. Hammond. We should be guided in the way of adjudicating the punishment by the nature of the fraud and the magnitude of it.

261. Mr. Evans. As to forgery, the Court has never punished with death here: it has never been made a capital felony here: it has always followed the common law.

262. How do you define felony in your law?

263. Mr. Hammond. We have considered that wherever there is a confiscation in the punishment: that is what assists us, as much as anything, to define what is felony.

264. Mr. Evans. It is never used in the words of the acts of accusation here.

265. Mr. Marett. It is not a word recognised.

266. I observe, in this paper with which the Vicomte has furnished us, the word felony occurs once or twice as a familiar word applicable to the law. I do not find it in your proceedings.

267. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) They have used it as an English term, and given it the English signification; but you will not find it in any documents proceeding from the island.

268. Mr. Le Gallais. I think they use it in Guernsey.

269. I observed, at the trial on Saturday week, the words "vol avec effraction" were used, and "sans effraction."—That is theft committed with effraction and without effraction. When the prisoner has been found guilty of having committed the act, the Court uses its discretion as to what is the punishment to be awarded.

270. Mr. Evans. If a burglary were committed here, it would be laid "vol avec effraction." The law is a sort of Indian rubber. It has been used for various purposes, and is stretched according to the necessity of the case as it arises.

271. Why is it that you apply English incidents at all in your treatment of crimes?—Merely as considering that they are the general principles of law.

272. For instance, when a crime is punished more if committed at night, than if by day, you take the general principle of the English law?

273. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate). The person is, in fact, accused of robbery; only there are aggravating circumstances to the robbery. But it would not be said that there was a punishment for robbery, and another for burglary. The robbery would be the crime; but the Court would punish more severely a person who had committed a robbery at night, or with violence.

274. Are the English books cited as authority for that?—The English books would not be quoted, as far as the crime of burglary was concerned.

---

* Code of Laws for the island of Jersey, 171.

275. For what purpose would they be quoted?—Sometimes they are quoted. I must say that the English books have been only lately quoted in the Royal Court; formerly they were not so.

276. Unless they are to establish the crime, I do not see what reference they have to the matter in hand?—I think they are only used by Sir John De Veulle in his summing up.

277. Sir John de Veulle. I have also heard advocates use them.

278. (Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) I do not believe the Bailiff who preceded Sir John ever quoted English authors.

279. Mr. Evans. If books are found to make in favour of the advocate, they are quoted, whether they be English or French. As to the distinction existing in the English law, whether there has been a sufficient taking, or whether there has been a breaking, and all those distinctions, books of the English law are quoted to explain to the Court, or the jury, what is or what is not a breaking or taking.

280. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) To establish the fact of effraction, an authority produced from an English book would be received. Supposing, for instance, a person were to break a window, and put his hand inside, and take something?—That would be effraction. I do not think we should enter into all the nice distinctions, and say, lifting the latch of a door would be effraction. No person in the island would think of quoting the English law upon that subject. There must be an actual breaking, to constitute an effraction, which in the crime of burglary would not be necessary. Our mode is the most simple mode. Effraction must be proved. Effraction means breaking; and breaking must be established. Unless you wish to accumulate other definitions, and say, such and such an act shall be called an effraction, the meaning of effraction is quite clear to every person of common sense. It is not lifting a latch, but breaking.

281. We received answers to the effect that the English authorities are used in this Court?—I do not think they were ever used by any presiding judge in the island, before Sir John De Veulle.

282. Would the French authorities be used as to effraction?—Effraction would be established by the signification of the word, as taken in its common sense, meaning, that is to say, breaking with violence.

283. Is there any authority but common sense to govern the meaning ofthat word?—Certainly not.

284. Mr. Hammond. I would only observe that, when we have quoted from English books, it has been in elucidation of a particular fact or circumstance which is brought forward, connected with the Criminal Law. For instance, as to what would savour of reality, and what would not, I should look to the English authorities to see their definition; and so with regard to the question of burglary, to ascertain what would be a breaking. The question might be, what is a breaking? And that might lead to a great deal of difference of opinion. The limit might not be very easily ascertained. If it has been ascertained by English authorities, they would be quoted, I think; and I think they would be quoted by the crown lawyers in support of their accusation. Before I was at the bar, I have heard other practitioners refer to English books with regard to those different definitions; that is, in some measure, to throw a light upon their own arguments and reasonings upon the different questions they have had to submit, they have supported them by those definitions, showing the way in which those who have written upon those subjects, have considered them.

285. As we refer to the civil law in England?—Yes. And, whenever we could get at the foundation, or at the why and the wherefore, that the law has been originally arranged, we should quote it as much as possible to elucidate the particular law, or the particular question which may be submitted to the jury, or to the Court. The advocates before me used to do so; and so have the crown lawyers used Blackstone; that is more generally used than any of the English books, as it dwells very much upon the definitions of crimes. It is not necessary to enforce them as law, but as explanations of that which the lawyers would wish to bring forward for the consideration of those who have to adjudicate upon the question.

286. Mr. Dupré. Since I have been at the bar, thirty one years, I have in almost all cases seen English writers on the criminal law quoted as great authorities for the proper definition of different offences.

287. Mr. Le Breton. I think that is the case, by both parties.

288. As to what constitutes a breaking, have you heard it quoted?

289. Mr. Dupré. I have heard the English law quoted for that particular purpose.

290. Supposing a man did not walk all the way into the house, but broke a pane of glass, and thrust his hand through, or lifted a latch and thrust his hand through, would that be a question argued by a reference to English law?—Yes; it would be argued by the officer of the crown, as being burglary.

291. Would the English books be quoted?—Yes.

292. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate). Has Mr. Dupré ever heard a matter argued to be burglary, which consisted in merely lifting the latch of a door, without breaking?

293. Mr. Dupré. I think I could produce you a precedent of that nature.

294. Do you recollect how that ended?—I do not recollect the case; but I will look out for it by the next day of meeting.

295. Mr. Le Sueur. In the cases I have seen of persons accused of crime, "vol avec effraction," the crown officers have proved that there was actual breaking. Where a door has been bolted inside, for instance.

296. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) I understand you to say, with regard to effraction, that it would be decided, not by any written authority, but by the skill of the advocate in defining it, and that the sentence would be in the breast of the Court.

297. I am sorry to have been so misunderstood. I mean that the word effraction would be taken in its true and literal sense, and no fiction put upon the breaking; that is to say, it would be an actual breaking, and not merely a fact tantamount to a breaking established in point of law. There are some definitions in the law, which say that such and such a fact would be considered as a breaking. But even Blackstone gives different views of what would be an actual breaking, and what would not be so.

JERSEY.

J. Hammond, Esq.
7 September, 1846.

298. Take any other crime. Supposing the question was as to the crime of rape; would there be any authority produced to ascertain what a rape was?—Yes; I think, if you examine most of the crimes, you will find them well defined in Rouillé and Terrien.

299. Do you cite any authority from any law book as to the definition of any crime?—Yes.

300. In what instances?—You cite Rouillé.

301. Besides Rouillé, do you cite any?—Terrien, just the same.

302. Any crime which is not defined in Rouillé or Terrien, how do you ascertain that?—I think you will find very few crimes which do not fall under one of those heads; and the discretion is left to the Court to apportion the various punishments between the one and the other. Burglary, for instance, is a theft in our law. It is a theft committed with aggravated circumstances.

303. Take larceny. Supposing a person were to pull up a tree from the ground, would that be theft?—Yes, if he takes it away.

304. Supposing the act of taking it away and pulling it up, were the same act, would that be theft?—Yes.

305. Is there any definition of theft in Rouillé, including a case of that kind?

306. Mr. Hammond. I could not agree to say that it would be a theft. I should say it would be part of the realty.

307. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) Robbery is in Rouillé.

308. Is there this distinction: that, if you take a thing attached to the realty, it is not a theft?—No; there is no such distinction in Rouillé.

309. Mr. Hammond. I do not know how, by the definition Rouillé gives of robbery, you could make that a robbery. On the same ground, if he knocks down a party wall you might do so.

310. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) And it has been so decided by the Court against your own pleading.

311. All the Commissioners are asking is what authorities you use?—It would be robbery by the law.

312. If Rouillé made it so, and not if Rouillé did not make it so?—Yes, just so.

313. On a question of that sort, would English authorities be cited?—I do not see the use of citing them.

314. Would they be received by the Court as authorities?

315. The Court would receive any authority which was cited; but it would be as argument, not as authority.

316. Mr. Marett. The English authorities are not considered as binding upon the judge. They are only quoted to elucidate the question in hand.

317. Out of Rouillé and Terrien you have no authoritative definition of crimes?—No; not that is binding upon the judge.

318. Mr. Hammond. Supposing a person is accused of robbery: take, for example, such things as garden shrubs, or fruit trees. I have proposed to the Court, as a legal question (not to the jury, but to the Court), that the accusation was not supported by the evidence, because the evidence amounted to this, that the person had gone into the garden, and had up-rooted a certain number of trees, and carried them away, that he did not leave them as chattels which were taken off afterwards, and that therefore it was a trespass. I grant it was overruled; but I considered, as that was the definite accusation against the individual, it could not be made a robbery. Nor can I conceive that it would be so, even in quoting Rouillé. I consider I was within the legitimate rules of defence in showing that it was not a robbery. Just the same as if any part of a house was knocked down, and separated for a time, it would not be a charge of robbery, but it would be a charge of trespass; but the quotation I made was in support of my view, that it was not a robbery. I believe there have been statutes in England, made as to cases of cutting trees, and so forth, because they could not be brought under the definition of robbery, and required a new enactment to meet them.

319. Mr. Evans. With regard to the use of English authorities, it is not a modern practice, as far as I can judge of it. Upon reference to Le Geyt's manuscripts, which are considered to have some authority here, you will find that he constantly quotes English authorities; Dalton, more especially.

320. Mr. Marett. It is very proper, in using words, that the sense in which they are used should be understood. If by authority you mean any opinion or regulation binding upon the Court, assuredly the English law cannot be considered as such.

321. Mr. Evans. In the present day, American authorities are cited in the English courts. Mr. Justice Story is constantly cited. Mr. Godfray, I am aware, has always protested against the use of English authorities in the Court.

322. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) If I understand right, in Sir John Dumaresq's time he would not only not permit an English book to be quoted as an authority, but he would not allow them to be used in argument.

their queries, that the first step, when there is an offence committed, is taken by the Police?—Yes: on a verbal complaint of the person against whom the offence has been committed.

324. We understand that for St. Héliers there are one constable, four centeniers, six vingteniers, and twenty four officers?—Yes.

325. For St. Aubin there are one constable, two centeniers, two vingteniers, and fifteen officers?—Yes: that is for St. Brélade's.

326. For other parishes, one constable, two centeniers, four vingteniers, and four or five officers?—Yes.

327. What emoluments do the vingteniers receive?—The vingteniers have a small commission for receiving confiscations, and upon the road rates.

328. Are the vingteniers confined to any particular district, or do they act generally?—Each acts for his own district. The parish is divided into so many districts.

329. Generally speaking, in what rank of life are those gentlemen? The constable and the constable's officers are not of the same rank, I suppose?—No. In town, the constables' officers are principally tradesmen. In the country parishes, they are small farmers, or their sons, holders of property in the parish.

330. Generally speaking, have all those officers other occupations besides that of attending to the police?—All of them, I should say.

331. Is there anything like a night or day patrol?—Neither the one nor the other. The officers generally, when they are called on by the parties complaining, go and make the necessary inquiries.

332. They are not upon the look out?—No.

333. What is the population of St. Héliers?—It was about 23,000 at the last census. I should think it must have considerably increased since. I should say it must now amount to 26,000 or 27,000.

334. It is a port, with characters of different sorts resorting to it as a port?—Yes, a great variety.

335. Speaking of the lower part of the population, should you say it was one which required less or more watching than the population of ordinary towns, or much the same?—I think it is more necessary to watch it than most towns of the same size as St. Héliers.

336. Will you state, in detail, why that occurs to you?—Necessarily from our situation being between two great countries, and being a great resort of persons who have committed crimes in their own countries. They take refuge here to avoid the laws there.

337. Does that observation apply to St. Aubin's at all?—No: not to St. Aubin's, nor to the country parishes.

338. I thought St. Aubin's possibly might be a town parish, to some extent?—It is not a large town: it is a port; but there are very few vessels frequenting it.

339. I understood you to say that some of the constable's officers were tradesmen?—Yes.

340. Are they persons who are likely to have any interest in public houses?—There are many who are spirit dealers; and possibly they may sell to houses which sell in retail.

341. To taverns?—Yes. There are some police officers who are themselves tavern keepers. I know of one in my own parish.

342. Which is your parish?—St. Lawrence.

343. There is the case of Mrs. Le Gendre, which has been commented on a good deal in England: how long ago did that happen?—Six months.

344. Her's was not a licensed house, was it?—No.

345. It was a murder committed in an unlicensed house, was not it?—Yes, on one of the police officers.

346. Mr. Evans. It was in a brothel.

347. And not a licensed house?—No.

348. (To Mr. Dupré.) Was there not some charge at the time of some of the Police having supplied liquors to the house?—I have heard it.

349. Was that made out?—I know there were arrests made on her property for the supply of liquors by some officers of Police, one of whom had just left office.

350. Was the party supplying the spirits a policeman at the time?—Yes, one of them was; the other had been replaced a few months before: his time was up, and he had been replaced.

351. Generally speaking, do you think the force is efficient for the prevention of breaches of the peace and robberies?—As to prevention, I think the force is entirely useless. From the very nature of the force, it cannot be useful for the prevention of crimes. They are often very active in the discovery of crime, when it has been committed.

352. Supposing a person has his head broken, or his pocket picked, does he know where to go at once? Is there any station to apply at?—No; he must go to the constable's house, or to wherever he may find the police officer.

353. If he happens to know where the police officer lives, he may go there directly?—Yes.

354. Do you think, generally, their residences are known to the inhabitants?—Yes; I think generally they are to the inhabitants.

355. The head of the Police of St. Hélier's, I think, is Mr. Le Sueur?—He is the head of the town Police.

356. His house would be known, of course?—Yes.

357. Do you know any instances in which gentlemen resident in the place have contributed any money to maintain a watch at their own expense?—In several streets the inhabitants have contributed to maintain a private watch, for the protection of their property at night. I know of eleven or twelve such associations: there may be more.

358. By night?—Yes.

JERSEY.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.
7 September, 1846.

359. The twenty four officers, I think, have no power to act upon suspicion, but must see the offence committed?—The constables' officers can only act if a party is taken committing an offence in their presence. That is laid down in the law. "Les vingteniers et les officiers du connétable pourront, dans le cas de flagrant délit, dans l'étendue de leurs paroisses respectives, faire tous les actes de police qui sont de la compétence du connétable et des centeniers, étant tenus de les en informer sans delai: ils seront aussi tenus de conduire au connétable ou à l'un des centeniers les personnes saisies, et les remettre à leur disposition."

360. That limitation is implied in the technical meaning of the word "vingtenier," I presume?—Yes.

361. What is the officer who can give them authority to search? They can act upon authority, cannot they?—They cannot search without the presence of a constable, or one of the centeniers.

362. Nor arrest?—Nor arrest, except in the case laid down in the article of the law which I have cited. The vingteniers can seize or arrest parties within the limit of their own vingtaine or district; but they must take the party so arrested to the constable, and report the case to him.

363. You mean that they may arrest upon information within their vingtaine?—Yes.

364. The constable, I presume, cannot act out of his parish?—No.

365. The town of St. Hélier's is all comprehended within one parish, is it not?—The town Police applies as well to the country part of the parish of St. Hélier's as to the town itself.

366. I mean that the mass of houses does not stretch into any other parish?—No.

367. Mr. Edward Nicolle. What is the town, properly so called, extends to St. Saviour's itself: George Town, for instance.

368. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) The part of George Town which is in St. Saviour's parish is not very large.

369. (To Mr. Dupré.) Supposing you were going from hence to George Town, where should you cross the frontier?—At the house called Plaisance.

370. Does not it follow, from what you have stated, that the vingtenier can only act out of his vingtaine when the constable is present?—He may assist the constable at all times; but he can only act alone within the limits of his vingtaine.

371. The constable and the centeniers, we understand, are elected by the rate-payers in each parish?—Yes; the constable and centeniers.

372. What is the lowest property which pays rate, do you suppose?—If a man has 40*l.* he pays rate: if he is worth 40*l.*, either in real or personal property.

373. In point of fact, do they generally rate down as low as that?—In many instances they do. There are a vast number of electors who have that qualification.

374. How are the vingteniers and officiers de connétable elected?—By the Parish Assembly.

375. What constitutes a Parish Assembly?—There is the constable, the rector, and a description of persons called Principaux.

376. What are they?—A portion of rate-payers according to the amount of rate they pay. In town it is 20 quarters; in some of the parishes it is 15 quarters; in others 12; in Trinity 10 quarters; and in two parishes, I think, it is 8 quarters.

377. By town you always mean St. Hélier's?—Yes. There are also present the police officers, and the members of the Court. The Jurats, the Greffier, the Vicomte, and the Crown officers, each in their own parishes, have the right to assist as members of the Parish Assembly; also the Procureur du Bien Publique, the churchwardens, and the collector of the alms at the door, and those who have before served the office of constable or centenier. They are members for life.

378. They would lose it by non-residence, I presume?—Yes.

379. And recover it probably by residence again?—Yes; that has been the practice. The following is the regulation on the subject.

"Les magistrats, ou les officiers de la Cour Royale, savoir: le Procureur Général du Roi, le Vicomte, l'Avocat Général du Roi, et le Greffier, les Recteurs (ou le vicaire dûment appointé par l'ordinaire, et en absence hors de l'île du recteur, ou pendant sa maladie), et les Connétables et Centeniers, ont séance et voix délibérative comme principaux dans les Assemblées Paroissiales. Ceux qui auront exercé les charges soit de Connétable ou de Centenier auront également droit d'assister et voter à l'Assemblée Paroissiale, quoiqu'ils ne soient plus en charge. Les Procureurs du Bien Publique, les Surveillans, les Vingteniers, les Officiers du Connétable et les Collecteurs d'aumones, y ont droit seulement pendant leur gestion. Le nombre des Principaux qui seront membres des Assemblées Paroissiales est réglé pour chaque paroisse, comme ensuit, savoir: Pour la paroisse de St. Hélier, tous ceux qui payent un rât de vingt quartiers et au-dessus: pour les paroisses de St. Ouen et St. Sauveur, tous ceux qui payent un rât de quinze quartiers et au dessus; pour les paroisses de St. Brélade, St. Pierre, St. Grouville, St. Martin, St. Laurens, et St. Jean, tous ceux qui payent un rât de douze quartiers et au-dessus; pour la paroisse de la Trinité, tous ceux qui payent un rât de dix quartiers et au-dessus; et pour les paroisses de St. Clement et Ste. Marie, tout ceux qui payent un rât de huit quartiers et au-dessus."

380. The police, therefore, are to a certain extent influential in the Parish Assemblies?—They are very influential in every Parish Assembly.

381. It would not be necessary that those parties should be rated, I suppose?—No: in virtue of their office they are members of the assembly.

382. Taking the parish of St. Hélier's, what is the number of official members who constitute the Assembly? How many official members are there in the Parish Assembly at the present time?—I could not tell you at this time.

383. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate.) There would be about 50 altogether in the town of St. Hélier's?—From 40 to 50.

384. Mr. Marett. It must be remarked that the greater part of the persons having a right to vote on account of having held office previously are Principaux, and therefore vote in their own right.

385. Mr. Nicolle. Many of the Police are members of the Parish Meeting by virtue of their own right.

386. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do you agree that most of those who have exercised the office of connétable or centenier would be entitled to vote as Principaux?—Yes; no doubt a great many would. I cannot say that they all would.

387. How is the rate made?—It is made by the Parish Assembly.

388. Is there any mode of correcting errors or omissions in the rate? Or, is there any appeal against the rate?—There is no appeal against any act as far as the Parish Assembly goes. They may rate whom they please; and there is no appeal against their decision, except the party himself does not wish to be rated: he then comes before the Court, and declares that he has no property.

389. In the case of an omission from the rate is there an appeal?—The party who is omitted from the rate may apply to the Court to be allowed to make oath of the amount of his property. He may bring the constable before the Court, and swear in his presence to the amount of his property, and he is then rated at half the amount that he states his property to be; but there is no appeal whatever against any improper rating on the part of the parish if the parties are willing to bear it.

390. Is the remedy confined to a party wishing to be discharged from being a member of the Parochial Assembly at all on account of his having no rateable property, and a person omitted wholly from the rate?—Yes.

391. Can any person appeal because he is rated too high?—Yes, if he has been rated above half the value of his property.

392. Can he appeal upon the ground that another person has been rated too low?—No.

393. Or too high?—No.

394. Would the consequence of an appeal against the omission of a person from the rate necessarily be to rate him at the half of his property?—Yes, while probably the other inhabitants of the parish would be rated at one fourth or one fifth, or one sixth of their property, or even one seventh or one eighth. There is no regular rate.

395. Is there any law regulating the right of appeal?—There is. "Toute personne qui se trouvera surchargée, ou croira devoir être inscrite sur la liste du rât, aura le droit de faire convenir en justice le connétable, ou chef de police de la paroisse, afin d'être admis à prêter serment du montant de sa propriété, pour que son rât soit réglé en conséquence; et ce aux frais de la paroisse, si le réclamant a fait des démarches à cet effet lors de la confection ou de la rectification du rât paroissial."

396. That is from the law of the 14th January, 1833?—Yes.

397. There is also Article 2, which appears to give the qualification for rating?—Yes. "Nul ne sera porté sur la liste des contribuables d'une paroisse: 1°. S'il n'y a été domicilié an et jour, excepté dans le cas prévu par l'Article 3. 2°. S'il ne possède dans ce pays, soit en meubles, soit en héritages, la valeur de deux quartiers de froment de rente annuelle, la somme de trois cents trente trois livres six sous huit deniers étant estimée valoir un quartier de froment."

398. Is the rate, in fact, formed in accordance with that law which you have just read?—No; not at all.

399. In what way does it differ from it?—I do not suppose there is a person on the rate list in the whole of the island who is rated at half his property, except those who are obliged to appeal to get a vote. Article 3 says: "Tous ceux qui possèdent des héritages dans le pays, sans cependant y résider, seront portés sur la liste des contribuables de la paroisse où la principale partie de leur propriété sera située." Article 4 declares: "Toute personne ayant les qualités mentionnées dans les Articles 2 ou 3 sera taxée à un quartier, et celle possédant un propriété plus considérable sera taxée à la moitié de la value de son bien, en suivant la proportion établie dans l'Article précédent pour les meubles; sans cependant, qu'il puisse jamais exister sur le rât aucune fraction de quartier."

400. From the nature of the rate, is not there a great deal of difficulty in ascertaining what is the property of the person?—Very great difficulty. With respect to real property, it can be easily ascertained; but, as to personal property, there are no means of coming at it at all supplied by law. It can only be guess work.

401. Could it be ascertained by any means which would not subject a person to very unpleasant inquiry into the state of his affairs?—None.

402. Is not it the case, that at present it is very difficult to ascertain who is legally rateable and who is not?—Yes, unless in the case of a person of real property.

403. Is it your opinion that the mode of rating which would be most beneficial would be to confine the rating to real and visible property?—That is quite my opinion; and that the property should be valued by persons who are disinterested, and not by the Parish Assemblies.

404. We have heard from you that the Parish Assembly make the rate?—Yes.

405. The rate payers elect the constable?—Yes.

406. Is the office of constable at all an object of political ambition in the island?—It is a place which is very much sought after.

407. You said, just now, that the rate ought to be made by disinterested persons. With what view did you use that word?—I look upon every Parish Assembly to be interested in making the rate. Naturally, those who compose the Parish Assemblies keep themselves as low as they possibly can; and many are excluded from the rate on account of their political opinions in most of the parishes of the island.

408. I observe that, by law, a great number of the persons composing the Parochial

JERSEY.

Assembly are members of the Police. Is it your opinion that they are a sufficient number to influence the Parochial Assembly in making the rates?—I think it may be stated that, in every parish but one, in this island, the Police form the majority of every Parish Assembly. At St. Brélade's I think they are about divided.

409. Have you any mode of judging how far they are in the habit of voting and acting together? Do they in fact form a party in the Assembly?—In every Parish Assembly but one the Police form a political party. In St. Ouen's the police officers are more numerous than the rest of the Assembly.

410. The Police having this influence in the assembly, and the Parish Assembly making the rate, I need not ask you whether the Police have not great influence in the electing of a constable?—Undoubtedly. And in every public election, from the office of Jurat downwards.

411. By whom are the Jurats elected?—By the rate payers of the whole island.

412. A Jurat does not represent a particular parish?—No.

413. Is the qualification which gives a right of voting for Jurat the same that gives a right of voting for constable?—The same.

414. When a vacancy takes place in the office of Jurat by death, what is the course taken to fill the office?—The Royal Court meet. The parishes are divided among the Jurats, one to each Jurat. The Bailiff first choses; and then every Judge in rotation.

415. There being one vacancy, the Bailiff and eleven Jurats will collect the votes in the eleven parishes?—Yes. Then the place of the Jurat deceased, or of any Jurat who is absent, is supplied by the Crown officers, or the greffier, or the officers of the court, according to the number.

416. Is it the duty of those officers, whom you have mentioned, to take the votes in the different parishes?—Yes. Each one in the parish to which he has been appointed. The day on which the election is to take place is fixed by the court, always on the following Tuesday after the court meet, after the funeral of the deceased Jurat.

417. And, I suppose, the candidate who has the majority of all the votes is the successful candidate?—Yes.

418. You stated that the Police, in the management of the parochial business, are in the habit of acting a good deal as a party. Do they act as a party in the electing of a Jurat?—Yes. In some parishes they are of one party; and in some of the parishes they are of the other party.

419. Is it your opinion, from your experience and long residence in the island, and from watching elections as an officer of the Crown, that the Police materially influence the election of the Jurats in this island?—It is.

420. You have said that the Police have very considerable influence in the election of Jurats. Have they also the same influence in the election of the constable and centeniers in the respective parishes for which they act?—Yes.

421. Is the election of a constable in fact a political contest?—It is.

422. And the same of the centeniers?—Yes.

423. As I understand you, in political importance it would tell in two ways; first, as constituting the constables who make a part of the States; and, secondly, also as affecting the election of a Jurat?—Yes.

424. That would be two thirds of the actual voting part of the states?—Yes.

426. Does one of the centeniers supply the place of the constable, if he happen to die, in the States as well as in the parish?—The senior centenier of the particular parish supplies the place of the constable, in case of sickness or absence, or of death, till a new constable is elected and sworn in.

427. You have said that the constables are members of the States? Yes; they form one third of the States.

428. Are they elected for three years?—Yes.

429. So are the centeniers and vingteniers, are they not?—The centeniers are. The vingteniers vary: they are elected for four years in some parishes, and for seven in others.

430. It must often happen that a gentleman's real property lies out of the parish in which he resides?—Yes.

431. So that a good deal of property would escape rating altogether, would it not?—No: he would be rated in the parish in which he resides for the whole of his property, wherever it is situated. He only votes in the parish where he is domiciled.

432. So that, if a person residing at St. Héliers claimed to be rated in respect of property in Trinity, he would appeal against the rate made in St. Héliers?—Where he resides he is rated.

433. If I am resident in Trinity, and my property lies in St. Héliers, I should be rated at Trinity, and should have to appeal against the Trinity rate in respect of my property in St. Héliers?—Yes.

434. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). The domicile is acquired by a residence of a year and a day.

435. (To Mr. Dupré.) Does this particular state of things create or increase the party spirit which is in the island?—Undoubtedly it does.

436. Is there then a strong party spirit throughout the island?—Very strong indeed.

437. A gentleman who is worth 10,000*l.*, and who has 1,000*l.* in Trinity, and 9,000*l.* in St. Héliers, and resides in Trinity, would be rated in Trinity for 10,000*l.*?—Yes; the gentleman possessed of 1,000*l.* in Trinity, and 9,000*l.* in St. Héliers, would be rated in Trinity, if he resided there, for the whole.

439. Do you happen to know how many newspapers there are in the island?—There are a great many; there are four printed in the English language, and four in the French language.

440. Are they published weekly or daily?—Most of them are published twice a week; I think all of them except two.

441. It has been stated to us, that it is the duty of the constable to arrest parties who are suspected of crimes. I suppose there is some oath, which the constable takes on his appointment?—Yes; he takes an oath.

442. The oath of the constable and of the centenier is very much the same perhaps?—It is very much the same; the following are the oaths taken by the different officers.

[The oaths of the constable, centenier, vingtenier, and officier du connétable, were read. See pp. 78, 79.]

[The oaths of the Inspecteurs pour la réparation des chemins publiques, and of the Procureur de paroisse were also read.]

Serment des Inspecteurs.

Vous promettez, par la foi et serment que vous devez à Dieu, que bien et fidellement vous vous acquitterez de la charge d'Inspecteur pour la réparation des chemins publics, en la vingtaine de . ., paroisse de . . . , et que vous suivrez et mettrez en due exécution les réglemens faits pour la réparation et l'entretien des chemins, et ferez généralement tout le devoir attaché à la dite charge.

Serment des Procureurs de Paroisse.

Vous jurez et promettez, par la foi et serment que vous devez à Dieu, que vous exercerez la charge de Procureur du bien public de la paroisse de . . . . ; que vous le conserverez et augmenterez comme le vôtre, et mieux, s'il vous est possible; que vous vous réglerez par le bon conseil et avis des Principaux et Officiers, et des chefs de famille, de la dite paroisse, et ferez généralement tous autres devoirs qui dépendent de la dite charge.

443. The constable acts upon the information of the party complaining of the crime, I suppose, where he does not see it?—Yes, or some denunciation of the crime.

444. Is the denunciation made on the oath of the party?—No.

445. What is the course taken by the constable upon a denunciation of the crime being made to him?—He takes up the party; he inquires into the grounds on which the person is charged; if it is a crime of a sufficiently serious nature to detain him in prison, he places him under the care of the gaoler, and obtains, before or afterwards, the sanction of one of the magistrates to keep him there till he can be presented in Court.

446. Prior to his obtaining the sanction of the magistrate for his being sent to prison, where is he detained?—Sometimes in the custody of the Police, and sometimes they take him direct to prison, and obtain the sanction of the magistrate afterwards.

447. They would be obliged to confine them in their own houses, I presume, supposing they could not take them to prison?—They take them to a public house sometimes.

448. Who is the officer who sanctions the placing in prison till the Court meets?—The Bailiff; or he appoints a certain number of Jurats to perform that function in his absence. The constable must apply to the Bailiff, or to any of those Judges so appointed by him. They are generally Jurats residing in the town.

449. At the present time there are three Jurats capable of so acting, I believe?—Yes.

450. For what time, under an order of those gentlemen, may a person be detained in prison prior to his examination or taking his trial?—It depends upon the sittings of the Court: generally the prisoners are brought up on the following Saturday.

451. Is Saturday the only day on which they are brought up?—They may be brought up on other days; but that day is usually chosen for bringing them up.

452. A person, therefore, might be detained in prison from the Sunday till the Saturday?—It would be possible.

453. Has the constable, of his own authority, any power to take bail?—Yes; the constable frequently takes bail, where the offence does not amount to felony.

454. That is to say, where it does not amount to a crime which subjects a person to the forfeiture of his property?—When it is under a robbery.

455. Supposing it was an attempt to commit a rape?—That would be a serious crime; he would take no bail.

456. Has he the power to take bail?—I do not think there is the power, strictly, by law; but it is often practised.

457. Do you know whether it has lately been the custom to take the opinion of yourself, or the Procureur Général, as to whether the offence would be proper for the constable to bail?—That has frequently been done; it has been permitted in favour of the liberty of the subject; but there is no special law giving such authority to the constable.

458. The constable could in all cases refuse bail upon his own authority?—Yes.

459. I think your method of taking bail is not like our's: you do not take the party's own recognizances at all?—No. The officer taking the bail states it in his return.

460. You do not add the person's own bail to the general bail?—No.

461. What is the form in which the constable takes bail?—The bail comes before him, and declares that he remains bail to such an amount for his appearance in Court on such a day; and the officer writes it in his Report, which he produces in Court.

462. Is there any written instrument, like what we call in England a bail piece, or a recognizance?—No.

463. The bail is bound by the recital in the constable's Report?—Yes.

464. What is the way of enforcing the penalty in case of default? Is the process summary?—Yes. If the party were not produced by the bail, the Procureur Général would move the Court to declare the bail forfeited, and to condemn the bail to pay the penalty.

465. The report of the constable, stating that the bail is effected, is the record, in short?—Yes: upon that judgment would attach.

JERSEY.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.
7 September, 1846.

466. We understand that the mode of proceeding is for the constable to make a written Report, which is the authority for the Crown officers to prosecute?—Yes.

467. It is the information upon which their prosecution is founded?—Yes.

468. Is that information presented upon the oath of the constable?—He makes no oath at the time: it is supposed to be presented on his oath of office.

469. He does not make an oath applicable to each information?—No.

470. If it should happen that, upon a complaint made by a party to a constable, he should refuse to act, what course does the party take, if the constable refuses to make a Report?—If the party complained to the Procureur Général, he might bring a prosecution against the officer so refusing to act.

471. What mode is there of prosecuting the crime?—There is no mode of prosecuting the crime, unless the party is brought before the Court by the Police.

472. The Procureur Général has the general power of instituting ex officio informations which he exercises in State offences, the offences of officers, and so on. Besides the ordinary exercise of his power, has not he also the constitutional power to file an information in any case? Suppose he hears that a man has been beating another, could not he institute a prosecution in that case without the Report of the constable?—Yes.

473. Suppose, in the case of Madame Le Gendre, a constable had refused to make any report, could the Procureur Général have prosecuted for that murder?—Yes, upon the verdict of the coroner's inquest.

474. Take any case of crime in which the coroner would not interfere?—I do not know any case in which the Procureur Général has interfered by information for a crime.

475. As a question of law, giving merely a legal opinion, is it your opinion that the Procureur Général would have that power?—He would have the power.

476. That would be your remedy for the non-interference of the police?—Yes. In a case of that kind, the Procureur Général would bring an information before the Court, and would require the Court to order the party to be seized by the officer of the Court, and brought up: and, when he was so brought up, the accusation would be laid in the usual form.

477. Except that there would be none of those Reports which are made in other cases?—Yes.

478. The inconvenience resulting to the public from that mode of proceeding would be that there would be time for the culprit to escape?—Of course.

479. You have stated to us, in the early part of your examination, that some of the Police keep taverns?—There are instances of it.

480. And that they are a body who are united as a party. Are you of opinion that that has a tendency to interfere with the impartial administration of their duties as Police?—On some occasions, most undoubtedly it has.

481. Then (even though such a party spirit might not show itself in the case of a flagrant crime), in the event of disorderly conduct in public houses or brawls arising out of tavern disputes, is it your opinion that the circumstances which have been stated as to the Police do, in point of fact, interfere with their duty?—They must interfere with some part of their duties. I have known a case where a person has been grossly assaulted and threatened; he has applied to the Police, and could get no protection whatever: and he has been obliged to apply for the interference of the Crown officers to protect him.

482. Do you suppose that that refusal to interfere arose from personal dislike, or from party feeling?—I should think from party feeling, and also, in some cases, from personal dislike.

483. How are the licenses of public houses granted?—They are granted by the Governor, the Bailiff, and Jurats, on a certificate of the Parish Assemblies.

484. They are granted by the Governor, Bailiff, and Jurats as an assembly?—Yes.

485. Is that under any particular law?—Yes. There has been a very recent Act upon the subject.

486. Prior to that, what was the law?—It was the same law. This new Act was passed to give greater power to the Police, and also to provide for the regularity of the houses: but the Governor, Bailiff, and Jurats have always been the party granting the licences as far as our records go.

487. I suppose the Bailiff and Jurats may act in the absence of the Governor?—Yes: but they must have his sanction.

488. I need not ask you if the recommendation of the Parochial Assemblies has not very great influence in granting licences?—Yes: they are given upon their recommendation.

489. Is there any power of appeal, if a license is refused?—Yes: I have seen parties refused apply to the Court.

490. Parties to whom the recommendation has been refused?—Yes: they have applied to the Court.

491. Could you give the Commissioners any notion of the number of public houses there are in St. Hélier's parish?—I do not know the number exactly.

492. Are they very numerous?

493. Mr. F. Godfray, (Greffier.) There were last year 189 public houses in St. Héliers.

494. (To Mr. Dupré.) Who has the regulation as to the opening and closing of the houses?—The Police can enforce the regulations.

495. What are the hours at which public houses must close?—It is mentioned in the law that they must close at eleven o'clock.

496. Mr. F. Godfray, (Greffier.) That is under the new law, which was published yesterday, and comes into effect to day.

497. (To Mr. Dupré.) Was the former law the same?—There was no time specified in the former law.

498. The enforcing of that regulation lies with the Police?—Yes.

499. Has the constable the right to enter houses for the purpose of searching for stolen goods of his own authority?—He has.

500. No warrant from the bailiff or any other person is necessary?—No.

501. May he break open a door for the purpose of getting in?—He may.

502. Either an inner or an outer door?—Any door, if admittance is refused him.

503. (To Sir John De Veulle.) We learn that, in some instances, the Magistrate or Jurat before whom a person is brought exercises summary jurisdiction?—If he thinks there is not sufficient ground to detain him, he will tell the Police to liberate him.

504. There are some instances in which the smaller number appear to exercise a summary jurisdiction. Have you any legal definition of what constitutes an offence which may be so dealt with?—No: I believe not.

505. In a case of drunkenness?—That would be dealt with by the Court.

506. Has there been any ordinance in any way pointing out that jurisdiction, or creating it?—I believe not.

507. Your statutes, of course, give summary jurisdiction in particular matters?—Yes: the Acts of the States enable the Court to deal with particular offences.

508. Can you specify a few of the offences over which you have summary jurisdiction by any Act of the States?—I know there are some: I do not at this moment recollect what they are.

509. (To. Mr. Le Breton.) I believe you have the power of proceeding summarily, have not you, in particular offences created by Acts of the States?—There are fines for taking away gravel, and many regulations enacted by the States, in which the proceedings are summarily before two Jurats.

510. But nothing which may be called properly crimes?—Very often small crimes.

511. Have you any name for them?—No, there is no particular name. Contraventions is the usual term, and délits is another.

512. Mr. Dupré. In such a case as this the Procureur Général proceeds summarily. Under the law for the regulation of taverns the process would be summary.

513. Mr. Evans. There will be instances on the rolls where prisoners have been tried by the fewer number; but it is always by consent, I think.

514. How would it be in the case of an assault?

515. Mr. Le Breton. A case of common assault would be tried before two Jurats.

516. If a common assault is brought before two Jurats, and the party insists upon going before the enditement, he would go; but otherwise he may have the case disposed of there?—Yes.

517. Without pleading Guilty?—Yes.

518. He may have a contested fact disposed of by two Jurats?—Yes; by hearing the witnesses vivâ voce.

519. Might that be done in other cases by the consent of the party?—It would never be done by the consent of the officer of the Crown, if it was anything of a serious nature, except he pleaded Guilty. Then, of course, sentence is passed.

520. Are the Commissioners to understand that the Court and two Jurats do not sit except on Saturday?—They may sit every day.

521. Does the enditement sit on any day except Saturday?—They seldom sit on Saturday; it is generally on week days. There is a minor number every Saturday; that is a day of such general business that you seldom have a full Court on a Saturday, except in urgent cases in order not to interfere with the routine business.

522. Does the Term affect criminal cases in any way?—No: when the parties are in gaol, or if the man is under bail, he may wait till the Term to be tried, if he pleases.

523. He may insist upon it?—Yes.

524. Your Term begins shortly, does not it?—On Saturday next.

525. Are there any such cases waiting now?—There are one or two: two, I think.

526. Then they would be tried the first Saturday in Term?—No: a particular day is fixed. A day is fixed on the first day of Term by the Bailiff.

527. Does any reason occur to you why any evidence, except that which is necessary for the committal of a prisoner to custody, should be given in Court till the time of the trial?—There is no evidence given in Court.

528. I am supposing the matter to go to the enditement. Is there any reason why the evidence should go on from day to day being taken by the Court when the disputed fact must be decided by the enditement?—It is to prove the fact that the evidence is heard. According to the practice, when there is an accusation, if once the accusation is formed, the Procureur Général is allowed to inform. In that case the depositions of the witnesses must be taken down in writing; and the practice has always been that the evidence should be taken down in writing in the presence of the accused before two Jurats. That sometimes occupies several days; and it is only when the evidence is complete on both sides that the enditement is called before the full Court, and the evidence read to the enditement, and the defence made.

529. Has any advantage struck you in that method of taking evidence?—No; I do not see any advantage. If you take it in writing at all it must be made in that way.

530. Mr. Dupré. If you took it before the enditement or the grande enquête, it would keep them sitting four or five days.

531. Supposing the magistrate, before committing for trial, made a point of hearing the evidence upon oath which was sufficient, in his view, for committing him; and that evidence were kept and put into the hands of the prisoner's counsel for the purpose of using it, if he pleased. Would not that supply the want which Mr. Dupré is speaking of? Supposing a person were taken up, and the first step were to bring him before the magistrate, the magistrate would not commit him till he had heard evidence on oath which satisfied him. If then all the evidence were taken down in writing, and transmitted to the Court when the person is brought up to take his trial, the counsel for the prisoner having the privilege of seeing and checking the evidence, would not that answer every purpose?—I think it would be a great advantage; but it ought not to be limited to the evidence given before the magistrate.

532. At the time of the trial, the difficulty would be met in another way; because, when a man is tried, the Judge takes down the evidence minutely, and reads it over to the jury?—That is not the practice always here.

533. Would not that practice combine the two advantages, and save all the intermediate process?—It would be necessary then that all the witnesses should be bound to appear, because, on the trial, we have no means now of compelling the attendance of a witness. A witness may leave the island the very day after. We have no means of compelling him to remain in the island; but a preliminary examination before a magistrate would be of the greatest use.

534. The foundation of your proceedings is the information furnished by the constable?——Yes.

535. Would not it be an improvement that the foundation of the proceedings should be depositions taken before a Jurat on oath?—Yes.

536. Supposing a witness such as we see sometimes, half conscientious and half not, who will say what he will not swear, on his first testimony, which is not given upon oath: a man might be kept in prison for a week; and then, when the witness comes to swear it, he may not be willing to go to the full extent of his previous evidence?

537. Mr. Le Breton. That would be very possible.

538. Mr. Dupré. I knew an English person who came over to visit the island. He went to the market; and some person passed bad money among the market women. They pointed out this man as being the party who had passed this false money. He was put in gaol and brought before the Court; and, after being there a fortnight, when the women came before the Court to identify him, neither of them could swear that he was the person. He was immediately liberated.

539. Mr. Le Breton. The Procureur Général abandoned the prosecution immediately, of course. There were three women, I think: they had all positively assured the constable that he was the man.

540. Then the accusation is framed before anything has taken place upon oath at all?—Yes.

541. The enditement, we understand, is presided over by the constable or centenier?—The constable or centenier and his officers compose it. There must be a constable and twelve officers who have not given evidence.

542. Who selects the twelve officers?—The constable.

543. Those people whose names appear as contributing to the information are excluded from the enditement?—Yes.

544. Who determines whether the constable or centenier shall sit?—The constable sits in all cases in which he has not been heard as a witness or informer. We call the witness here in such case informateur. Though a man is accused in consequence of the constable's report, if the constable has not been sworn as a witness he presides at the enditement.

545. Suppose the case in which the constable acts upon a view of the crime, he sees the crime committed, and acts upon his own view: would that prevent his sitting?—Probably it would, because he would be sworn to give further details than those contained in his Report. If he was not sworn he might sit.

546. The evidence on oath is given before the enditement is summoned?—Yes.

547. So that the parties who could not officiate upon the enditement would be any of the police who had been sworn as witnesses previously?—Yes.

548. I suppose the use of the enditement is that a man should not be put upon his trial till a crime is charged against him upon oath. The first tribunal of any sort which decides upon the oath of the informateur is the enditement?—Yes.

549. Then, I presume, the intention of the intervention of the enditement is that a man should not be sent to trial till the charge is credibly made out against him upon oath?—He is not endité till that is done.

550. If, before it goes to the enditement, and before the man was brought before any tribunal, except that of the committing magistrate, there were a charge upon oath, why should anything intervene between that and the grande enquête?—There is no charge upon oath before the magistrate.

551. Suppose you were to say that nobody should be sent to gaol, or be put into prison for trial, unless the magistrate is satisfied, by depositions upon oath, that there is cause to try him: what would be the use of the constable and all those officers intervening between that and the grande enquête?

552. Mr. Dupré. I am of opinion that it would be of no use.

553. Mr. Le Breton. That is a matter on which opinions are divided.

554. What is the object of constructing the enditement in this peculiar way by the police officers?

555. Mr. Dupré. The origin of it was this: that, in former days, when a party was suspected in a parish of having committed a crime, the constable and his officers met and heard the evidence. If, from the information they had taken, they found there were grounds for bringing him to trial, then they indicted him, and then he was tried before the grande enquête. And I think there are some cases still extant in the books, where a prisoner has been tried by the enditement out of Court, and presented by the constable to be tried before the Court and the grande enquête, in consequence of the enditement framed by the police.

556. The constable's intervention followed the enditement, instead of preceding it?—Yes.

557. Supposing the same state of things to continue, and the necessity of a previous enditement to exist, do you know of any benefit arising from this peculiar way of constituting it?—No; I think great inconvenience arises from it.

---

Mr. François Godfray (Advocate) examined.

Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.

558. Is there any suggestion which you are desirous of making to the Commissioners?—I think it would be a great advantage taken away from the prisoner if the enditement were to be removed. Now he has the advantage of two juries: he would then evidently be deprived of the advantage of one of them.

559. In the system we have been speaking of, he would have another tribunal substituted for the enditement, in which the prisoner, before he is sent to trial, would have the accusation made on oath: he would have a magistrate instead of a second jury; and the evidence would be taken upon oath before him?—They would certainly prefer a jury in criminal cases to one magistrate. If it were the Royal Court who were the magistrates, and decided there was evidence enough to send the prisoner before a jury, then the jury would act under the impression that the Court had found the prisoner guilty; and that would have a great weight to induce them to find the man guilty also. One magistrate, if not connected with the Royal Court, would be a different thing, but, if it were before the Royal Court as it is now constituted, and the magistrates who sent the prisoner to trial were to sit on the bench, there would be a great influence over the other jury.

560. Your objection applies particularly to the jury seeing on the bench gentlemen who they knew had previously thought there was a case for trial?—I think the opinion of the magistrate, that there was a case for trial, would have great influence on the decision of the jury.

561. I suppose the fact of a jury having previously decided would also have an influence?—Not so much so. I do not think the grande enquête would abide by the decision of the enditement, or any other jury, so much as by the decision of the magistrate who is supposed to be versed in the law.

562. Why not?—Because they know they are the same class of men as themselves.

563. You think they would be justified in attaching more weight to a magistrate's decision?—I do not know that they would be justified; but I think it would have an influence in fact; and, as to vivâ voce evidence, I think, as we are now constituted in the island, it is necessary that the depositions should be taken in writing. We have an Attorney General, who is chosen from the ablest of the bar. He would have immense advantages in questioning the witnesses, and in his address to the jury, over a young advocate, who, most likely, to defend the interests of the prisoner, would require to read the evidence which had been taken.

564. The case supposed is one of evidence previously taken upon oath and handed to the counsel for the prisoner?—But other witnesses must be heard, I suppose, upon that day: and even the testimony of one witness may materially change the position of the case.

565. This part of your objection, I understand, rests upon the risk of the inequality of counsel?—Not only upon that: but I think, also, upon the inability of most jurymen to take notes of the proceedings, or, when they are together conferring upon the matter, to remember the precise words, or the import of the words, which had been used.

566. You think that outweighs the advantage of their seeing the witnesses give their evidence?—I think so, most decidedly. And the present system has this advantage: that, when a witness has been heard, either the Attorney General or the prisoner may call evidence to rebut his statement.

567. That advantage, as I understand, is not necessarily incident to the present system; is it?—Yes, I think so; because, in the case of vivâ voce evidence given before a jury how could you know what the witnesses would say so as to be prepared to contradict them?

568. You mean that evidence may be given one day, and evidence brought up the next day to contradict that evidence?—Yes.

569. The hypothesis of the Commissioners is, at present, that all that is now given against the prisoner at the enditement should be given previously to the magistrate and handed over in writing to the prisoner's counsel?—Supposing the witnesses for the prisoner make a statement in contradiction to the former statements which had been given, the Attorney General would have a right to rebut that by further evidence.

570. Does he do so in fact?—Yes; and the evidence is only closed when both parties are satisfied that they have no further evidence to give. After the enditement, both parties must say they have no more witnesses to be heard.

571. You are speaking now of the prisoner's position before the enditement; not before the grande enquête?

572. Yes; but his position before the enditement is much the same as before the grande enquête. He has, in fact, two juries, of which, if one is favourable to him, it acquits him.

573. There is no advantage is there, in the enditement as opposed to the grande enquête, except that arising from insisting that a man shall be twice tried?—The same evidence that is brought before the grande enquête is that which is brought before the enditement: that is, you have an appeal from one jury to another.

574. When a person is "criminellement endité," that becomes an Act of Court and is duly recorded?—Yes; that is, there is a decision made that the jury have found the man Guilty.

575. And that decision is recorded?—Yes. If the prisoner is not satisfied with the decision, he asks the benefit of the grande enquête. They sit two or three days afterwards.

576. Suppose the grande enquête acquit him: is not the consequence that there is still a record of his conviction upon the records of the Court?—It is stated that the jury has been unfavourable to him; but in the other case it must be the same. Supposing the magistrate said there were grounds for sending him before a jury, there is the decision of the magistrate, which would be recorded in some way or other. The very act of appearing at the trial would be saying, the magistrate has found you in a position that you should be tried.

577. The decision of the magistrate is a decision that the case is triable: the decision of the jury is in fact a conviction?—It is so.

578. Do you think, if a prisoner had his choice whether he would go before the twenty-four men, having previously had a conviction recorded against him by the constable and his officers, or whether he would have nothing of that sort but simply be sent by the magistrate for trial, he would prefer the former?—There would not be a prisoner who would not prefer being tried by two juries. It must be remembered that, when a constable files an information against a person, he can never sit as juryman. The moment he has had anything to do with an accusation, except in presenting the Report, which is only a matter of form, he cannot preside. It is very lately that the constable was sworn, because his Report was on his oath of office, and therefore it was considered as evidence given upon oath of all facts contained in that Report. His Report must be submitted to the enditement and the grande enquête. If he confirms it before the Court, there is no other mode of confirming it but upon oath: and then he cannot preside at the enditement. If he makes the Report, that Report is evidence of itself; and he cannot sit as constable.

579. Then you differ from the evidence given just now on that point?—Yes: and I have no knowledge of any case where the constable presented the Report, or where he had himself acted, in which he presided as constable: and I have been constable myself for fourteen or fifteen years.

580. In which parish?—In different parishes—St. Hélier's, St. Martin's, and St. Saviour's. The prisoner would take good care to call him as a witness, if there were any doubt about it.

581. A prisoner may prevent his acting, by calling him?—Yes.

582. I suppose there is some limit to that?—If the constable has arrested him, he might say, "You arrested me, and I call upon you to say under what circumstances you arrested me."

583. When a constable has made the Report, he cannot act as president of the enditement?—No.

584. The Commissioners take for granted that you do not limit your preference of this system to its value as giving the defendant a better chance of escape, but consider the question with a view to the interests of truth?—I consider it with a view to the best administration of justice: that is to say, a person who is guilty will be found guilty, a person who is innocent will be found innocent.

585. You mean that it gives a better chance for the discovery of the truth?—Exactly so.

586. Presuming that the bias of a policeman in England would be rather against the prisoner, would it be the same here?—We must not compare policemen in Jersey to policemen in England. The policeman here, not being paid for what he does, has not the same feeling: and then they are not in the same position of life, as Mr. Dupré has stated. There are a great many of those police officers who are principaux' sons, constables' sons; and many of the Jurats have themselves filled the position of police officers. There is one thing I should wish to state: that the Attorney General, whenever he thinks proper, may call upon the constable or centenier, upon the Attorney General's responsibility, to arrest a person and bring him before the Court. The Bailiff and Governor have also the same power. I state this, because it was not clearly stated by the Attorney General.

587. Have you known instances of that?—A great many. The Attorney General confers with the Police; or in some cases, even against their opinion, he would exert that power.

588. You think that is quite matter of course?—Yes.

589. Have you known instances in which constables have refused to arrest till ordered to do so by the Attorney General or by the Bailiff?—Yes: there have been instances. I do not know any case in which that has been objected to by a constable or centenier. There are many cases in which, the Police refusing to act, or not thinking the person should be arrested, the Attorney General has told them to do so, and they have arrested him. I remember instances in which the constable thought a case would not be bailable unless the Attorney General has told him to bail the prisoner; and that has been done.

590. You are not supposing a constable hesitating and going to the Attorney General for assistance, but where he has made up his mind it was not a proper case to be bailed?—Exactly so.

591. You say the constable takes the Procureur Général's opinion as to bail?—Yes; very often. I suppose, if he differed with the Attorney General strongly, he would consult the Bailiff.

[The Witness withdrew.]

Adjourned till to-morrow at ½ past 10.

Tuesday, 8th September, 1846.

Mr. Philip Arthur examined.

Mr. Philip Arthur.
8 September, 1846.

592. You live at Longville, I believe?—Yes.

593. What is your profession?—I am a merchant and shipowner.

594. How far is Longville from hence?—About a mile and a quarter.

595. In what parish is it?—In the parish of St. Saviour's.

596. Have you had any recent opportunity of forming an opinion upon the effectiveness of the protective Police here?—In many instances it is very defective.

597. Will you specify the particulars in which it strikes you as being so?—A late instance I had was this:—Mr. Clarke, my shipwright, informed me that one of my vessels had been stripped of her copper, and that he had taken the name of the party who was robbing the copper from the ship's bottom.

598. He had seen him?—Yes. I asked him if he would know him again; and he said, Yes: and he told me that the name was Payne, in Heate Street, and he said, "If you can get one, you can get the others."

599. Then both the offence and the residence of the supposed offender were in St. Hélier's.—Yes.

600. What did you do upon receiving this name?—I applied to one of the centeniers of this parish, Mr. Chevalier, who would not listen to it at all.

601. You stated to him what you have told us?—Yes.

602. What did he say?—He made use of very vulgar expressions, which I do not think proper to say to the royal Commissioners.

603. Expressions addressed to yourself?—Yes.

604. In point of fact he abused you? He applied some epithet to you?—Not to me, particularly; but that he need not care for my property.

605. What were the words which he used?—He said he did not care for my property, and I might watch it if I thought proper.

606. Did he give any reason for that?—No. I have heard no more since.

607. Perhaps he was engaged about something else?—No: that was the second time I spoke to him. I spoke to him twice.

608. Did he give any reason for neglecting your property in particular?—No. I have not spoken to him since about it.

609. Did he at the time?—He said he was not going to expose himself to be stabbed; and he would not do it. It was at the time that one of the centeniers had been stabbed here: it was a few days after: perhaps the excitement was the cause of it. I do not know.

610. You were not on any bad terms with him personally?—No.

611. Nor in a party way?—No. I never had anything to do with him.

612. What was the date of this?—It was the 1st of March, I believe.

613. In this year?—Yes, in this year.

614. Have you any other information to give us?—No.

615. Mr. Philippe W. Nicolle. I wish to state that Mr. Arthur, at the time, mentioned the case to me; and I remonstrated with Mr. Chevalier upon the subject, and told him that, if it was as Mr. Arthur stated it, he was very wrong, and that it was not doing his duty. And upon that Mr. Chevalier told me that Mr. Arthur refused to give the party in charge.

616. Mr. Arthur. No such thing: there were several people there at that time. I could not go and give him the information and refuse to give him the name of the party.

617. Mr. Philippe W. Nicolle.—You refused to prosecute.

618. Mr. Arthur. It was his duty to seize him, not mine.

619. (To Mr. Arthur.) Did you intimate any unwillingness to proceed?—He said he would not.

620. Did you yourself intimate any unwillingness in any way?—No. What business had I to go to him if I was not willing to proceed? I recollect that I was surprised at Mr. Chevalier's answer; and I met Mr. Nicolle in the Chamber of Commerce, and told him what Mr. Chevalier had told to me.

621. Mr. Philippe W. Nicolle. And I communicated with Mr. Chevalier upon the subject; and he said you told him the quantity was so small that you only wanted to give him a reprimand, and not to proceed against him.

622. Mr. Arthur. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Abraham Jones Le Cras examined.

Mr. Abraham Jones Le Cras.

623. Have you had any recent opportunity of observing the effectiveness or want of effectiveness of the Police?—Yes.

624. Will you state it?—In the month of February last, I was assaulted by a person of this town. I had previously heard that the assault was meditated, and had given information to centenier Duparcq.

625. Is he one of the centeniers of St. Hélier's?—Yes. I had given him information, and requested him to bind the party over to keep the peace.

626. Have they the power to do that?—Yes.

627. (To Mr. Le Breton). Is that so?—Yes.

628. The centeniers and constables have that power?—Yes. They do not take any bail in money. It is an injunction to keep the peace: and, if they break it after that, it becomes an offence.

JERSEY.

Mr. Abraham Jones Le Cras.

8 September, 1846.

629. Then it is a warning, in point of fact, to keep the peace.—It is.

630. (To Mr. Le Cras.) Was your communication in writing?—Yes; to which I received no answer. It was sent by a friend in a letter.

621. Have you any reason to know that it came to the hands of Mr. Duparcq?—Yes, I have. The assault was afterwards committed.

632. Was it a blow?—Yes, several blows.

633. Where was it?—In the public streets of this town. I was accompanied by a friend at the time.

634. Is that Mr. Sullivan?—Yes. He immediately ran to vingtenier Mahy, who, as I am informed, refused to interfere.

635. You were not present, of course?—No.

636. Was this street within the vingtaine of vingtenier Mahy?—That I cannot answer.

637. We are informed that he could not act out of his vingtaine, unless the constable or some superior officer were present.—I do not know whether it was his vingtaine or not. After that, my friend went to the Attorney General, and informed him of it. In the evening, I wrote to Mr. Duparcq again, to enquire of him if he had bound the party to preserve the peace, and, if so, in what sum of money conditioned for the performance of the same. I obtained no answer. I wrote to the constable, Mr. Le Sueur, and informed him of the facts; and he requested that I would attend at his office the next morning. He wrote me an answer to that effect, in which he promised that he would take cognizance of the matter.

638. Have you the note here?—I have a copy of it; but not the note.

639. Will you read it?—"St. Hélier, 18th February, 1846.—Sir, I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, and beg to request your personal attendance at my office tomorrow (Thursday) between 10 and 11 o'clock, when I shall take cognizance of any charge you may have to prefer. I remain, sir, your obedient servant, P. Le Sueur, constable of the parish of St. Hélier."

640. Did you attend?—I waited upon him according to appointment, and gave him every particular. He told me that he had made previous enquiries, and that he had ascertained that what I had stated was not true. I told him I found it very strange that he should exercise magisterial authority, and that I hoped he would give me an opportunity of proving it. He said he would consider of it. I heard nothing further from him.

641. Did you make any further application?—I complained to the Attorney General, after the matter had been brought before the Court by private suit against the party, to prosecute the party. I commenced a suit against the party, to which the Crown officer was joined.

642. A cause en ajonction?—Yes.

643. Against the party assaulting you?—Yes. I afterwards applied to Mr. Le Breton, the the Attorney General, to prosecute the police officer for dereliction of duty; and Mr. Le Breton declined.

644. And there the matter stopped, I suppose?—It did.

645. Did anything come of the cause en ajonction?—That went on and was brought to a hearing.

646. What was the result?—I recovered a judgment by the casting vote of the bailiff.

647. That does not come before the grande enquête or the enditement?—No: it is before a petty court. Mr. Bisson was for 10*l.* damages to the Crown, and 10*l.* to the plaintiff; and Mr. Winter Nicolle for 10*l.* to the Crown, but 1*s.* to myself.

648. A cause en ajonction carries both with it?—Mr. Le Breton. There is always a fine to the Crown; and sometimes there are damages to the party.

649. Mr. Le Cras. The bailiff gave his casting vote in favour of 10*l.* to myself and 10*l.* to the Crown.

650. In point of fact, you recovered 10*l.*, and the party was fined 10*l.*—Yes. The bailiff sided with Mr. Bisson's opinion, and gave 10*l.* to the Crown and 10*l.* to myself. The party appealed against the judgment to a full bench; and that is still pending; at least I suppose so. I am not aware whether the appeal has expired by lapse of time. It might be kept on for years; and consequently the judgment is worth little or nothing. The constable, Mr. Le Sueur, was in the Court at the time the case was heard, and, profiting by his position as Advocate, he sat by the side of the party's counsel, and prompted him to everything he could against me.

651. Who was counsel for the defendant?—The party's counsel was Mr. Marett. In fact it called for the interference of the Court. My counsel was Advocate Godfray.

Mr. John Sullivan.

Mr. John Sullivan examined.

652. Will you state where you live?—At Halkett Place, St. Hélier's.

653. What is your occupation?—I am a jeweller.

654. Were you present with Mr. Le Cras on the 1st of March last?—Yes.

655. Will you tell us what you know of the matter?—I met Mr. Le Cras, as he was leaving his office in Beresford Street, and we proceeded towards Catel Street, which is the next street to Beresford Street. As he was going home, he asked me to accompany him a little distance out of the town, as he understood there was an individual who intended to assault him. I did so. When we entered Cattle Street, I saw a man with a large whip in his hand.

656. You witnessed the assault?—Yes.

657. Did you upon that go to vingtenier Mahy?—Yes. Mr. Le Cras requested me to call upon the police in his name. Vingtenier Mahy's house being the nearest to where the assault took place, I went there: I found him at home, and related to him what had taken place. I said I thought Mr. Le Cras's life was in danger.

Mr. John Sullivan.
8 September, 1846.

658. It had been a violent assault, had it?—A very violent assault.

659. Upon making that complaint, will you tell us what Mr. Mahy said?—Upon that Mr. Mahy said that he would not move on any account.

660. Did he give any reason why?—He said that Mr. Le Cras called the police "illiterate policemen," and then he came to them for assistance. I did all I could to persuade him to come. He still persisted in saying that he would not.

661. What is Mr. Mahy?—He is a wine and spirit merchant. As I thought that it was unnecessary to call on any other member of the police, I called on the Attorney General, Mr. Le Breton, who was at the States' meeting,

662. Do you happen to know for what vingtaine Mr. Mahy acts?—He acts for Mont à Prêtre, Canton de Bas.

663. Is that the vingtaine?—No. But the vingtenier has the right, in case of flagrant délit, to seize any person in any part of the town.

664. If Mr. Mahy had acted upon your application, and had come with you, would he have been in time to have witnessed the crime?—Yes, he would; and he would have spared another assault to Mr. Le Cras: for, while I came here for the Attorney General, another assault was committed.

665. If he had witnessed it, it would have been a "flagrant délit?"—Yes. While I was gone, Mr. Le Cras left the first house in which he had taken refuge. Mr. Le Cras took refuge in a house, and was compelled to leave it by the persons who were afraid that the man would come in and ill treat him again; so that they asked Mr. Le Cras to leave, as they thought he could go home then. While I came here for the Attorney General, Mr. Le Cras left the house, and was again assaulted a second time.

666. You were not present then, were you?—No. Mr. Le Cras told me so when I returned; and I found him in another house to that in which I had left him. The Attorney General was kind enough to come down; and he met the police officer, Mr. Coutanche.

667. Is he a vingtenier?—No, a constable's officer.

668. Of St. Héliers?—Yes. He asked him to come with him to Mr. Le Cras's rescue, and he begged of Mr. Coutanche to accompany Mr. Le Cras out of town to his house.

669. Which he did I suppose?— He did.

670. Did you meet Mr. Le Cras by appointment, or was it accidental?—Accidental.

671. It was not you that carried the letter to Mr. Duparcq, was it?—No. I had the letter in charge; and I sent my man servant with it.

672. You have no means of actually knowing, of your own knowledge, that it was received?—When the man returned, I asked him, and he told me that he had delivered it.

673. (To Mr. Le Breton.) When a dispute is taken up in the form of a cause en ajonction, is it generally understood that that supersedes the prosecution?—For an assault.

674. It would not necessarily supersede a prosecution against the officer for not acting properly?—No.

675. Did you think it an insufficient case for prosecution?—When Mr. Le Cras applied to me, the suit had been instituted and was pending before the Court; and therefore I thought that, if his case were proved, he would obtain damages, and a fine would be levied for the Crown for a breach of the peace, and that I could not, during that period, take any other measure.

676. You thought the prosecution of the public officer for not acting would be premature, while the case was being inquired into in another shape?—Yes.

677. This was an application for what we should call in England an ex officio prosecution?—Yes.

678. Another sort of prosecution is instituted only by the constable being set in motion?—Yes. In this case, from conversations I had with the constable on the subject, who told me that he had taken the informations, I thought that I exercised a proper discretion in not taking any further notice of the matter.

679. Waiting the result of the first prosecution?—Yes.

680 (To Mr. Le Cras.) You did not see Mr. Duparcq himself upon the subject, to ascertain from him whether he had received your letter?—No.

Mr. Philippe Duheaume examined.

Mr. Philippe Duheaume.

681. What is your occupation?—Farmer at St. Ouen's. The house is called La Robeline.

682. Did it happen to you lately to have been assaulted by any body?—Yes.

683. When, and in what manner?—On the 16th July last, I and my servant were cutting grass on the hills called the Grantez. It was an open ground. My servant went to dinner before me; and I remained behind. After dinner, on their return, my servants told me that a neighbour of mine had been cutting grass upon my piece of ground. I told my servants to cut the grass, as they had been in the habit of cutting. The neighbour suddenly returned and found me with a rake in my hand, and seized me by the collar, and attempted to drag me on his own ground. I was then obliged to call one of my servants to come to my assistance, who tore away his hand from my throat.

684. Did you make any complaint to the Police?—Yes. About twelve days after, I went with my servants to complain of this assault to the constable.

685. You went yourself?—Yes, with my servants.

686. What policeman was it?—The constable, Mr. Le Cerf. Mrs. Le Cerf said, her husband was not there.

687. Is Mr. Le Cerf the constable of St. Ouen?—Yes. Mr. Le Brun is the first centenier.

JERSEY.

Mr. Philippe Duheaume.

8 September, 1846.

I went to him. Mr. Le Brun said, he would attend to it. I was to come the following evening, and he would see about it; and he told me he would speak to Peter Suret, who was cutting grass for Mr. Hacquoil when the assault took place. I went again, the following evening; and I saw Mr. Le Brun the next day, as I was coming to town on the road. He said, he had been to town, but had not had time to attend to it, but he would attend to it.

688. Did he afterwards attend to it?—He said, he would talk to Suret, and Stephen Gard, and that he would wait upon me, in order not to give me the trouble of going to him again.

689. This was Mr. Le Brun?—Yes.

690. Did Mr. Le Brun come to you?—No. I went to his house again. He said, he had attended to it. I asked him, whether I had told him enough in order to bind the party. He said he had taken measures, and that I might go about with safety; but he never would tell me what measures he had taken. I asked him, if he had bound him to keep the peace; but he would not tell me what measures he had taken.

691. Are you a rate-payer?—I pay one of the highest rates in the parish. There is only myself and Mr. D'Auvergne who pay a rate of 50 quarters. We pay the highest in the parish.

692. Have you been constable or centenier yourself?—I have been constable's officer at St. Hélier's, and centenier and constable.

693. Do Mr. Le Brun and yourself belong to the same party in the parish?—No.

694. Does the neighbour who committed this assault belong to the same party as yourself?—He did formerly; but I do not know, from what has happened, of what party he may be now. He has no vote in the parish assembly. He has voted for both sides of the question.

695. Have you been insulted in any other manner?—No.

696. Are you at all able to form an opinion as to what is the state of the Police in your parish as a protection against crime?—The Police act with the greatest partiality possible: they appear to encourage, not to prevent, crime.

697. Do you believe that the Police have always acted with partiality?—Certainly, always: and the police have great influence in the parish assembly.

698. Did the Police act with partiality when you were constable?—Certainly not: but the officers at times permitted Mr. Chevalier to come into the parish assembly of St. Ouen's, and sit down next to the constable, at the same time that they refused the Vicomte to enter, though he came for the same object.

Mr. Charles Romeril.

Mr. Charles Romeril examined.

700. Where do you live?—No. 9, Broad street.

701. What is your profession or calling?—I am connected with the press.

702. With a newspaper?—Yes. I am a reporter. On the 1st of August, 1845, appeared an article in the Miroir newspaper, which I could produce if necessary. It was an article merely stating that the Police had been to a picnic at Pontac, and that some of them had furnished gin, some wine, and some bread; and, as it was Friday, and it was the custom in this island to have a supper of tripes on the Friday, I said some of them had furnished the tripes. The next day, the Saturday evening, I met one of the party, Mr. John Alexander.

Is he one of the Police?—He was; he is not now. He was three parts tipsy. He addressed me in great anger, and asked me if I was responsible for what appeared in the paper which belongs to my son. My wife being sick at the time, and fearing that he should go to my house and make a row, I answered "Yes." He asked me if I would contradict a part of the statement relating to him; that he not had furnished the gin. I said I would. There was present, at the time, one Mr. Grirton and Mr. Manuel, who was the father of the police officer. He wanted me to go to his house, which, I believe, from what took place after, was to assassinate me, if I had gone. On the Monday, when I was crossing at the top of Broad Street, I was suddenly attacked by two young men, whom I knew afterwards to be the sons of Mr. Chevalier the centenier, who, without saying a word to me, knocked me down, one with a stick and one with his fist.

703. You were only knocked down once?—I could not get up again. They continued to strike me till assistance came. When I was taken, almost senseless, to a neighbour's house, they followed me there, and wanted to force their entry into the house against the people's will; but they were prevented. That was in the evening. I went and showed myself to the Queen's Attorney General, who saw the state I was in, and the wounds that continued to be visible for four weeks afterwards. The next morning, as I was going to the Attorney General, to know what to do about it, knowing that the police had a spite against me and that they would not do their duty, the Attorney General not being at home, just as I was coming back, crossing the square, I was met by young Manuel, the police officer, and centenier Duparcq. I had a stick in my hand, which had a dozen and a half of little points, about one eighth of an inch long, projecting out of it to grasp it, so that they could not take it out of my hands. I had had that twenty years as a protection. The centenier took it from me forcibly, to leave me exposed to the brutality of my assailants. I asked him then to arrest my assailants.

704. Were you at that time being assaulted?—I had been the evening before.

705. What took place at this time. As you were returning from the Procureur Général, was it that you met centenier Duparcq and Mr. Manuel, the police officer, and that centenier Duparcq took your stick from you?—Yes. I asked him to arrest them.

706. To arrest the people who had attacked you the evening before, you mean?—Yes. He said he would bind them to keep the peace the next time he saw them. When I saw the Attorney General, a little after, he advised me to go to some other of the Police.

707. This was after they had assaulted you?—Yes, the next day.

708. You asked him to arrest them for the assault the night before?—Yes, and he would not do it.

709. He refused to arrest them, but said he would bind them to keep the peace?—Yes; and he wanted to bind me to keep the peace towards them.

710. He bound them too, I suppose?—He said he would.

711. He did bind you?—He did. Centenier Le Cronier had been to my house, to bind my sons also to keep the peace.

712. How do you know that?—The centenier told me so himself. That is the centenier who was assassinated. I asked him also to arrest my assailants.

713. Did you mention their names to him?—Yes. He said he was very sorry for what had taken place; and I believe he was; for we were very neighbourly, and he was a good man: but he said that he could not do it, because, if people were to put anything in the papers reflecting upon the Police, of course they must take the consequences. In the evening of that day, when it was too late to go to any magistrate for an order of imprisonment, I was met again by centenier Duparcq, who took me up, and said I was his prisoner, and I must go to gaol. I ought to have said, before, that I went to the dean to have the register of baptism of the two Chevaliers. I went first to the clerk of the parish. Shortly after, I saw, in centenier Le Cronier's shop, centenier Le Cronier, centenier Duparcq and the Chevaliers. They were all looking at the stick which had been taken from me. The result of their consultation was that I was apprehended in the evening, and was put in gaol, to frighten me, I suppose, from instituting proceedings. I was obliged to furnish security of fifty pounds, to find a person to stand security for fifty pounds: that was the final security that the Court only could take. That was security that I would not attempt the lives of the young Chevaliers, or any one of the family. It was not to produce me in Court.

714. Who obliged you to furnish this security?—Centenier Duparcq. We went to the house of a friend of mine, who stood security for me. I repeated to him that I had requested him in the morning to seize my assailants. That he denied: so I repeated it to him again. I said, "if you deny it, I repeat it to you, before a witness." He said, "I am obliged to follow my orders." I said, "I know you have orders from some one; but who gave you the orders?" He said, "I am not obliged to tell you:" and he went off. On the next Saturday, my security came to me, and told me that I was to appear in the Court, and said he never understood that he was to produce me to the Court; but that the centenier had been to him, and told him he was also obliged to produce me in Court, as he was going to enter a Report against me. So I appeared.

715. You were brought before the Court?—Yes; I did not know what for.

716. Did not they tell you what it was for, when you were in Court?—It was not presented; so that I was brought up another day: and, as it was not presented on the second day, coming out of court, I asked centenier Duparcq when I was to appear again: and he answered me, in an angry tone, "I have no reason to give you," and went off. I was obliged therefore to enter a remonstrance.

717. Is that a civil action?—Both civil and criminal.

718. Is that pending now?—Yes. The constable himself, who is an advocate, also pleads the cause of my assailants. I have been seized for a twelvemonth, and imprisoned; that is I have been under security, and am not able to leave the island, not knowing the moment when the Report may be entered. I am under security to appear before the Court, to hear the Report entered against me; and, as the Report by law can be entered within twelve months, it runs on.

719. You have never been brought before the Court yet?—No. After a twelvemonth, when I asked centenier Duparcq to give me back my stick, the reason he gave me was, "Go and ask Mr. Chevalier; he has got it; I have given it to him." I said, "the stick, which you thought dangerous in the hands of the person assailed, you take from him, and give into the hands of his assailants." He said, again, he had no reason to give me. Mr. Duparcq is called in my private law-suit as a witness, who has taken an active part.

720. Your security is now discharged by lapse of time?—Yes: but I have suffered a great deal, through not being able to go out of the island.

721. In point of fact they kept you under surety to appear before the Court for a whole year?—Yes: and for that I have no redress, except by civil action against the centenier: and I would be ruined before I could get justice against a body of men like the Police, with a public fund at their disposal.

722. (To Mr. Le Breton.) What was your reason for not authorizing a prosecution in this case?—I considered that Mr. Romeril was the party aggrieved, and that it was absurd that the party who had been violently assaulted should be prosecuted, instead of those who had committed the assault.

723. You had no power, unless it came to an accusation, to discharge him?—Bail was taken, without its being communicated to me.

724. Did you afterwards know the fact of this gentleman being held under security in this way?—The moment I refused to enter a prosecution, I considered that the centenier would immediately liberate the bail, as he knew that no proceeding would follow upon it.

725. It rests with him to liberate it, does it?—With the officer who had taken it.

726. Is that so, that no proceedings against the Police could have been commenced by Mr. Romeril for want of there being an information?—I consider that Mr. Romeril might have instituted proceedings against centenier Duparcq, who had arrested him, if he had been so advised.

727. Criminal proceedings?—Not criminal proceedings.

JERSEY.

Mr. Charles Romeril. 8 September, 1846.

728. So that, for want of an information of the constable here, no criminal proceedings, strictly so called, could be instituted: that is to say, you could not prosecute as Attorney General for want of the constable's information.—I might have done so ex officio; but, Mr. Romeril having applied to the Court, by a cause en ajonction, for a fine to the Crown and damages to himself, the reason was gone.

729. In fact, Mr. Romeril was driven to the proceeding en ajonction to obtain justice?—Yes. When Mr. Romeril applied to me late in the evening (I think it was between nine and ten o'clock), I immediately referred him to the Police, and told him the complaint ought to be addressed to the Police. He told me that he would apply to the Police though he did not expect any redress from them. Upon that, I told him it was his duty to apply to the Police in the first instance.

730. Mr. Romeril. Perhaps I may observe that one of my assailants has been since made a police officer himself.

Mr. Richard Duparcq.

Mr. Richard Duparcq examined.

731. You are centenier of St. Héliers?—Yes, of St. Hélier's parish.

732. Will you tell us your version of this story?—In August, 1845, I met Mr. Henry Manuel, a police officer, who told me, Mr. Romeril had threatened to have the life of the young Chevaliers. While we were in the square, he passed with a stick: he said, "There is Mr. Romeril with a stick." I went up to Mr Romeril, and told him, "Mr. Romeril, will you show me your stick?" He said, "Yes." In handling the stick, I saw it had sixteen or eighteen points; and I told him, "This is a very dangerous stick." And he told me it was to defend himself. I told him, "Mr. Romeril, I shall keep this stick; for I have been told, by Mr. Manuel, you have threatened to have the life of the young Chevaliers." I told Mr. Romeril that I was obliged to bind him to keep the peace towards the young Chevaliers and Mr. Chevalier's family. He told me that I ought to have gone to the Messieurs Chevalier, and not to him; and he asked me to go, which I did, in company with Mr. Manuel, immediately afterwards.

733. Had you received any formal complaint from the young Messieurs Chevalier?—No: but I had heard from Mr. Manuel that he could bring witnesses that Mr. Romeril had threatened the life of the young Chevaliers.

734. Did you go to the Chevaliers?—I did. After that, I met Captain Chevalier, the father of the young Chevaliers, who told me, the same as Mr. Manuel, that Mr. Romeril had threatened the life of his sons.

735. You told Mr. Romeril you had had this account given to you?—I did, in the presence of Mr. Manuel. I met Mr. Chevalier, the centenier, in the square; and we went up to the Attorney General, and told him what had passed, and asked him his advice, how I was to act towards Mr. Romeril. He told me he was to be seized or to give security: he told me so in the presence of centenier Chevalier. In the evening, I met Mr. Romeril. I had spoken to the constable Mr. Le Sueur about it in his office; and he told me I must try and see Mr. Romeril, and get him to give security; and, if he did not give me security, to put him in gaol.

736. Had any body told you he had heard Mr. Romeril offer those threats?—Yes: Mr. Manuel did. He told me that some one had told him (I believe it was his father) that he had heard Mr. Romeril say so.

737. Did you see Mr. Manuel's father?—No; but I put the question to Mr. Romeril in the evening. I asked him to give me bail; which he said he could do.

738. Are you in the habit of requiring bail, when the only evidence you have of a threat is that somebody says that somebody had told him he had heard of the threat?—That never happened to me before.

739. Do you act upon the information, not of a person who has seen the crime, but of somebody who has been told that the crime has been committed?—Yes. Mr. Manuel told me there was sufficient proof: he is a police officer.

740. Mr. Manuel, the police officer, told you that his father had told him that Mr. Romeril had threatened the lives of the young Chevaliers?—Yes.

741. And, upon that, you thought it your duty to take bail of him?—Yes.

742. Would you generally act upon information of that kind?—Yes; I told Mr. Romeril of it in the evening: and he said, he might have said so in conversation.

743. I understood you to say that Mr. Romeril had told you the two young Chevaliers had committed an assault upon him, and asked you to take bail of them.—He did not.

744. Did you take any security of Messieurs Chevalier?—No, I did not.

745. Do you wish to add anything further?—I think I ought to say this, as to Mr. Romeril. When I told him he must find bail, he told me he would go to Mr. Charles Hewet at once. I went to him. Mr. Charles Hewet was there, and Mr. Edward Seaward; and Mr. Hewet said, "No: I understand you carry pistols in your pocket; I will not be security for you." We went again to Mr. Du Jardin: he was not at home: and then we went to another.

746. After taking security, on understanding from the Attorney General that it is not a case that he thinks proper to prosecute, is not it usual to liberate the bail immediately?—I ought to have done it; but I thought, when the Attorney General refused to enter the Report on Saturday, it was done with. I never thought any more about it.

747. Did not you say, "Je n'ai pas de raisons à vous donner?"—Yes; I did say that in August last. Mr. Romeril asked me for a stick; I told him to go to Mr. Chevalier.

748. Mr Romeril says that, on Saturday, the next Court day, he was in attendance at the Court, expecting you would prefer a complaint.—I gave it to the Attorney General; but he would not enter the Report.

749. On the succeeding Saturday, Mr. Romeril came again, expecting you would prefer your Report, and asked you why you did not prefer your report: you said "I have no reason to give you."—Perhaps I might have done so. I do not exactly recollect what passed: it is a year ago.

750. Why did not you say to him, "The Attorney General does not intend to proceed, and your bail is now at liberty?"—I did not say that.

751. It did not occur to you to say so?—No.

752. Of course, if it had come into your mind, you would have said so?—I would. I had nothing against Mr. Romeril personally.

753. Is the bail a written instrument?—No; it is merely by words.

754. It is entered, in point of fact, in your Report?—I do not believe it is mentioned in the Report that there was bail for Mr. Romeril. It is in the possession of the Attorney General now. It was given to him; and I have never had it again. I have a copy of it, and can produce it.

755. Had Mr. Romeril marks of blows the next morning when you saw him?—I could see that Mr. Romeril had a black eye: that was all that I saw.

756. While you were away, some evidence was given by Mr. Le Cras, concerning some complaint of his. [The evidence of Mr. Le Cras was read to the witness.]—On receiving the letter of Mr. Le Cras, I went with the party to Mr. Seaward; but he was not at home. I also went again with my son, who was a police officer.

757. You did not find him at home?—No.

758. Neither time?—No.

759. Were those two inquiries both made on the same day?—No. I believe the other inquiry was to know if I had bound Mr. Seaward to keep the peace, and to what amount.

760. On going to look after Mr. Seaward, you did not find him at home: were they both the same day?—Yes, in the afternoon: once before two, and the other after two o'clock.

761. You did not return any answer in writing to Mr. Le Cras?—No; I did not think it was necessary.

762. Did you have any conversation with him afterwards about it?—Never. I have never spoken a word to him since that time, nor for a long time before.

763. Was your only reason for not taking this security not finding Mr. Seaward at home?—That was my only reason. If I had, I would have done it, as it was my duty to do.

764. You did not make any subsequent enquiry?—No. I was called away, after that, on another police business; and I was told, the next day, Mr. Le Cras was going to enter an action against Mr. Seaward.

765. How far have you to go to Mr. Seaward's?—About four or five hundred yards.

766. Is Mr. Seaward an acquaintance or friend of yours?—No.

767. What is your business?—I am a wine and spirit merchant.

768. Mr. Le Cras. Mr. Seaward keeps a public house.

769. (To Mr. Duparcq.) He does not deal with you, I suppose.—No.

770. Has he ever dealt with you?—Never, to my knowledge.

771. How soon after receiving Mr. Le Cras's letter did you go to Mr. Seaward?—Immediately: the first time it was a few minutes before two.

772. Mr. Le Cras. My letter was sent at half past ten.

773. Mr. Duparcq. I did not receive the letter till a few minutes before two.

774. Had you been from home that morning?—No: I had not, to my knowledge. The second letter I cannot tell when I received, whether it was in the morning or in the afternoon.

775. Did you receive a second letter the same day?—Yes.

776. The first you received a little before two?—Yes, to go down and bind Mr. Seaward to keep the peace towards Mr. Le Cras.

777. I suppose these complaints are a source of great inconvenience to a gentleman so much engaged in business as yourself?—I was not engaged in business then.

778. Is there anything which you wish to add upon this subject?—Nothing else.

779. Mr. Le Breton. I recollect that Mr. Duparcq spoke to me several times, with respect to Mr. Romeril, that he had threatened the life of the young Chevaliers. I told him I saw no danger in it, and that it would be absurd that a person who had been so ill treated as Mr. Romeril should be put in gaol, for a threat of that kind, when an assault had not been witnessed by the Police. He was extremely pressing that I should give him directions to arrest Mr. Romeril. I ought to say that he spoke to me several times. He came afterwards, accompanied by Mr. Chevalier, the father of those two young men, and showed me a stick which had iron spikes in it. Mr. Chevalier did all he could to induce me to direct the arrest of Mr. Romeril. I told him that his sons were concerned, and that it was not proper for him to interfere in the matter. Both he and Mr. Duparcq told me there would be a murder committed; and, from the length of time, I cannot exactly state whether they said it would be my fault, or that I should be the cause, if Mr. Romeril was not arrested; but I have that impression. I told them, if they considered that a murder was to be committed, they might on their own responsibility take such measures to prevent it as, on consulting with the constable, they might think necessary, but that I had no apprehension of that kind myself.

780. They would not want your authority, merely for the purpose of taking bail? The practice is to do it upon their own discretion?—Very often: sometimes they consult me.

JERSEY.

Mr. Richard Duparcq.

September, 1846.

781. But, on your giving an opinion to the contrary, they would have the power of doing so on their own responsibility?—Yes, till the matter comes before the Court. I could have no means of compelling them to refuse bail, except expressing my opinion.

782. Your account of the transaction does not quite agree with Mr. Duparcq's.—No.

---

Mr. David Bromer.

Mr. David Bromer examined.

783. Are you a resident in St. Héliers?—I am the eldest son of a lady who has a property of £500 a year. I have been in the island fifteen or sixteen years, more or less; but my mother's address is at Gibraltar.

784. At present you are staying here?—I am a landed proprietor.

785. Where do you reside?—In St. Héliers.

786. Have you any complaint to make of the non-interference of the police: and will you be kind enough to state the facts?—I am not positively prepared as to dates, not knowing, when I came into Court, that there would be a private examination of individuals: but, as the documents remain in the hands of the Police, they can be added afterwards. The first complaint I have to make is this. The limitation of an acceptance of a bill here is ten years.

787. You mean to say that no action can be brought upon a bill of exchange after ten years?—No. Within that period, I sent a bill, which I received from Advocate Godfray's office, by order of Mr. Brown of St. Saviour's, for payment to a person of the name of Milard, in Halkett place.

788. It was drawn on, or accepted by, Milard?—Yes; I do not know; but the document is still in the hands of the Police. When Mr. Dupont, whom I sent to present the bill, arrived at Milard's, the bill was destroyed by Milard and his wife. I applied to the police, and had the usual difficulty in finding one.

789. You went after several before you found one?—Yes. I invariably do so.

790. And you did so upon this occasion?—Yes. I met Mr. Manuel at Mr. Falle's shop in the square, and sent him to seize Milard and his wife.

791. You told him, of course, those facts?—Yes. The next day, I applied at Advocate Le Sueur's office, and saw part of the torn document: and he asked me if it was the same. It was pasted together, which he told me had been done by themselves, as a security. I left the office, and applied to the deputy Vicomte (Judge Le Gallais now), and asked him (as on many occasions he has been most courteous in giving me advice) what course I was to pursue.

792. Did you ascertain from Mr. Le Sueur whether they had arrested the party?—I ascertained that they had seized the parties, and taken bail, and that he had recovered two thirds of the torn document. I applied to Mr. Le Gallais, not being confident whether it was a criminal case or not; and, from political reasons, not being friendly with the Police, I wished to hold as little communication with them at all times as possible, belonging to the opposite party. The deputy Vicomte told me that, they having taken forcible possession of the security, it was a criminal matter, and the only way they could meet it was at once to pay the bill; that it was not a civil action, because, the security having been torn, it was a criminal affair.

793. He could not act as an attorney, because the only persons who could act were the Procureur Général and the Police?—Yes. I then accompanied Advocate Le Sueur to the Procureur Général's office, when the Procureur Général advised a settlement. Being a good deal irritated at the language which I heard that Milard had used towards myself, stating that I had found the bill, I stated to the Procureur Général that I would not place myself in a position that other people had been placed in, to be accused of compromising felonies; when I was requested to leave the room. As I left the room, the constable of St. Héliers remained behind for about two minutes. When he came out of the Procureur Général's room, he asked me if I would accompany him to Mr. Le Ber, the agent in the square. When there, Mr. Le Ber stated that it was a melancholy affair, for Mrs. Milard had given this bill in the first instance unknown to her husband; that he would give me 10*s.* in the pound for her. I reiterated my former statement to the Procureur Général. I stated I did not compromise felonies; and I requested the constable to do his duty. Week after week, I applied to the constable, who told me that he had sent his report to the Procureur Général, and the case would be presented from Saturday to Saturday; and I danced attendance on several occasions. I complained to the Police subsequently, and stated that I had been extremely ill used by them. The answer I received, in the presence of Judges, whom I will not name, was that Milard had been mixed up in a pistol transaction with the Procureur Général, and he could do nothing more for me: and, from that day to this, I have been robbed of the security. I have not received one shilling.

794. By whom were you told this?—By parties in authority.

795. Filling what office?—It was said by the Police generally. It was in Mr. Falle's shop it was told me. Whatever may be the reason, I have lost the security.

796. The security is, of course, in the hands of the constable and the Police?—I believe so. I have not seen it since.

797. What is the amount?—It may be 25*l.* or 35*l.*; I am not sure which.

798. Are you in any business here?—I have been fourteen months in prison, having been arrested as the drawer of bills, dated here, and accepted payable eight months afterwards in London, for which the acceptor had given collateral security, because I could not produce security that the acceptor would pay them when at maturity here. After fourteen months I was liberated. I denied the debt, and successfully resisted it.

799. Upon some civil process you have been imprisoned?—The only process was, that I was arrested without the slightest security. Judge Nicolle arrested me, in the name of Mr. Bertram, to whom I had never owed a shilling in my life.

800. (To Mr. Le Gallais). Is not it a question of a good deal of difficulty, whether that is a felony or not?—The bill was drawn, I believe, by the woman.

801. You may be aware that, whether the tearing be animo furandi, is a question upon which there are solemn decisions both ways in England?—The security being destroyed, I considered I could not interfere.

802. Did you consider that the destruction of the bill was a felonious appropriation of the bill?—I considered it was done with the view of defrauding the holder of the bill of the amount.

803. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Do you recollect this circumstance?—I do. It is two or three years ago, I think. Of course I may not recollect perfectly every thing that passed.

804. Do you recollect the meeting between Mr. Bromer and Mr. Le Sueur, at your office?—Yes. There appeared to be very great difficulty in the matter. Mr. Le Sueur is a person who can give the Commissioners greater details than I can do. The bill, I believe, was overdue; it was what we call périmé; it was signed by the wife of Mr. Milard. As far as I can now recollect, from the information which was conveyed to me by Mr. Le Sueur and other persons, the fact of having destroyed the bill appeared to be very doubtful. Whether the bill was received by Milard and his wife, or by his wife alone, I do not exactly recollect. Their statement was, that a person, whom they did not know, presented the bill, and that, being overdue, and the person refusing to give any information by whom he was sent, or whose bill it was, they took hold of the bill, to keep it till they found out whose it was; and that, in taking it, it was torn in two. I do not know whether it was a bill, or a note of hand, The bill was delivered up to Mr. Le Sueur; and, after a considerable time, and having seen Mr. Le Sueur upon the subject at different periods,—

805. Officially, as constable?—Yes:—we were both, I believe, of opinion that it was not a case to found a criminal prosecution upon, but that the bill should be given up to Mr. Bromer, to sue for it, if it was of any value. Mr. Cromer having said that he was desired to leave the room, I may state that it was in consequence of the most abusive language, which he had used on that occasion, telling me that if I chose to compromise felonies he would not do it. Mr. Bromer spoke to me several times in the street upon the subject, and always in the most insulting manner; and finally he complained to the Lieutenant Governor upon the subject. I do not know whether he did not also complain to the Secretary of State. I saw the letter addressed by Mr. Bromer, which was in such terms as the Lieutenant Governor did not consider even respectful to himself. I believe Mr. Le Sueur repeatedly offered the bill to Mr. Bromer.

806. You know that from hearsay?—Mr. Cromer acknowledged to me that Mr. Le Sueur had offered the bill, but that he would not take it.

807. Where?—In the square. The fact is, that Mr. Bromer annoyed me so repeatedly and so constantly, and was always in such a state of irritation, that it is very probable he may not recollect what he said on those occasions.

808. The bill is still in the custody of the Police, I suppose, and Mr. Bromer could have the bill any day by making the proper application?—He might have had it then: and I suppose he might have it still. The bill has never been in my custody.

809. You thought, taking the whole of the circumstances into consideration, it was not a fair case for a criminal prosecution?—No.

810. You stated that you were informed, by Mr. Le Sueur and other persons, of the circumstances. Were you informed by people in office, and did you receive that information as a public officer, and where?—I cannot say, from the length of time, where, or from whom. I beg to be allowed to add, with respect to that part of Mr. Bromer's statement, that he was told that Mr. Milard had had a pistol affair with me, and that it was useless to talk of the matter further; that, 26 years ago, before I was Attorney General, I had the misfortune to be concerned in a duel with another gentleman, who was the aggressor, and whom I fought, and unfortunately wounded. Some time after the duel, a report was circulated that the pistols I had used were rifle pistols, and unfair. An investigation took place, before the Lieutenant Governor and a board of officers; and the result was, that the charge was found groundless, and the gentleman who maintained the charge was dismissed from the regiment. On the investigation, Mr. Milard and his father, who were gunsmiths at the time, and whom I employed, pretended that I knew that the pistols were unfair, for in the bills they had delivered me they had marked them as rifles, and shewed their books to that effect. I produced their own bill, which did not contain that word; and, on an inspection of their books, it was found that it had been interlined. Therefore I could have no feeling of friendship or partiality for Mr. Milard.

811. Mr. Dupré. I can confirm that from personal knowledge, having been present at the investigation.

812. Mr. Bromer. It has been stated that I applied to the Lieutenant Governor. That was subsequent to the expiration of the twelvemonths, when my chance of justice here was barred. The object for which I state this case is to shew, that the Attorney General has the power to quash any proceedings as he thinks fit.

813. It is upon his discretion that he does so?—If it is a secret discretion, and I am told that my case will be presented from Saturday to Saturday, when the party who issues those summonses knows that, from the quantity upon the list, it is impossible for the case to be heard, and yet, if we are absent, we are mulcted in the expenses of the day, it is very important that that should be known at once.

814. Mr. Le Breton.—Mr. Bromer's presence was not necessary till the Report was presented; neither had he then, nor would he at any subsequent stage of the proceedings, have incurred a single penny of expense.

JERSEY.

Mr. David Bromer.
8 September, 1846.

815. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) The Commissioners understand that it was stated to Mr. Bromer that the authorities did not consider this a criminal charge, and that he might have his bill again, for the purpose of pursuing a civil remedy?—Certainly.

816. Was that communication made early in the course of the proceedings?—I know very well that, shortly after the affair took place in Mr. Milard's shop, I went to Mr. Milard's, and saw his wife; and she told me that she was very much surprised when this bill was shewn to her; and I think she went to shew it to her husband. Whether he was in the back shop, or out of the house, I do not recollect. However, the bill was then torn. She asked the young man who brought the bill, who confirmed that he refused to mention the name; and it appeared that the bill had been drawn on the man under some rather unpleasant circumstances. She was very much annoyed at it; so that she thought she would keep the bill, or part of the bill, till she knew who had sent the young man.

817. The point which the Commissioners wish to come to is, whether the fact is that you, as the legal officer of the parish, were of opinion that that was not a ground for shaping a criminal charge.—I thought there was no foundation whatever for a criminal action; but, at the same time, I took a few notes for the purpose of making a Report in Court, if the Attorney General thought that it ought to be brought in as a criminal action. At the same time, I saw Mr. Le Breton in the presence of Mr. Bromer; and I think that Mr. Milard, on one occasion, was called. There was a sort of investigation into the case; and we were both of opinion that no criminal action could be brought forward.

818. That was communicated to Mr. Bromer?—Yes: and I told him, "you may go to the office, and get your note." For a long time I thought the note had been given back to Mr. Bromer; and so it may have been: but, perhaps a year or eighteen months after the affair, Mr Bromer came to me and asked for the note. I thought he had had the note: and I am disposed to think he has; however, he says, he has not: but I told him, at the time, if he called at the office, he would have his note immediately.

819. (To Mr. Bromer.) Is there any other case which you wish to mention to the Commissioners?—Within the last six months, a man in my employ, of the name of Thomas, who also is owner of a fly-van on his own account, in following his occupation, happened to pass by the pier. Seeing a steam boat, he offered to bring up some luggage, Mr. Chevalier met him, and asked him for half a crown.

820. Were you by?—No; but I can prove it in one instant. I applied at Thomas's house, to find him, and was told by his wife that he was in prison for half a crown. I applied at Mr. Godfray's office, the denunciateur; but he had left town. The next day, I accompanied Mr. Godfray to the prison, where I found that this man Thomas had been detained from three o'clock the preceding day to 11 o'clock the next day, without any magistrate's order whatever; that money to the amount of two pounds odd had been taken from him, which he has not yet recovered, and his keys; and that he had been liberated without knowing what the charge was against him. I have known instances of a criminal being detained ten or twelve days in prison, and then not presented at all, but discharged at the option of the police. Subsequently, in my presence, this man was seized again in Halkett Place, and presented to the Court; and then he was charged with having infringed a law whereby he had incurred a penalty of half a crown; when the Procureur Général decided that there was no such law in existence, and he was dismissed. I have since applied to Mr. Godfray, to bring an action against the centenier for the detention of this man's money, the two pounds odd, which he has not recovered to this day, and which was taken from him in prison without any magistrate's sanction whatever. I have, however, come to the determination, which his friends did, that, as the Court is now constituted, with party Judges, and that party being in power, it would be impossible, and I conscientiously believe it, to get a verdict. If it is by civil process, it would incur an expense of 15*l.* or 20*l.* There is a kind of sliding scale in the Court, by which, if an ordinary individual's word passes for one, a centenier's word passes for two, and a Judge's word for more than two.

821. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Is there any such law or practice?—Certainly not.

822. Mr. Bromer. Immediately upon this, I addressed the Secretary of State, who sent an order that no person should be put in prison without a magistrate's order. To evade that, the police now put them into the mad cells in the hospital, where they detain them for days.

823. (To the Vicomte.) Is there any such order of the Secretary of State?—I am not aware of any.

824. You are superintendent of the prison board?—Yes.

825. Mr. Bromer. I have a letter from Mr. Gardiner, stating that such an order had been received.

826. (To the Greffier.) Has any such order been registered?—No.

827. Who is it with whom it would rest to restore property taken from a person charged with an offence?

828. The Vicomte. No doubt with the Attorney General.

829. Mr. Le Breton. No; by no means.

830. Mr. Philippe W. Nicolle. I should think it would rest with the Vicomte.

831. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Supposing the Police, of which you are the head, were to take up a party, and it was thought proper to take charge of what money was upon him, in that case, if the prisoner is released, and the money turns out to be his, who is the proper authority to interfere to direct restitution to be made?—The money is never taken by the Police from a person taken to gaol, unless it may be useful for the purposes of the charge. By the prison regulations, the gaoler must take whatever money is found upon the prisoner, and must take care of it. It is in the custody of the gaoler, but not of the Police.

832. My question is rather as to the time that elapses before the person is placed in gaol. There may be forty eight hours, sometimes, before a person who is apprehended comes before the magitrate who sends him to prison. In that interval, any article which it was thought important to detain would be in the hands of the Police, I suppose.—Yes.

833. Supposing it turns out that it is not a case in which the magistrate chooses to have him sent to gaol, and therefore the gaol regulations never come into force at all, who is the officer with whom it would rest to direct restitution of the property to the party charged?—The party applies to the police officer who has taken him up; and, if he refuse, he would apply to the constable. If he refuse, the party might apply to the Attorney General.

834. Has the Attorney General any power to compel the officer to return an article which has been seized from a person?—I never knew an article which was withheld after the prosecution. I never knew an instance of an officer refusing to return an article after I had desired him to do so.

835. Mr. Bromer. It may frequently be a great object with the Police to retain in their hands the sum of money deposited with them in such a way. It may be useful to them in their business. The Police, like other people, may be in straightened circumstances.

836. (To Mr. Le Breton). Does the bail take place by an actual deposit of money?—Not always; I believe very rarely. Generally, some landed proprietor becomes bail. Mr. Le Sueur can answer that question better than I can: but, generally speaking, the name of the bail is put in the Report. I do not recollect ever having seen a Report of the Police in which the officer has stated that the sum of money had been deposited in his hands.

837. Mr. Le Sueur. Mr. Bromer has stated that the Police may have an interest in keeping the money which is deposited in their hands, because they may be straightened in their circumstances. I must say that I am not aware, though I have been for the last seven years constable of St. Héliers, that any money has ever been deposited in the hands of the Police in lieu of personal bail. It may have occurred; but I do not recollect such a thing taking place.

838. Can it be so legally?—Certainly. The money may be placed in the hands of the constable or one of the centeniers.

839. The Vicomte. It might occur where the individual was not known here.

840. Do not the Cour Royale, when they take bail, require either the bail of a landed proprietor or a deposit of money?—Yes.

841. Mr. Philippe W. Nicolle. During the whole of the time I have been centenier of St. Hélier, it has never come to my knowledge to have exacted money from any individual. I have taken bail from landed proprietors, and taken their word that they would be bail for the appearance of the parties, and their keeping the peace during a certain time. The bail is taken from the landed proprietor; and, if the party could not produce a landed proprietor, the money was lodged in the hands of one of the parties.

842. (To Mr. Romeril). In your case, the party did not deposit the money?—No; but the article which was taken from me, the stick, is now detained.

843. (To Mr. Bromer.). Is there any other case which you wish to state to the Commissioners?—I acted as reporter, at an adjourned inquest on a person of the name of Charles Popal. He was killed in a scuffle with two men of the name of Molloy and Burke, at a brothel, at an unseasonable hour.

844. When was this?—About three years ago.

845. Were you present at the inquest?—Yes, at the whole of it. The inquest was adjourned till a second day, when it was held in the prison, with closed doors, and there concluded. The whole of the witnesses are heard before the Jury, vivâ voce; but no deposition is taken upon oath. At the conclusion of this inquest, after the verdict, which affected the life or death of two individuals, remarks were made upon the indifferent evidence of one girl, whose name I forget.

846. By whom?—By the officers present. And yet, upon this testimony, the enditement was framed, which tried those two men for murder.

847. The coroner's inquest found a verdict of wilful murder, upon which the parties were tried for murder, and found guilty of manslaughter?—Yes.

848. What you complain of is that, inasmuch as the witnesses are not sworn, a man is lightly put on his trial, and that the want of an oath prevents the witnesses speaking as carefully as they otherwise would?—I presume to suggest that many of those indictments are framed, by which, more or less, a man or a woman may have their future prospects blasted by a false charge of murder being brought against them. Upon that I beg to direct the Commissioners to the fact that the evidence should be taken carefully, that men should not be charged with offences which they never committed.

849. The usual mode of proceeding in the island the Commissioners understand to be that the evidence of witnesses before the coroner's inquest is not given upon oath: that the verdict of the coroner's inquest is afterwards recorded in Court; and that the party is then tried. Before he can be criminally indited, the evidence must be given upon oath?—The police jury having found Mrs. Le Gendre guilty, and the grand jury having acquitted her subsequently, caused a certain individual or individuals to placard the whole of the names of that jury about the town, to heap odium and disgrace upon them: and, while from party principles men are liable to that (and it could be easily traced, and I believe sprang from official sources), it is very dangerous for a party here to run the risk of a trial for life or death. That was done: the names were placarded; and they were torn down and replaced.

850. The coroner's inquest does not place the party in a worse situation than he would be without it?—It places him in the position of being charged for murder, when, if the case went before the magistrate or any one competent to examine the parties on oath, it would prevent his being charged for murder, he having only committed manslaughter.

851. Have you any further suggestion to offer?—I have only to refer the Commissioners to the circumstance, which I have mentioned, the placarding the names of the grand jury when they differ from the inferior jury. That must be with the knowledge of the authorities.

John Hammond, Esq.

John Hammond, Esq., further examined.

852. You wish to express your opinion upon some points given in evidence yesterday?—The point upon which Mr. Dupré, and afterwards Mr. Godfray, spoke, was with reference to the two juries in our criminal procedure. As far as my experience goes, I would consider, assuming that a previous examination took place before committal, that the first jury, called the enditement, is quite superfluous, and I think injurious to the proper administration of criminal justice.

853. When you say a previous examination, you mean a previous examination on oath?—Yes. For the ends of justice generally, I am speaking, and also in fairness to those who have to declare and give a verdict respecting the person charged. In the present instance (that is as regards the evidence), as the Commissioners are aware, those who have to pronounce upon the accusation never see any of the witnesses.

854. You would not only have the depositions taken on oath, but also the witnesses called in person?—Yes, before the Court, so as to be present when the jury is assembled, and with the right on the part of the members of the jury to question, or cause such questions to be put as the examination that is then passing before them may suggest.

855. Do you agree with Mr. Godfray's opinion, that the grande enquête, or whatever you may call the final jury, would be more prejudiced against a person by knowing the fact that a magistrate had thought it a fit case for trial, than that a previous jury had thought the man guilty?—No: I do not see that that would affect their judgment. I think it would be a disadvantage, if the magistrate were to sit again in judgment; but I do not think that his having heard evidence and decided as to whether there should or should not be a trial would affect the decision of those gentlemen composing the grande enquête, or the final jury.

856. What do you think as to the effect, in the present case, of the final jury knowing that a previous jury has heard both sides, and found the man Guilty? Has that any effect upon their minds, in your opinion?—I do not know whether it has much: but I think, oftentimes, the two juries are put in a very invidious position, as regards each other, more or less, from the fact that they may render different verdicts: and, after all, they do so upon the same evidence. But persons do not take into consideration that in one case it is a mere majority, in the other it requires twenty out of twenty four: but, both being recorded, it is rather an anomaly, I consider, in our criminal procedure.

857. You are aware that, according to the ordinary system, as it prevails in England, the evidence that is given vivâ voce is taken down in writing by the Judge, and read, if the jury desire it, either in part or all through, as they please?—The Judge takes down the evidence.

858. That is added to the fact of their seeing the witness?—Yes; which is, of course, very important and essential.

859. You were saying, there would be a discrepancy in the verdict, in case of a person being found Guilty by the enditement and being acquitted by the grande enquête. The verdict of the enditement is recorded?—It is.

860. Supposing a prisoner to be found Guilty by the enditement, and afterwards acquitted by the grande enquête, would not the facts stand in this way:—out of a jury of thirteen seven find him Guilty, and out of a jury of twenty four five find him innocent?—Yes.

861. Would not the result of that be, upon the record of the Court, that a greater number found him Guilty, and yet the man is acquitted?—Yes.

862. Supposing the jury to be equally impartial, and equally capable of discharging the functions of jurymen?—Yes.

863. So that a person, looking to the record, would find that, notwithstanding the acquittal, the majority had thought him Guilty?—It might be so; it is not necessarily recorded; but that is one of the great contradictions which are to be remarked in our system.

864. Five might find him innocent out of twenty four, and seven find him guilty out of thirteen?—Yes. In the first judgment, there might be six to declare a man innocent, and yet he might be hanged upon that judgment, if he did not appeal. It appears to me that it is very much to be deprecated, having two verdicts under such circumstances.

865. Does that strike you as an objection to the proceedings before the enditement?—I think the recording of both, which is necessary in the present mode of proceeding, is a very great objection. I consider, if the rolls of our Criminal Court were perfect, they would only record those who were guilty persons; but here there might be a person declared Not guilty, and yet there stands for ever in the record, without the possibility of erasing it, a declaration of his being guilty. It is true you might find another Acte, if you chose to go on looking into the Court Rolls; but it is not less true, that there it remains.

866. Might not the observation just made be made by anybody on seeing the two Acts?—It might.

887. And it might be thrown in the teeth of an individual?—It might.

888 Does it strike you as an objection to the enditement, that it is composed of the Police?—I consider that a decided disadvantage, for this reason: that, although the constable, or other police officer, who has either arrested the individual or assisted in the arrest of the individual, will not be a juryman, because in all probability he will be heard as a witness to state the facts which have come to his knowledge, still it is scarcely possible but that some of those who have been so employed must necessarily have had some communication with their fellow police officers from the necessity of the thing; and therefore their minds, before they come as jurymen, are perhaps pre-engaged with the representations or circumstances which have been told them out of Court; and the evidence on oath cannot altogether destroy the impression. I think it could scarcely be expected to destroy altogether the impressions which had been made by those communications which they had heard. I can scarcely quote a case, unless one of very minor importance, in which the members of the Police could abstain from making remarks upon the case among themselves, being in the habit of meeting much more frequently perhaps than other persons, and also having the knowledge that they are to be judges, not being like the grande enquête, who are only called the night before, and consequently do not know that they will necessarily be the judges to decide and give a verdict upon the case.

869. Does not the constable elect such of the Police as he chooses to constitute the enditement?—Yes. He gets an order from the Procureur Général to state, you are to appear in Court to preside, and to have the necessary persons to compose that enditement.

870. Does it also strike you as an objection to the enditement, that the constable should have the right of selecting what police officers he chooses to compose the enditement?—If the enditement is retained, I think that is of very little moment, because he has to select but from a comparatively small number, and very often that number is very much curtailed, from the fact that many may be required as witnesses.

871. You are assuming, now, that, if the enditement is retained, you also would retain that feature which relates to its constitution by the Police?—Yes. I am arguing upon it as it is at present. But, even assuming that it were not composed of the members of the Police, but that thirteen men were chosen indifferently, and perhaps in the same mode as the jury of appeal, still I think it would not at all tend to the ends of justice.

872. Supposing the enditement and the grande enquête to be selected upon the same principle, do you see the advantage of there being two juries?—I do not see the advantage of the two juries.

873. That is, not two juries to try the guilt or innocence of the prisoners?—That is what I mean: a jury before committal would be quite a different thing. Either a jury, or a magistrate, a jury, I think, might be very beneficial in that way: but that would be upon another principle altogether.

784. Would not the argument in favour of two juries apply with equal force to three?—It appears to me that two juries who have to try the prisoner are a disadvantage; but I do not say that two juries would not be advantageous in this way, that is to say, if the first jury were to examine merely to commit, or to say whether a person should be tried or not. But the having two juries, upon whose verdict a man might receive sentence, I think is decidedly disadvantageous and detrimental.

875. Do any other objections to the proceeding by the enditement occur to you?—Nothing strikes my mind just now.

876. The Commissioners have heard evidence from some other gentlemen, that the Police are more or less a party body. Do you agree in that opinion of the Police?—I should say that the Police are more or less so: but it is right to say, not as a body throughout the island. They are not all of the same party: but I think they generally act as a body in different parishes.

877. Does that strike you as objectionable?—I think that certainly is an objection. It is decidedly disadvantageous in the case of persons who have to sit as a jury, and who know beforehand that they must alway be the jury in point of fact.

888. Does any remark occur to you upon the evidence that has been given?—I think our mode of rating now is decidedly objectionable.

879. You agree with what has been said by the Solicitor General upon that point?—Yes. I think it ought to be the property, and not the person, that ought to be rated. That has been a matter which has been often controverted and mooted between us; and I think the more the matter is considered, most persons will see that the advantage will be to rate the real property merely, and that the property should be appraised by independent persons: that is, persons should appraise in that part of the island where they had no interest; and then the property would be rated, and there would be no fear whatever of any kind of partiality arising from party or other motives, because the property would be rated, and it might fall into the hands of two or three persons in rotation, who might hold different opinions. I think it would be a most desirable thing.

Robert Pipon Marett, Esq. (Advocate), examined.

Robert P. Marett, Esq.

800. The Commissioners understand you wish to address some observations to them on the subject which has been before them?—It is particularly with respect to the two juries. It appears to me that, as matters now stand, the enditement is perfectly useless, because, no evidence whatever being taken before the grande enquête, the grande enquête is merely a jury of appeal.

881. You say the grande enquête is only a jury of appeal. I understand that fresh evidence is on some occasions introduced?—I am aware of one instance, in which I myself was concerned. I pleaded for a criminal before the enditement, and he was found Guilty: "plutôt coupable qu' innocent," was the form of the verdict. In the interval which elapsed between the trial before the enditement, and the trial before the grande enquête, I was informed that a person who had not been heard before the enditement was able to give evidence which was likely to be of service to the prisoner. I therefore notified to the Procureur Général that I was desirous of having this man called before the grande enquête; and, though the Procureur

Général differed from me as to the power I had of so doing, he nevertheless consented to summon the individual.

882. He denied it as matter of right, but granted it as matter of favour.—He acted with the utmost impartiality. He ordered the man to be summoned; and he accordingly appeared before the Court. On his name being called, the Procureur Général objected to his evidence, stating that it was not usual, and that such a practice would lead to much inconvenience. I naturally endeavoured to support my view of the matter: and in so doing I quoted a passage out of Mr. Le Geyt's manuscripts, by which it appeared that, though it was not usual, yet still such a course had been occasionally followed. Upon this the Court, by a simple majority only (if I recollect rightly, they were not unanimous at any rate), decided that the witness should be heard; and he was accordingly examined. I believe that most of the other advocates differed from me in their view of this matter; but, having the opinion of Mr. Le Geyt, who is considered a great authority in this island, in my favour, and thinking besides it could never be too late on the score of humanity to bring evidence in favour of an individual, I determined to try the question; and in this case it was decided in my favour. But I believe that will be found to be the only instance which has occurred within probably the last fifty years: and therefore it can hardly be affirmed that witnesses are examined, or can be examined, before the grande enquête. Several of the Jurats were of a different opinion; and I believe a simple majority alone decided in my favour. And it is possible, if the question were tried on a future occasion, that judgment might be reversed.

883. Was the form of examining this new witness the same?—Exactly. The deposition was taken in writing.

884. The gentlemen who were to try the case heard him examined?—Yes; but the deposition was taken down in writing, and subsequently read to him. It was conducted in the same manner as before the enditement.

885. The enditement does not hear the witnesses?—No. It so happened that they were present; but, otherwise, the jury addressed no question to the prisoner. The examination was conducted in precisely the same manner, with this difference, that the jury were present: but this was altogether an accidental circumstance, as it were; and therefore it could not be considered as a variation from the practice.

886. If it were finally established that the right existed, the grande enquête would hardly be summoned till after the evidence was taken?—Exactly so; so much so that in this case I conceive the Procureur Général would have had the option of dismissing the grande enquête and calling other witnesses, in order to rebut the declaration of the witness produced by the prisoner. Therefore it appears to me to prove clearly that the presence of the grande enquête is not essential to the business, and that in every thing the examination was similar to that which might have taken place before the enditement. But this case may be considered unique.

887. You say it was possible, if the question were to arise again, that the decision might be reversed. Would the same Court reverse a decision to which they had solemnly come?—It might occur in this way, without accusing any gentleman of inconsistency in his opinion.

888. Might it happen that the decision of the Cour Royale might be reversed by the Cour Royale?—So far as that, I consider this would not be so entirely binding upon them as to oblige them to do it on a future occasion. There have been many cases in which judgments have been reversed. I mean that a judgment contradictory to a former judgment has been given.

889. The Commissioners hear that the precedents of the Court form the law of the Court. Would not this, having been established by the judgment of the Court, be the law of the Court?—Precedents, I think, cannot be considered as forming the law of the Court; but they form a certain rule by which they generally guide themselves; but they cannot be considered as an authority binding upon their consciences. If there have been three or four judgments of this kind, for instance, most of the Jurats, I believe, would consider that they were in some measure bound by these judgments as having been sanctioned by long practice, and by the experience of several persons: but I think that the Jurats would not be bound, and certainly they are not bound, to conform themselves to those decisions, if the reasons, which are subsequently produced to them, appear to them strong enough to overrule the precedent.

890. Would you understand the fresh decision to be in the nature of an overruling?—It would be in some measure overruling a previous judgment, that another decision would be given in direct contradiction to the former one.

891. Supposing this to take place, that there is a decision in favour of the hearing of a witness after the proceedings by the enditement are closed, such as you have mentioned, and, subsequently to that, there takes place a decision that witnesses should not be heard after the proceedings of the enditement are closed, what opinion would you give, as a lawyer, as to the law with regard to the hearing of fresh evidence before the grande enquête?—I would certainly consider the last judgment as preferable to the former one, as having more weight: but that would not prevent my trying the question again, because I consider that a judgment of this kind, founded upon no positive law, which it does not appear to be in this case, is not so far binding upon an advocate as to prevent his trying the question anew. But it is probable, if a judgment happened to be given by the great majority of the Court, or by their unanimous decision, the Judges would follow that. In this case, however, it was only the opinion of the majority; and therefore the question appeared to be doubtful.

892. Is there any entry, in the acts of the Court, as to the particular members of the Court who come to any decision?—It is always mentioned whether it is by a majority or not.

893. That is, by a simple majority or unanimously, or by a majority of two-thirds?—It is generally mentioned what the majority is.

894. Mr. Dupré. When the Court is unanimous, it is mentioned that it is so; when they are not unanimous, it is mentioned that the Court has ruled so and so.

895. Vicomte. And sometimes by a majority.

896. Mr. Marett. I believe I could show instances where the Court has said "par majorité," and sometimes "par balance de jurés."

897. Mr. Dupré. You will find more than one instance where a witness has been heard before the grande enquête, who was not heard before the enditement.

898. Mr. Marett. I did not affirm that as a fact. I said that, to my knowledge, I was not aware that any cases had taken place within the last fifty years.

899. (To Mr. Marett.) Supposing a decision had been come to by the unanimous opinion of the whole Court, would it then have been such a decision as would have been binding upon future Courts?—I consider it would then have very great weight; but I cannot state certainly that it is binding upon them: for I know no law or enactment which binds them to follow any such decision. By their oaths they are bound to give a decision according to their consciences. It may very well happen that a man may differ from another Jurat, who has given a judgment before him; but in a case of practice particularly, where a judgment has been given by the unanimous decision of the Court, it is generally held to be binding upon the Court.

900. The language we hold in England is, that it is evidence of the law, but not the law. A Judge, in over-ruling a precedent, does not imagine he is altering the law, but he says, I think they misunderstood the law, and the evidence, strong as it is, does not quite convince me in this particular case?—Those decisions serve as guides to the Judges who are called to try questions.

901. What you are saying would not apply to the particular instance before us: but you think that all questions which come before the Court would be questions which would be capable of being reviewed by another Court in the manner you have stated.

902. Mr. Le Sueur. A part of the Jurat's oath is that he will observe "les coutumes et usages."

903. Mr. Marett. I do not know how far a matter that has been established by one or two decisions could be called either "coutumes" or "usages." I am sure the judgments of the Court are not considered as binding, though they no doubt have a great influence upon the subsequent decisions of the Judges. I endeavour to use those expressions in as strict a sense as possible. By law I mean what is binding upon the decision and conscience of the individual; but I cannot consider any previous decision of any number of Jurats to be binding upon his conscience.

904. They would not form a strict rule of law, which they would be obliged to follow?—I cannot consider it so; and I believe I am borne out by the practice of the Court. It appears to me that the enditement was originally intended as a jury of examination, as in fact a substitute for a committing judge, but that, owing to changes which have taken place in the lapse of time, it has altogether deviated from its original purpose: from being a simple inquiry or a jury of inquiry or investigation into a crime, it has become a jury giving a recorded verdict. In my humble opinion, it appears that the use of two juries, giving both of them recorded verdicts, is of very questionable utility. Though I have examined the question with some attention, I have never yet been able to perceive that the advantage which resulted from the use of those two juries compensated for the loss of time which they occasioned. It appears to me that the grande enquête affords such immense advantages to a prisoner, from the circumstance of which the Commissioners are no doubt aware, that five of its members are sufficient to acquit a prisoner; that the prisoner has every possible guarantee of his acquittal, if really innocent. I think, then, that it would be useful to dispense with the enditement, at least in the stage of the business which it now occupies. Perhaps, if it were modified as to its composition, it might be usefully restored to the purposes which I believe it held formerly in criminal proceedings; by which I mean it might be used as a jury of examination, that a prisoner might be brought before this jury as soon as possible after his having been seized by the Police, that witnesses might then be examined vivâ voce before this jury upon oath, and upon both sides, both in favour of the prisoner, and in support of the charge, and their verdict, which it appears to me need not be recorded, but merely noted and authenticated by the signature of the greffier or the clerk of the Court, would serve as the committal of the prisoner, who would then be sent to be tried before the Court.

905. It would not be necessary to take their verdict upon his guilt or innocence, but upon the question whether he should be tried or not?—Just so.

906. That is the real meaning of the word "criminellement endité?"—Yes. But it would be really an indictment, because he would be indicted in consequence of that declaration.

907. Do you find, in the Coustumier, or in any commentator upon the customs of Normandy, any trace of the enditement?—In Rouillé, I believe, you will.

998. Can you refer us to anything in Rouillé?—Not at this moment. I can upon a future occasion. If I recollect rightly, I have seen in Rouillé several passages which appear to bear upon this question. I might also refer you to the work of Messrs. Hémery and Dumaresq, and to the Report which Mr. Dumaresq, then an eminent advocate of this Court, drew up in favour of a proposition for the establishment of juries.

909. Can you furnish the Commissioners with that document?—I think I shall be able to procure it for them.

910. In the case you propose, it still would not be the same thing as an English grand jury, because they only hear enough for sending down the charge to the petty jury, and they do not hear the evidence for the prisoner. Have you looked to the evidence before our Criminal Law Commission on the subject of our grand jury?—No; I have not.

JERSEY.

Robert P. Marett. Esq.

911. You will oblige the Commissioners by giving them a reference to any part of the commentary referred to, which shews the origin of the enditement?—I shall have much pleasure in pointing out what I consider to do so. What I mention upon this subject has been derived from a variety of sources.

912. What has at present occurred to you is, that the verdict of the enditement should be given after hearing the evidence on both sides, vivâ voce, which should be taken down?—I meant that the verdict should not be recorded in the book and preserved.

913. Would you have the evidence taken and preserved?—When I explain my meaning further, the Commissioners will see that that is not necessary. I look upon this as a preliminary investigation, that the Procureur Général may have some authority for prosecuting, and to prevent an innocent man being brought before the Courts, and subjected to a long imprisonment, and be otherwise much annoyed, without the fault of any of the authorities, but owing to a defect in the system, from not having any preliminary examination before the trial is proceeded with. That I consider to be a very great defect in our present system, and certainly one which does call for a remedy. It appears to me that, after the enditement has so given its verdict, and the trial has been proceeded with, it might be then useful to continue the system of information which is now in use in Jersey. I am aware that there are some objections to the proceedings; and I am also aware that many persons in this island, for whose knowledge and superior experience I have a very great deference, are of opinion that it might be advantageously dispensed with; but it appears to me that, in so doing, though it might be possible to save a little time, yet it would be, as I conceive, at the expense of justice, and, in many cases, it would expose the prisoner to be condemned and punished, and perhaps to lose his life, on insufficient evidence. And I cannot consider that any lapse of time, weighed in the balance against a man's life, is worthy of the least consideration. I think, on the one hand, it would be proper, no doubt, to curtail the power which the Procureur Général and the prisoner now possess of calling witnesses, ad infinitum, and therefore of lengthening the proceedings at their will; but, at the same time, I cannot but consider it useful that the prisoner should have the power of hearing every particle of evidence brought against him, and afterwards of calling witnesses to rebut that evidence. It would be proper, I conceive, that the Procureur Général should then be allowed to call other witnesses in order to disprove any part of the evidence which had been brought forward in favour of the prisoner, or to prove that his witnesses were unworthy of credit; and that the prisoner should be allowed to bring forward witnesses to support the declaration of his former witnesses; and that the hearing of the evidence should stop there. But, within those limits, I certainly think that the mode of information contributes essentially to the furtherance of justice, provided always that the same witnesses who have been heard by information, and whose evidence had been written down, should be called again before the grande enquête, and there subjected to whatever examination, vivâ voce, the Crown officers, the advocate of the prisoner, or the jurymen themselves, might think proper.

914. If the Commissioners understand you rightly, you do not propose that the corpus testimonii should be given in the presence of the grande enquête, but simply that the evidence previously given should be read over, and that then they might ask any questions about it.—I mean that the evidence should be first taken down in writing; but, as it happens that what appears important to one man does not to another, a juryman may not be satisfied with evidence which may be satisfactory to the other jurymen, or to the Procureur Général, or to the prisoner. It may be proper, therefore, to bring witnesses before them in order to give them an opportunity of examining those witnesses upon those further points, and at the same time to enable the advocate of the prisoner, if he had any reason to doubt the truthfulness of any witness, to question him severely, and to point out to the jury what circumstances had occurred to shake the credibility of that witness. And it seems to me that you would secure more advantages by having written evidence, and would avoid the danger of judging of the guilt or innocence of a man upon insufficient data, because it is well known, and the Commissioners must have observed it themselves in their own practice, that juries, being chosen from the mass of the inhabitants, are generally composed of men who are not accustomed to sift evidence, or to take notes rapidly, and therefore many observations may escape them which it is of importance they should recollect. The written evidence, it appears to me, therefore, would supply the place of notes to them; and the examination of the witnesses before them would supply a defect which now exists in our system in the want of vivâ voce evidence.

915. They would not have notes as to the result of the cross questioning?—As that would be directed to a few points alone, they would recollect them, in all probability.

916. Do you think you could restrain a dexterous counsel from going over the whole case again under such a system?—I think it would do away with the great evil of cross questioning, which has not only the effect of puzzling the Court, but of puzzling the jury. The written evidence would serve as data to the jury, as something to go by: and, their attention being directed to particular points in this evidence, they would recollect what they had elicited, or what had been elicited by others vivâ voce. But, if they had no written evidence whatever, or little of it, and that little perhaps taken by a Judge, I cannot consider evidence of that kind equal to the evidence taken in the presence of the witness, and which is exposed to be criticised by him and corrected if found wrong; because it must be recollected that the evidence taken down by a Judge, though no doubt, from his very position, it is to be supposed that he will not abuse his power, but will take it down as correctly as possible, is still ex parte evidence; and, as every man is liable to be deceived and to commit errors, evidence so taken down I cannot think to be of the same value as that to which I have been referring.

JERSEY.

Robert P. Marett, Esq.

8 September, 1846.

917. How do you mean ex parte evidence?—Those notes are taken without being read to the witness, without being subject to be canvassed by him.

918. It is a version which the witness has not acknowledged as his own?—No: nor has the prisoner had the power of criticizing it; nevertheless, it has great weight with the jury. Every man, we know, is liable to inattention; he may sometimes omit something, and sometimes he may misapprehend some statement; whereas, when the evidence may be sifted by all parties, from the clashing of opinions truth will result. I think, therefore, the evidence, taken before the Judge by a third party, read aloud to all parties, would be much more worthy of credit, and much better in every point of view, than mere notes taken by a Judge.

919. That might be provided for by the officer of the Court taking down the whole of the proceedings, and that record being put into the hands of the jury at the end of the trial.—If it be read aloud as soon as taken, allowing the prisoner to criticize it, it is immaterial in what way the evidence is taken.

920. You suggest that the only points as to which the witness should give vivâ voce evidence before the grande enquête should be points which the prisoner's counsel, or the counsel for the prosecution, upon looking to the written evidence, thinks it material to examine him to. Where all the evidence is vivâ voce, that which very much guides the counsel, in his cross examination, is the tone and manner with which the original corpus testimonii has been given: but that the counsel would scarcely have so good an opportunity of seeing in the case to which you refer.—Perhaps not: but I must allow that I consider that cross questioning, on very many occasions, is quite as likely to mislead the jury as to enlighten them; because, though undoubtedly this harsh and rapid questioning may occasionally terrify a person intending to deceive, it will have very frequently, I may even say it will generally have, the effect of so far disturbing the equanimity of a conscientious witness, and perhaps the more so in proportion to his conscientiousness, that he will be led into contradicting himself, and appear perjured when he is only suffering under the effects of fright.

921. It is found by experience that the oldest counsel attempt to try that experiment much less than younger ones do.—I have seen instances of women, particularly, brought before the Court, whose morality was unquestioned, and who, no doubt, if they had been cross questioned rather severely, might have been brought to contradict every portion of their evidence.

922. Does not the proposition which you make leave it totally in the discretion of the counsel for the prisoner or for the prosecution to open the whole of the proceedings by vivâ voce examination; because he must judge what he thinks it necessary to examine to, and he may think it necessary, so judging, to go through the whole of the case again? That will be in the discretion of the counsel for the prosecution, or in the discretion of the counsel for the defence. Would not the consequence of what you propose, therefore, come to this, that there would be a trial before the grande enquête totally vivâ voce?—This evidence would easily be checked by the written evidence.

923. The counsel for the prosecution, or the counsel for the defence, might call upon any witness who had given his testimony, and whose testimony had been given in writing, to give that testimony over again before the grande enquête, saying—"It is essential for my client that this man should be examined before you." Would not the effect, therefore be to have a complete trial over again before the grande enquête?—It might occasionally: but still, in cases where a counsel was aware, from the manner in which a witness had deposed to his evidence which was taken down in writing, that it was hardly possible to shake his testimony, I should hardly suppose he would attempt to question him again, and perhaps elicit something more detrimental to his client than before. But, even allowing every latitude to the counsel, and supposing that he would avail himself of this opportunity of going over the case again, it appears to me the scheme would present this advantage, that you would have, on the one hand, the evidence given against the prisoner taken quietly and calmly when they knew what they were about, and you would have the evidence taken vivâ voce; and the jury, comparing the evidence so taken calmly with the appearance of the witnesses when examined vivâ voce, might be more likely to come to a true conclusion than if they merely heard the evidence taken in one way.

924. You are trying to unite the advantages of both systems?—As it is said of an ancient nation, that they discussed a matter both drunk and sober, so, by taking the evidence in both ways, you might arrive probably at the truth, while a great guarantee would be afforded to a prisoner that the men who would be called upon to judge him would have certain documents upon which they could rely.

925. You are probably aware that, to a great extent, that is now done: that the whole case against a prisoner, and some part of it for him, is taken down in writing, and is presented to the Court, and can be used to check witnesses by, and also that the first evidence given vivâ voce is given in answer to what may be called a friendly examination.—I am endeavouring to state how far the present system might be modified, so as to remedy its defects, and yet retain what is useful in it; because, in making any reform, it appears desirable, as far as possible, to keep the outline of the previous institutions, because they are more easily worked when those who have to carry them out are accustomed to a part of the system. Therefore, if it is possible to modify our system so as to retain its prominent features while you remedy its crying defects, I consider it would be more beneficial than a total change, as there are many features in our system which are most sound and just, and contribute to the ends of justice, in my humble opinion, which might be retained, while whatever is known to work ill might be removed.

Mr. Le Cras.

926. The Commissioners understand you wish to address some observations to them.—The observation I wish to make is with respect to the precedents which Mr. Marett was speaking of.

JERSEY.

Mr. Le Cras.
8 September, 1846.

I wish to direct the Commissioners' particular attention to the latter part of the oath which the jurats take. I understand in the English language it runs thus:—"You shall conform yourself to the more wholesome and better advice of the Bailiff and other Jurats;" and Le Geyt, and all the other commentators, have held that to mean that the Jurats are bound to adopt the opinions of the majority of the twelve; that there must be seven Jurats of the same opinion, so as to form a precedent; in other words, that no decision amounts to a precedent, unless there are seven Jurats of the same opinions, and then that the precedent is evidence of what the law is.

927. According to the strongest interpretation which you appear to be suggesting, it would be more than evidence even; it would actually be the law.—That is the way they lay it down; that seven Jurats must concur, and that, unless seven Jurats are of the same opinion, it does not amount to a precedent. It is only of late years that the full Court has been formed of seven Jurats. In ancient days, it was necessary that there must be a sufficient number of Jurats present, so as to allow seven to be of the same opinion; and that number has been progressively reduced.

928. (To Mr. Marett.) In one of the statements drawn up by Dumaresq, or by Pipon and Durel, they give instances of the enditement having consisted of the number of six.—Yes; in ancient days six was the number very frequently.

929. Are there any traces of the period when the number became twelve?

930. Mr. Le Cras. Le Geyt gives his account of it as being in 1640.

931. Mr. Marett. Till of late years there was very great irregularity in the use of the enditement.

932. Vicomte. I have here a note of mine, of the effect of certain decisions in 1607 and in 1611; that, if the six sworn jurymen vary, there may be twelve required for the enditement, or even fourteen.

933. Mr. Le Cras. There is one other observation which I wish to make; and that is, that, as regards the mode of taking evidence in writing, there is no security for the person's life.

934. What is the objection to it?—Because the evidence is not sworn to, after it is written, and because the alterations and interlineations of the depositions are not verified by the witnesses.

935. Are they not read to them afterwards?—Yes: but the alterations are not verified. The erasures and interlineations, there is no knowing when they were made.

936. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Greffier.) I suppose there can be no difficulty in your producing the records of such evidence before us.—No.

937. Mr. Le Cras. In a recent case, on examining the depositions of a witness, I discovered that a very grave alteration had been made. It was in the case of Nicolle.

938. What is the date of that?—A few months ago.

939. Deputy Vicomte. It was tried in last March.

940. Mr. Le Cras. A witness deposed that the prisoner had been in a scuffle, and that he desired the assailant to desist from striking the prisoner and he did desist; which showed provocation, but that line was struck out; and it was made to appear that the witness deposed that he desired the assailant not to strike him, and he did not. I would strongly suggest to the Commissioners that they should examine those depositions, to see the manner in which they are written.

Mr. Le Cras.
10 September, 1846.

941. Have you any further observations which you wish to make to the Commissioners?—I wish to direct the attention of the Commissioners to the law of 1840, for enlarging the powers of the police; in which they will find that the vingteniers have the power to seize parties for violent assaults.

942. That is in case of flagrant délit?—Yes.

943. Was that made law for the first time in 1840, or was it an old law?—It was a new law.

944. Mr. Le Breton. The powers were extended by the law of 1840.

945. Mr. Le Cras. I wish also to state that, as the Procureur Général has observed that he had deferred entering a prosecution against the police till after the cause en ajonction had been heard, and as the party had appealed only against the damages and not against the merits of the case, considering the great difficulty there is to obtain a full Court here, owing to the multifarious occupations of some jurats and the infirmities of others, it might be some eight or ten years before the case is finally disposed of. There are several cases of appeals that have lasted as long as that.

946. In a case of cause en ajonction, what is the appeal?—It is an appeal to the full Bench. Consequently, if the Procureur Général has to wait till the case is disposed of, the witnesses may be dead, the Procureur Général may be dead, and the right of prosecution may have expired.

947. I understand your present evidence to be addressed to this, as shewing that it is not judicious to exercise a discretion by deferring an ex officio information till the cause en ajonction, which is connected with it, has been disposed of?—Yes: and the witnesses may be dead. I wish to show that there should be some other means.

948. Is the evidence taken in writing, in a cause en ajonction?—No; it is not, unfortunately.

949. So that there would be no record of the evidence?—No.

950. It is not like the proceedings in a case strictly criminal, which goes to the enditement?—There was no evidence in this case. The facts were admitted.

951. In the event of there having been evidence, there would be no record of that evidence kept in the Court?—There might be.

952. Is it necessary that the evidence should be taken down in writing?—Not when the party has admitted the facts.

953. Is not the admission taken down?—It is: it is made a record. But the party admits only so far as he is concerned: he might not admit the facts as regards the Police.

954. Then there would be no record as regards them?—No. Consequently, I wish to show the necessity, for the interests of justice, that there should be some other channel opened for the punishment of a dereliction of duty on the part of persons who hold public offices.

955. You mean analogous to the right, on the other side of the water, of an individual to bring a case before the grand jury?—Certainly. I have, therefore, to beg of the Commissioners that they would ascertain what is the state of the law, and what measures ought to be adopted to enable parties who have suffered, or who may hereafter suffer, any oppressions of that kind, to bring their cases either by indictment or information before Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench in England: otherwise there will be no means of redress opened. There are, at present, a great many difficulties in the way of instituting proceedings. We have no commissioner to take affidavits. There is an Act of Parliament of the 42nd of George the 3rd chapter 85, passed for the purpose of facilitating the trial of persons holding public stations, offices or employments out of Great Britain. I wish the Commissioners to ascertain whether that Act extends to this island, and, if not, to suggest such means as shall make it extend to it, because there may be some legal obstructions in the way possibly of the service of a writ, so that individuals living in Jersey may have the same guarantee for their lives and liberties, and the same remedies for the punishment of all oppression, as they would have if they were living in England; for it would appear at present that there is no remedy. I have suffered great oppression from persons holding public offices; and hitherto there has been no redress for it.

956. You wish to ascertain whether there be any means of trying in England a public officer who neglects his duty here, or improperly refuses to perform his duty, or performs it in an improper way.—Yes. If there is not, I beg leave to suggest to the Commissioners that means should be devised so as to give parties an opportunity of invoking the power of the Court of Queen's Bench in England. There are some legal obstructions at present to the service of writs of that nature. An order in Council, which had been repealed, had been surreptitiously introduced into the Code of 1771. The order in Council is the 21st of May, 1679. It had been repealed before the Code was formed; and it was surreptitiously restored, and was inserted in the Code.

957. What is the article to which you refer?—It will be found in page 159. That Order in Council had been repealed.

958. And the Code restores the Order in Council which had been repealed, without any notice of the repeal?—Yes; but I beg leave to direct the attention of the Commissioners to a rider at the end of the Code, the very last article, which provides that any Orders of the King in Council that had not been inserted in the said Code should nevertheless have force, and that, if any such Orders had been inserted as had been repealed, they should be null and void.

959. It does not lay down any alternative, does it? It says, simply, it is not to repeal any laws established by Royal authority which had not previously been repealed?—It provides that, if anything should be inserted in the Code which had been repealed, the same should be of no force and effect.

960. The Act of 1679 says that "the laws and privileges of the isle are confirmed as of old, and no orders, warrants or letters, of whatsoever nature they may be, shall be put in force in the Island before they have been presented at the Royal Court in order to be registered and published; and, in case such orders, warrants or letters shall be found contrary to the charters and privileges, and onerous to the Island, the registration, the execution and the publication of them may be suspended by the Court till the case has been represented to His Majesty, in order that his good pleasure may be signified thereupon.—That was repealed by the subsequent Order of the 17th of December of the same year.

961. You say that the Order which I have just read has been repealed by a subsequent Order?—Yes, on the 17th of December of the same year.

962. Where is that to be found?—In the Rolls of the Court.

963. The Vicomte. The following is the Order of the 17th December, 1679.

"At the Court at Whitehall, the 17th December, 1679, present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty, His Highness Prince Rupert, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Duke of Lauderdale, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Bridgwater, Earl of Sunderland, Earl of Essex, Earl of Bath, Earl of Halifax, Viscount Fauconberg, Lord Cavendish, Lord Bishop of London, Mr. Hyde, Lord Chief Justice Booth, Sir Henry Capell, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Thomas Chicheley, Mr. Seymour, Mr. Powle. Upon reading this day in Council the Report from the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of this Board for the affairs of Jersey in hæc verbâ:—May it please Your most sacred Majesty, In obedience to your Majesty's Order in Councill of the 31st of October last, referring unto us the considera$^{on}$ of the differences between Sir John Lainer, k$^{nt}$, Governor of Your Ma$^{ty}$ Island of Jersey, and the Bailiff and Jurates of that Island, touching certain priviledges granted unto the mby an Order of Your Majesty in Council of the 21st May last:—Wee have spent severall days in hearing all parties concerned, as likewise the Commissioners of Your Ma$^{y}$ Customes, and do find: That the said Order was obteyned at this Board, without consulting either the Governor of the said Island or the Officers of Your Ma$^{ty}$ Customes, and that several parts thereof (if put in execution) would be prejudicial both to Your Majesty's authority there and to the revenue of your Customes, and the trade of this Kingdome: so that it is our humble opinion that the said order be recalled, and, instead thereof, that Your Ma$^{ty}$ would be pleased to command That all orders, warrants or letters, relating to the publicq justice of the said Island, either coming from Your Ma$^{ty}$ or this Board, which are to be a standing rule for their proceedings, be registered in the Royall Court of that Island before they be put in execution, and that there be a clause in every such order, warrant or letter, requiring the regist$^{y}$ thereof accordingly. Neverthelesse, as to such other warrants, letters or orders as Your Ma$^{ty}$ or this Board shal send and judge fit to be executed without registry, no registry shall be thereof without special direction in that behalf; and, as to Acts of Parliament wherein that Island is named, or any words conteined, that Your Ma$^{ty}$ wilbe pleased to direct that such Acts of Parliament, so soon as they are printed, be transmitted to that Island, with an order of Your Privy Councill annexed, directing the registring and publication thereof. And, to the end that due certificates may be returned from the said Island of the landing of such goods and comoditys, and in such manner, as have been yearly allowed to the inhabitants for the supply of that Island, Wee are of opinion, That the Lords Commission$^{rs}$ of the Treasury, or the Lord Treasurer for the time being, do nominate an officer to be appointed and authorized, by order of Your Maj$^{y}$ in Councill, to signe and sealle certificates of the landing of such comoditys, to be returned hither for the discharge of the securitys here given: and that the said goods and comoditys be all shipped from Yo$^{r}$ Maj$^{y}$ port of Southampton onely, except coales, which are to put on board either at Newcastle or Swanzey. And that the said Officer be likewise empowered to attest the growth and shipping of such goods as, by license of the Governor, shalbe exported from thence for England. And that, for his encouragement to performe the said services with all integrity, care and dilegence, there may be made unto him such recompense and allowance as the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, or Lord Treasurer, shall judge reasonable. As to the five shillings per Ton on French vessels coming into that Island, Wee are humbly of opinion that the same may be continued, in regard the taking away that duty in that Island would have ill effects on Your Ma$^{ty}$ Customes here, and the trade of this Kingdome, and be collected by the Officer afforesaid; but that the product thereof be wholly employed as Your Ma$^{ty}$ in Councill shall from time to time direct, for the publique occasions and benefit of the Island, and, in particular, towards the repair of the castle, and building the new Prison, and the poor, and not to the private advantage of the Governor or any other person. And, for the two thousands tods of wooll allowed by Acts of Parliament to be yearly transported from home for the only use and behoof of the inhabitants of the said Island, Wee are of opinion That Your Majesty should strictly charge the Governor (who is intrusted by the said Act of Parliament to license the persons who are to be employed jn exporting the said quantity of wooll) to use his utmost care that the license for the whole two thousands tods be distributed, with the greatest equality and indifferency that may be, to severall marchands, and not to too few hands, by which means the said wooll, by a free and common market, may come to the generality of the inhabitants of that Island, for whose employ and benefit the same js jntended: and that the Governor doth not convert or employ any part thereof, either to his owne, the officers, or souldiers' advantage. And, in regard of the inconveniences that attend the inhabitants of the said Island by the remoteness of the prison from the place where the Courts of Justice are held, Wee are humbly of opinion That Your Maj$^{y}$ do permit the inhabitants to erect a new prison in some convenient place within the towne of St. Hilary, to be near the Royall Court there; and that the monies for defraying the charges thereof (in case the product of the said five shilings per ton, which Your Ma$^{ty}$ shall assigne for that use, prove not sufficient) be raysed by a just and equall method on the inhabitants, and particularly that such be chiefly charged who, by their servants, are obliged to fetch the prisoners from Mount Orgueil Castle to the Court at St. Hilary, and during the assizes to attend there, and carry the prisoners back at their owne costs and charges: especiall care being taken that no part of the monies raysed for this purpose be directed to any other use whatsoever. And that the Keeper of the said prison be, from time to time, nominated and appointed by the Baylif and Jurates of the said Island, for the time being. Lastly, as touching the manner of assembling and holding of the Estates of that Island, and the Governor's negative voyce in that Assembly, it is our humble opinion: That the same, together with all the ancient ordinances, priviledges, libertys, ffranchises and immunities, given to or belonging, as well to the inhabitants as the Governor of the said Island, do remain without alteration, as they are established by grants and charters from Yo$^{r}$ Maj$^{y}$ and Your Royall Predecessors, orders and ordinances of Councill, or otherwise. All which is most humbly submitted by, Radnor, Bathe, Cavendish, Bridgwater, Fauconberg, B. London. His Ma$^{ty}$ was pleased to approve thereof, and did order that the same be effectually put in execution in all its severall parts. And His Maj$^{y}$ was pleased further to order: That the Bayliff and Jurats of the said Island do not imprison any souldier of the garrison there, upon any pretence whatsoever (except for breach of the peace), without leave of the Governor first had and obteyned, nor intermeddle with any difference between souldier and souldier. And that the Bayliff and Jurates have the nominating and constituting of the said Keeper of the prison only during His Ma$^{ty}$ Pleasure."

(Signed) "Thomas Dolman."

964. (To Mr. Le Cras).—The prior Order is, to a certain extent, qualified and repealed by this subsequent one?—Yes.

965. But you say that, by mistake or design, the subsequent Order was omitted from the Code of 1771, and the prior Order inserted?—Yes.

966. The question is, whether the prior order is still in existence. It would still be in existence, would not it?—That has been decided by the Lords of the Council, in the case of an appeal of Sir Thomas Le Breton, the father of the present Procureur Général, when the jurats of the Royal Court refused to register his letters patent appointing him bailiff of the Island. The Lords of the Council took the case into consideration.

967. Mr. Le Breton. There was no appeal.

968. Mr. Le Cras. It was a reference to the Lords of the Council, upon the course which the jurats of that day thought proper to take in refusing to register Sir Thomas Le Breton's letters patent: and they grounded their opposition upon that Order in Council, which had been repealed. The Lords of the Council decided that it had no force and effect, notwithstanding it had been inserted in the Code.

969. My impression was, not that they decided that the Order was good without registration, but that it was compulsory upon them to register, when ordered.—I believe not.

970. You think they decided that the Order was good without registration?—That the Order in Council was of no force, notwithstanding it had been inserted in the Code.

971. That Order in Council would not prevent the Crown from insisting upon the registration, as I understand it, of an Order in Council, as the Code puts it that, till registered, it has no effect.—That was the meaning of it.

972. If I recollect rightly the proceeding to which you advert, it did not alter that, but simply stated that it was not optional with them to register or not to register. It only affected the question whether the registration was optional.—It may be so.

973. What is the date of the Order in Council with respect to Sir Thomas Le Breton?—In 1802, the Court refused to enregister Letters patent of the Sovereign, which named the late Thomas Le Breton, Esq., King's Procureur, until they had been able to make a representation to the King, inasmuch as they thought that he had been appointed by undue means, contrary to the privileges of the Island. They grounded their right to do so on the article of the Code of laws. The matter was referred to the Committee of Council; when their Lordships decided that, having maturely considered the order of the 21st May, 1679, as also another order of the 17th December, 1679, by which the above mentioned Order of the 21st May, 1679, was repealed, they are of opinion that the refusal of the Jurats to enregister His Majesty's Letters patent, and to administer the oath to T. Le Breton, Esq., was a grave contempt of His Majesty's Royal authority: and, in a subsequent order to this, the King confirmed the report of the Lords of the Council, by which it was recommended to His Majesty not to act with rigour towards the Court, considering that the Jurats sinned through error, and not through obstinacy; in consequence of which they were peremptorily ordered to enregister the said Letters Patent, and to carry the same into execution, on pain of His Majesty's great displeasure. The Court complied with the Order; and there the matter dropped.

974. That does not absolutely state that the effect of the Code and the Orders in Council together was to keep alive the Order which made registration unnecessary, but that they must register?—Yes.

975. It was compulsory upon them to register?

976. Mr. Dupré. We have always considered that we had a right to suspend, in such a case, till His Majesty's pleasure was known.

977. And that it is void till registered, in spite of the Order of 1679?—Yes. The following is the Order of the 24th of February 1802, on the subject, and the Act passed by the Ro al Court.

"L'an mil huit cent deux, le quinzième jour de Mars. Présent, [Son Excellence, Andrew Gordon, Lieutenant Général des Armées de Sa Majesté, et Commandant en Chef et Lieutenant Gouverneur de l'Isle de Jersey, &c., &c. Par devant Jean Dumaresq, écuyer, Lieutenant de Monseigneur le Bailly de l'Isle de Jersey, assisté d'Edouard Le Maistre, Nicolas Messeroy, Phil. Robin, Jacques Hemery, Jacques Hamond, Charles De la Garde, Francois Valpy dit Jauvrin, Pierre Manger, Jean De Carteret, Phil. De Carteret, Thomas Pipon et Jean Poingdestre, écuyers, Jurés. Après avoir entendu lecture des ordres de Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil, datés du 24e Février et du 12e Mars, 1802, comme aussi des Lettres Patentes de Sa Majesté datées le 2e Février, 1802, appointant Thomas Le Breton, écuyer, Procureur Général du Roi en cette Isle (L'Avocat Général du Roi, stipulant l'office de Procureur Général du Roi, ayant été dispensé, à sa requête, d'agir dans cette affaire): L'Avocat stipulant l'office d'Avocat Général du Roi, ouïes ses conclusions, La Cour, pénétrée de la plus vive douleur d'apprendre que son procédé ait pu être considéré par Sa Majesté en Conseil comme un mépris à l'autorité Royale, afin de se justifier et détruire les impressions défavorables qu'ont pu faire sur sa Majesté et les Seigneurs de son Conseil les représentations que son Excellence le Lieutenant Général Gordon, Lieutenant Gouverneur et Commandant en Chef de cette Isle, a jugées à propos de faire, et qui n'ont point été communiquées à la Cour, a cru devoir déclarer solemnellement, comme elle le fait par le présent acte, Que, loin d'avoir eu intention de manquer de respect à leur débonnaire Souverain, elle est, comme elle a toujours été, animée de la plus pure loyauté et de la plus vive reconnaissance pour tous les bienfaits et la protection particulière que sa Majesté a daigné accorder à ce pays: Que son intention, en suspendant, par son acte du 13e Février dernier, l'enregistrement des dites Lettres Patentes, étoit uniquement dans la vue de représenter à Sa Majesté qu'ils concevoient que la recommendation du Lieutenant Général Gordon, Lieutenant Gouverneur de cette Isle, en faveur du dit Thomas Le Breton, écuyer, pour être Procureur Général du Roi (lequel étoit Paymaster du Royal Garrison Battalion, Deputy Judge Advocate en cette Isle, en un mot une personne dans sa dépendance), étoit contraire aux loix établies, notamment aux Lettres Patentes de sa Majesté le Roi Jacques Premier, datées le 9e Août l'an treize de son Regne, qui sont actuellement en force, n'ayant point été rappellées, et qui défendent expressement au Gouverneur de s'entremettre en aucune manière de la nomination, institution ou appointment du Procureur du Roi, et dans la disposition de se soumettre à la décision finale de sa Majesté, comme elle le déclara par son dit acte du 13e Février: qu'elle se croyoit autorisée à ce délai par la loi confirmée par sa présente Majesté en Conseil le 28e Mars, 1771, qui dit expressement "Les Lois et priviléges de l'Isle sont confirmés comme d'ancienneté, et aucuns ordres, warrants ou lettres, de quelque nature qu'ils soient, ne seront point exécutés dans la dite Isle qu'après avoir été présentés à la Cour Royale, afin d'y être enregistrés et publiés: et, dans le cas que tels ordres, warrants ou lettres soient trouvés contraires aux chartres et priviléges, et onéreux à l'Isle, l'enregistrement, l'exécution et la publication en peuvent être suspendus par la Cour, jusqu'à ce que le cas ait été représenté à Sa Majesté, et que son bon plaisir soit signifié là-dessus." Que se trouvant liés, par leur serment d'office, de soutenir les priviléges, libertés et franchises de cette Isle, et de s'opposer à quiconque les voudroit enfreindre, et chargés spécialement par les dites Lettres Patentes du Roi Jacques de donner connoissance de tems en tems au Roi et au Conseil des contraventions entreprises au préjudice des dites Lettres Patentes, et afin de connoître le bon plaisir de Sa Très Excellente Majesté sur ce sujet, la majorité des Jurés adressèrent à sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil une humble Pétition et Représentation, datée le 22e Février dernier, laquelle n'étoit point parvenue à l'office du Conseil lorsque le dit ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil, daté le 24me du dit mois, fut emané. Qu'ayant été appellée par ordre du chef Magistrat à l'assemblée le 2e de ce présent mois, pour entendre lecture du dit ordre de Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil, daté du 24e Février, il ne fut point décidé, comme il a été représenté, de suspendre l'enregistrement des dites Lettres Patentes, mais les Magistrats, n'ayant reçu l'avertissement que tard le soir précédent, Phil Robin, écuyer, l'un d'eux, ne pouvant se rendre à la Cour, étant engagé à des affaires importantes qu'il avoit appointées pour ce jour, fut mis en défaut; Charles De la Garde, écuyer, fut exoiné par maladie; huit autres de ceux qui étoient présents demandèrent que la Cour fût remise à un autre jour, pour donner leur opinion, ce qui fut absolument refusé par Jean Dumaresq, écuyer, Lieutenant Bailly, qui, après avoir consulté le Lieutenant Gouverneur sur le sujet, déclara aux Jurés qui demandoient la remise que son Excellence leur permettroit de se retirer dans un autre appartement pour considérer le sujet, pourvu qu'ils donnassent leur opinion ce jour là, mais qu'il ne consenteroit point à la remise demandée, à laquelle proposition, venant de la part du Lieutenant Gouverneur, ils ne jugèrent point qu'il fût convenable d'acquiescer, sur quoi le Lieutenant Bailly déclara derechef, comme il avoit fait le 13e Février, qu'il ne procéderoit point aux affaires publiques (et cela malgrè les déclarations reitérées de la majorité des Jurés qu'ils étoient prêts d'assister à l'administration de la justice, et leur représentation qu'il y avoit deux officiers du Roi présents), et quitta la Cour, sans même diriger le Greffier de faire acte du procédé du jour, et que les dits Jurés n'eurent d'autre recours, dans cette occasion, que de représenter le fait à Sa Majesté en Conseil, par une humble représentation datée le dit jour 2e Mars, 1802. Aujourd'hui, paroissant que tant la dite représentation que celle faite du précédent ont été prises en considération par Sa Majesté en Conseil, et qu'il a plu à Sa Majesté d'ordonner de la manière la plus péremptoire à la Cour par son ordre, daté du 12e du courant, d'enregistrer les dites Lettres Patentes, et d'administrer le serment de Procureur Général du Roi au dit Thomas Le Breton, écuyer: La Cour, toujours disposée à porter obéissance aux ordres qui viennent de la part de leur débonnaire Souverain, a en obéissance aux dits ordres, ordonné l'enrégistrement tant des dits ordres de Sa Majesté en Conseil, datés le 24 Février et 12 Mars, 1802, que des dites Lettres Patentes datées le 2e Février, et a administré le serment de Procureur Général du Roi au dit Thomas Le Breton, écuyer, se réservant toutesfois d'adresser à Sa Très Excellente Majesté telles représentations pour le maintien des loix, libertés et franchises de cette Isle, que le cas requerra, et de supplier sa Majesté de fixer les limites entre les pouvoirs civil et militaire de ce pays, de manière qu'ils ne puissent être mépris, et qui, en bornant chaque pouvoir à ses fonctions respectives, assurent le repos et le bonheur des habitans. Desquels ordres de sa Majesté en Conseil et Patente la teneur ensuit.

At the Court at St. James's, the 24th of February, 1802, Present the King's Most Excellent Majesty, Lord President, Duke of Roxburgh, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Chesterfield, Earl of Aylesford, Earl of Harrington, Earl of Rosslyn, Lord Hobart, Lord Pelham:

Whereas there was this day read at the Board a Representation from the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the affaires of Jersey and Guernesy, in the words following, viz.: May it please your Majesty. We have had under our consideration an Act passed by the Royal Court of your Majesty's Island of Jersey on the Thirteenth of this instant February, whereby it was determined, by a majority of the Jurats of the said Court, to suspend the registering of certain Letters Patent granted by your Majesty to Thomas Le Breton, esquire, whom your majesty has been pleased to appoint your Majesty's Procurator General of the said Island of Jersey, and to delay administering to the said Thomas Le Breton, esquire, the oath of office of your Majesty's Procurator General in the Island of Jersey, on the grounds stated in the said Act. And we have likewise had under our consideration a letter addressed to the Right Honourable Lord Pelham, your Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, from Lieutenant General Gordon, your Majesty's Lieutenant Governor of the said Island, with several enclosures relative to the proceedings of the Royal Court in the Premises; and the Lords of the Committee, having maturely considered the Order in Council of the 21st May, 1679, referred to in the said Act, and also a subsequent order in Council, bearing date the 17th December, 1679, whereby the above mentioned order of May 1679 was recalled, are of opinion that such refusal of the jurats to register Your Majesty's said Letters Patent, and to administer the oath of office to the said Thomas Le Breton, Esq., was an high contempt of Your Majesty's Royal authority, and that it may be advisable for Your Majesty peremptorily to order, require and command the said Royal Court forthwith, and without delay, to register Your Majesty's said Letters Patent, and to administer to the said Thomas Le Breton, Esq., the oath of office of Your Majesty's Procurator General of the Island of Jersey. His Majesty, having taken the said representation into consideration, was pleased, with the advice of His Privy Council, to approve thereof, and doth hereby peremptorily order, require and command that the said Royal Court do forthwith and without delay proceed to register His Majesty's Letters Patent appointing Thomas Le Breton, Esq., to be His Majesty's Procurator General of the said Island, and to administer to the said Thomas Le Breton, Esq., the usual oath of office, as His Majesty's Procurator General of the said Island of Jersey: whereof the Bailiff and Jurats of the Royal Court of His Majesty's said Island of Jersey for the time being, and all others whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly."

(Signed) "W. Fawkener."

978. (To Mr. Le Cras.) The most that can be made of this is that, upon an extremely doubtful point of construction, the Court naturally maintain their own authority.—As the matter now stands, there is no remedy for oppression.

979. The remedy would be to apply to the Privy Council for an Order compelling the registration of any statute.—Still that Order in Council would not be registered. There have been several cases in which two or three Orders have come down, one after the other, and they have been disobeyed.

980. With respect to the difficulties arising from prosecutions being instituted solely upon the responsibility of the head Law Officer, it is a matter in which the laws of different countries differ more perhaps than on any other point; but you may be aware that in England, if a private individual institutes a prosecution, the Attorney General has the power of entering a nolle prosequi. He does that upon his own responsibility.—Yes; it is quite the same thing. Under the cover of that Order in Council, which has been repealed, the authorities here have taken upon themselves to refuse to register Acts of Parliament, and also to obstruct the course of Her Majesty's prerogative Writs. And, consequently, the Habeas Corpus Writ, which extends to the island by Act of Parliament, remains a dead letter. The next thing to which I wish to direct the Commissioners attention is the Act of Court of the 28th of July, 1601, forbidding the Vicomte or Dénunciateur serving any order or process without first obtaining permission of the

Mr. Le Cras.

Court. That Act of Court is acted on to this day, and is brought forward as an authority to obstruct the course of Her Majesty's writs.

981. Has not that particular Act been the subject of an Order of the Privy Council?—No.

982. (To Mr. Dupré.) Is it the law that the Vicomte or Dénunciateur shall not serve any process without leave of the Court?—Processes from England.

983. Mr. Le Cras. The Act of Court says, "Whereas various commissions have been obtained through the importunity of several persons from their Honours. the Lords of the Right Honourable the Privy Council, whereby several of Her Majesty's subjects are greatly harassed, contrary to the privileges of the island, and avail themselves of and abuse the ministerial functions of the Viscount or Denunciator, the whole contrary to their office, which depends entirely on the Bailiff and the Magistracy: for these causes it has been found expedient that they shall not execute any orders, commands, or warrants, by the command or request of such commissions, without the permission and leave of the aforesaid Bailly and Magistracy."

984. Mr. Dupré. That Act of 1601 is undoubtedly repealed by the Code of Laws. No Vicomte or Dénunciateur could legally serve any summons or other document from the English Courts.

985. Mr. Evans. Processes are served here from the Court of Chancery; and commissions are executed. I know that of my own knowledge.

986. It probably goes through this Court?—No.

987. (To Mr. Le Cras.) The fault to which you are now directing our attention is the not giving force here to the writs of the English Courts altogether?—Especially Prerogative Writs, such as a Writ of Mandamus, to compel a lawful act being done by the parties whose duty it is to do it.

988. A Mandamus would not be granted by the Court of Queen's Bench, on a distinct principle: they would refuse it, because they would say there is another remedy in the Privy Council.—Considering that the Police is political, and that our Jurats are political Jurats, and that they have not been hitherto made responsible for their acts, it is necessary, since there is great difficulty in entering prosecutions for malversation of conduct, that some other channel of redress should be opened.

989. You think there is not sufficient control from England?—Decidedly. It is a very great grievance; and I suffer myself from it. In fact, unless some channel is opened, there is no security for life or for liberty. As the Police are a Political body, and our Jurats are political, they are influenced by various personal considerations, and they cannot avoid it. It is impossible for them to do so, when you recollect that in my case, when it was brought before the Court, Mr. Winter Nicolle, all through the proceedings, evinced great personal hatred towards me, and towards my advocate, so much so that the Court interfered upon the subject, and Mr. Winter Nicolle was about to be censured for his act.

990. It does not appear necessary to go into personal matters of that kind. The Commissioners understand, of course, that, if it be true that the constitution of the tribunal necessarily makes it a political one, grievances must continually arise, where an individual is an object of political partiality.—Of course; and that makes it necessary that there should be some means by which parties might be punished for it.

---

Mr. Richard Duparcq further examined.

Mr. Richard Duparcq.

991. The Commissioners understand you wish to give some explanation of the evidence you gave the other day, or to state some facts which you then omitted.—After we had been to Mr. Jardin, for the purpose of getting bail for Mr. Romeril, we went to Mr. George Amy. Mr. Romeril asked Mr. George Amy to remain security for him; and he asked what amount. I said 50*l.* Mr. Amy said, "I believe there is no danger." I said "No, it is only until next Saturday." That is to show that Mr. Romeril had been only four days under bail.

992. Was Mr. Amy the bail that was taken?—Yes, for 50*l.*, to produce Mr. Romeril the next Saturday to the Court. I believe, if Mr. Amy is present, he might state whether I mentioned that: because two police were along with me, who can prove that I said so; Mr. Le Feuvre and Mr. Le Gallais.

993. Did it occur to you to tell Mr. Romeril of this?—No; I thought, when the Attorney General would not enter a Report, it was done with.

994. Did not it occur to you to tell Mr. Romeril that this was the position in which he was placed, that he was fully at liberty, because the Attorney General did not intend to proceed further?—It did not. I believe I told Mr. Amy, in Court, that day, that the Attorney General would not enter the Report.

995. You told Mr. Amy that?—Yes; he was the security.

996. Are you certain about that?—Yes.

997. Was it for 50*l.* or 30*l.*, the security was taken?—For 50*l.*

---

Mr. George Amy examined.

Mr. George Amy.

998. Were you bail for Mr. Romeril?—Yes.

999. In what amount?—50*l.*

1000. What was the condition of that security? To do what?—To present him to the Court whenever called upon.

JERSEY.

Mr. George Amy.

10 September, 1846.

1001. When did you first receive any information that you were discharged from that security?—I have had no information whatever.

1002. Not up to the present time?—No.

1003. Can you take upon yourself to say, from your recollection, that Mr. Duparcq did not tell you at the Court that the Attorney General did not intend to proceed further, and that you were released from your security?—Yes.

1004. Are you sure that he never said so?—Perfectly sure.

1005. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Duparcq in Court?—I recollect the circumstance perfectly well. I was requested to be in Court on Saturday. I accordingly was so, expecting that the case should be brought forward. The case did not come forward: and, in coming out of Court, I remember perfectly well having said to Mr. Duparcq, "I have brought Mr. Charles Romeril to Court, as I have been requested: consequently I consider myself no more bail for the gentleman." Upon that Mr. Duparcq told me: "you must not have that impression, we cannot lose such a good security."

1006. Mr. Duparcq. I never said such a thing.

1007. Mr. Amy. I will take my oath of it. I do not state a single word but what I am perfectly ready to support by my oath, if necessary. I had no interest at all in the case; and, when I remained security for the person, I told Mr. Duparcq it must be under the perfect understanding that I did not meddle with their quarrels myself. Previously to remaining bail, I enquired of Mr. Duparcq whether he had bound over the two young Chevaliers to keep the peace. He told me that he had.

1008. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Duparcq, at any subsequent time, as to your being liberated from the bail?—I do not think I had: but I know that I laboured under the impression that I remained security for Mr. Romeril during the whole time.

1009. (To Mr. Duparcq.) The Commissioners understand you to persist in your recollection the other way?—Perfectly so.

1010. That Mr. Amy's recollection is incorrect?—I have no knowledge at all of my having said that I would never lose such a good security. I have not the least recollection of it: if I had, I would say it at once.

1011. (To Mr. Amy.) Did you, in point of fact, attend at the subsequent Courts?—Never: I never was requested to do so.

1012. Did you know, as a fact, that the Procureur Général had refused to enter the Report?—No.

---

Stephen Thomas.

Stephen Thomas examined.

1013. Do you live at No. 18, Grove Place?—Yes.

1014. Had you a demand made upon you, on the 10th of September, 1845, on account of plying with a cart and horse on the pier?—Yes.

1015. What was demanded of you?—Two and sixpence.

1016. By whom?—By Mr. Chevalier.

1017. You refused to pay, I believe?—Yes.

1018. Did you go with Mr. Chevalier then?—No.

1019. What was the next thing that took place?—He told me I was to be at home between one and two, and he would come to take me to prison.

1020. Was that the expression?—Yes.

1021. Did you attend for the purpose of being taken to prison?—Yes. I remained at home, more than two hours; and he did not come for me.

1022. On what day was this?—It was on the 10th September, 1845.

1023. What was the next thing that happened about it?—On the following day, he seized me in the street, and took me to prison.

1024. Did you go before a Magistrate before you went to prison?—No.

1025. How long did you stay in prison?—I was put in on the Thursday about 10 o'clock.

1026. Was that the 11th?—Yes.

1027. Ten o'clock in the morning?—Yes; and they kept me there till the next day about eleven.

1028. When you were taken into prison, were you searched, or anything taken from you?—Yes: the man took away from me 2*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, British money, and sundry other articles.

1029. Was that the gaoler?—It was some man there.

1030. Not Mr. Chevalier?—No: it was some turnkey.

1031. The next day, you say, about eleven, you were liberated. How did you get out?—Mr. Alexandre came for me.

1032. Who is he?—A police officer; he came to take me to Court.

1033. Mr. Le Breton. He is an officier de connétable.

1034. (To Stephen Thomas.) How many gentlemen were sitting as a Court?—I do not recollect. I remained in Court about an hour; and Mr. Chevalier came up to me, and told me that I might go home, and take my dinner: that he was going for his: accordingly I did so.

1035 Did you come back to Court?—Yes; I came back to Court.

1036. At what time?—In about half an hour after I left: and I remained for an hour; and then I went about my work. I then went down to the pier, and took my van, and brought up nine passengers and their luggage into the square. The people cannot land at low water without some conveyance. In coming up, I met Mr. Bromer.

1037. Was this on the 11th?—On the 12th, Friday.

1038. When you met Mr. Bromer, was it the same day you were dismissed from the Court?—Yes. He began to blow me up, as I was to have gone the day before to the mill for him. He was angry that I had not been.

1039. Did you tell him you had been confined in prison?—Yes; and he accompanied me to Mr. Hugh Godfray's, the dénunciateur, in Vine Street. He informed me that I had been wrongly imprisoned: so I went home; and, on the following Monday, Mr. Chevalier seized me again in the street, and brought me to Court.

1040. He did not take you to prison on that occasion?—No. After waiting some time, I was presented at the bar before the Judges.

1041. How many were sitting?—I do not know: three or four. I cannot say how many.

1042. Do you know the gentlemen who were there?—No; I cannot remember who they were.

1043. What happened? Did Mr. Godfray appear for you?—Yes: he defended me.

1044. What happened?—I was sent about my business.

1045. Have you had your money?—No; I have never been to the gaol since.

1046. Then you have not asked for it?—No.

1047. Has it been offered you?—No.

1048. Have you had any conversation with the turnkey who took it away?—No.

1049. How came it that you did not ask for your money?—Because I thought, perhaps, it would be better for me to stop away. I thought, if I went back, they might detain me again.

1050. Do you mean that that is the sole reason you did not ask for your money?—Yes.

1051. Did you take any body's advice upon the subject?—No.

1052. Did you ask Mr. Godfray whether you could have your money again?—Mr. Godfray told me I had better stop away.

1053. When Mr. Godfray said that, had you told him you had thoughts of getting your money?—No: I told him they had taken some away from me.

1054. Was it in answer to that, that he said you had better stop away?—Yes.

1055. Did any body else advise you not to go for your money?—No.

1056. We understand that you did not go to the gaol, because you were afraid that, instead of getting your money, they would put you in prison?—Yes.

1057. Are you rated in St. Héliers?—No.

1058. Have you a rateable property?—I am a householder in the parish of St. Héliers.

1059. Whereabouts?—18, Grove Place.

1060. Are there many houses there?—Yes.

1061. How many?—There are a great many.

1062. Are the householders there generally rated?—Yes.

1063. Are the houses of the same size as yours?—There are none so small, perhaps, as mine. I pay fifteen pounds three shillings and fourpence rent.

1064. Had you applied to be rated?—Yes.

1065. To whom?—At the Parish Meeting.

1066. Have you ever appealed to the Court for not being rated?—No.

1067. You have applied to the Parish Meeting?—Yes.

1068. How often have you applied?—Once.

1069. When?—I cannot say how long ago, perhaps three or four months: it might be more; it might be six months.

1070. That is the only time, is it?—That is the only time.

1071. You have never complained to the Court of your not being rated?—No.

1072. Have you ever complained to the Court about not getting your money?—No.

1073. You have not applied to any body, we understand, about that. You have not asked Mr. Le Sueur, for instance, who is at the head of the Police, about your money?—No.

1074. You said Mr. Bromer met you. Have you been in Mr. Bromer's service?—Yes; about six or seven years.

1075. Did not you take Mr. Bromer's advice on the subject, what you were to do with regard to your money?—No: I never asked him about it.

1076. Did you tell him they had taken your money away?—Yes.

1077. Did you ask him what you were to do to get it again?—I asked him; and he told me I had better leave it to Mr. Godfray.

1078. And Mr. Godfray told you not to go to prison, because they would put you in instead of giving you your money?—That was the first day: he said they might detain me if I went there again. So that I have never been since.

1079. Have you made any application for your money since the time at which the Court stated you were discharged?—No.

1080. You have not applied to Mr. Godfray since that?—I have been to Mr. Godfray's once or twice since; and he told me I had better leave it for awhile, because he said, if I were taken before the Court, I should have no chance.

1081. We are asking you now as to the time after the Court had dismissed you. Did you then ask Mr. Godfray's advice about going for your money?—Yes.

1082. And he advised you not to go?—Yes.

1083. What did he say?—I cannot recollect what he said; it is so long ago.

1084. Did he give the same reason, that they would put you in prison if you went for your money?—He said, I had better leave it for a while.

1085. Why did he say so?—I forget for what purpose it was.

1086. Did you make any complaint to the Secretary of State respecting your money?—No.

1087. Did you make any complaint of your being arrested to the Secretary of State?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Stephen Thomas.
10 September, 1846.

1088. What was done in consequence?—I never received any answer.
1089. Did you do it by letter?—Yes.
1090. Did you state, in that letter, that your money had been withheld from you?—Yes.
1091. Did you complain to the Prison Board?—No.
1092 You complained to no one, then?—No.
1093. By whose advice was it that you applied to the Secretary of State?—By Mr. Bromer's.
1094. Did Mr. Bromer say it would be better for you not to ask for your money?—No.
1095. Mr. Bromer. I wrote the letter for him to the Secretary of State.
1096. (To Stephen Thomas.) Did you cause any statement to be inserted in any of the newspapers as to what had happened to you?—Yes.
1097. Did you state there that you had been robbed of your money?—Yes.
1098. And also to the Secretary of State, I suppose?—Yes.

The following Act of Court was read.

"A la Cour Royale de l'île de Jersey. L'an mil huit-cent quarante-cinq, le huitième jour de Septembre. Par devant Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli de l'île de Jersey, assisté d' Edouard Léonard Bisson et Philippe de Ste. Croix, Ecuyers, Jurés. Stephen Thomas, saisi de fait par le centenier Chevalier de la paroisse de St. Hélier, et présenté en Justice par le connétable de la dite paroisse, sous prévention d'avoir enfreint l'article 16e du réglement sur les Bateliers, Portefaix et Chartiers, et de s'être refusé un paiement de l'amende de deux chelins six pennies sterling, dont il s'était rendu passible, le tout selon que plus au long est contenu en rapport du dit centenier, qui est demeuré logé au greffe. Le dit Stephen Thomas a prétendu d'abord que le rapport est informe, que sa présentation adjourd'hui est illégale, étant déclaré dans le rapport qu'il fut saisi Jeudi dernier, et avec la permission de Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli, logé à la garde du geolier de la prison, où il est resté tout depuis, tandis qu'au contraire il fut libéré Vendredi dernier par le centenier Chevalier, et qu'il a été saisi de nouveau ce matin, et, de plus, que le dit centenier a aujourd'hui déclaré en Cour qu'il a logé le dit Stephen Thomas en prison Jeudi dernier, et n'a remis la permission par écrit au geolier que Vendredi matin. Attendu que le dit Stephen Thomas fut mis en liberté Vendredi dernier par le dit centenier, et qu'il n'a été saisi de nouveau que ce matin, faits qui ne sont point mentionnés dans le dit rapport, la Cour a jugé que le dit Thomas n'est point poursuivable sur le présent rapport. Partant il est mis en liberté."

1099. Mr. F. Godfray, (Greffier.) The following is the report presented to the Court.

The same was read as follows.

"A Pierre Le Sueur, Ecuyer, Connétable de la paroisse de St. Hélier. Monsieur, Mecredi le 3e du courant, le bateau à vapeur South Western entra dans le port de St. Hélier, vers les neuf heures du matin, et, au moment où il rangeait le long de la chaussée du sud, le nommé Stephen Thomas sauta sur le pont, et s'empara des effets de plusieurs passagers qu'il mit dans sa voiture ou van. Il y avait alors plusieurs portefaix sur la chaussée. Peu de tems après, le dit Stephen Thomas se trouvait encore avec sa dite voiture sur la chaussée, lorsque les passagers altéraient d'abord du Monarch. Je lui dis qu'il avait enfreint l'article 16e du réglement sur les Bateliers, Portefaix et Chartiers, et qu'il s'était rendu passible de l'amende de deux chelins six pennies; à quoi il me répondit qu'il ne la paierait pas, et qu'il défiait qui que ce soit de l'empêcher de gagner un chelin lorsque l'occasion se présenteroit, et qu'il continuerait, comme par le passé, d'autant qu'il avait sa voiture avec lui. Je ne le saisis pas alors: mais le lendemain, Jeudi le 4e du courant, je rencontrai le dit Thomas dans "Grove Place," et lui ayant renouvellé la dite demande, de me payer l'amende susdite, il me répondit qu'il ne le ferait pas. Je lui dis que dans ce cas je le saisirais, à moins qu'il ne donnât caution de se présenter en Cour Samedi prochain; sur quoi il me répondit qu'il ne prendrait pas la peine de chercher une caution, et de faire de lui ce que je voudrois. En conséquence, je saisis le dit Stephen Thomas, et le remis, avec la sanction de Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli, à la garde du geolier de la prison. De tout quoi je vous fais ce présent rapport." Signé: "Jno. Chevalier, Centenier." "A Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli, et à Messieurs les Jurés Justiciers de la Cour Royale de l' Ile de Jersey. J'ai l'honneur de présenter le rapport d'autre côté, ainsi que le dit Thomas, afin qu'il en soit ordonné." Signé, "P. Le Sueur, Connétable de St. Hélier. Délivré en Cour séante, ce 8e septembre, 1845."

1100. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Was it your duty to present this Report as constable?—The centenier would present it.
1101. By the report it appears that Thomas was charged with a violation of the 16th and and 17th articles of the law with regard to boatmen, porters and carters?—Yes.
1102. There is a law of that kind?—Yes.

---

Mr. Hugh Godfray.

Mr. Hugh Godfray examined.

1103. You are the gentleman mentioned in the evidence of Thomas?—Yes; I am one of the officers of the Court.
1104. You acted on this occasion as legal adviser of Thomas?—Yes.
1105. Did he, after his dismissal, ask what he was to do for his money?—I will state what I know of the affair. The day after Stephen Thomas had been put in prison, Mr. Bromer came and told me under what circumstances he had been put in gaol. I accompanied Mr. Bromer to the gaol, and asked the gaoler who had given the sanction for the imprisonment of Thomas, and when it was sent to the gaol. The gaoler shewed it me: it was signed by the Bailiff, Sir John De Veulle: and the gaoler informed me it had been brought that very day, at eleven o'clock, and that the man had been in prison the day previous.
1106. That would be on the 5th; and he had been in prison on the 4th?—Yes.
1107. He was taken on the 4th?—I cannot remember the date now. I take the dates to be correct. I entered nothing of that in my books. The gaoler told me that he had taken some money from the man; that that was the regulation of the goal.

1108. Was that the first you knew of his having taken the money?—I dare say Mr. Bromer told me it.

1109. And you mentioned it to the gaoler?—I asked the gaoler whether he had done so. The man Thomas was brought up to the Court one day. I was on duty in the Court.

1110. What was Thomas charged with?—By the report it appears to be an infraction of the 16th article of the law as to porters and boatmen.

1111. Does that subject him to a penalty of 2*s.* 6*d.*?—Yes. In the afternoon of that day, I saw Thomas; and he told me Mr. Chevalier had told him to go to dinner, and that he had come back to Court.

1112. He was not in Court then, was he?—He was in the vestibule of the Court. I told him he was a fool to have come back; that he ought to have remained at home. He then asked me if he was to go to gaol to get his money. I told him not to go, as probably the goaler did not know that he was released, and would keep him there.

1113. You did not advise him never to go?—No.

1114. He might have so understood you, possibly?—He might. A few days after that, Mr. Bromer came to inform me that Thomas had been arrested again by Mr. Chevalier, and was brought into Court. I instructed my brother, Mr. Francis Godfray, the advocate, of the circumstance; and Thomas was liberated by the Court.

1115. What were the grounds of the decision?—They are contained in the Act.

1116. Are we right in supposing that the ground was an informality int he centenier's Report?—It is said, because he had been seized a second time, which does not appear in the Report.

1117. It was not a decision upon the merits of the question, of his plying there?—The Court did not put it in the Act; but the advocate made use of it. The advocate's grounds of defence were that Mr. Chevalier had no right to take him to jail, without at the same time delivering to the gaoler the permission for his imprisonment.

1118. The order for his imprisonment at the time?—Yes: that is the regular course, and ought to be followed: but it is hardly ever done. There would not be so many unwarrantable imprisonments as there are, if that course were followed.

1119. This is part of the Act, "The said Stephen Thomas, having alleged first that the Report was informal, that its presentation to day is illegal, it being declared in the Report that he was taken up last Thursday with permission of Sir John De Veulle, Knight, Bailiff, and lodged in custody of the gaoler of the prison where he had remained ever since till he was liberated on Friday last, and that he has been newly taken up again this morning, and also that the centenier to day has declared in Court that he has lodged the said Stephen Thomas in prison last Thursday, and had not received permission in writing to the gaoler till the Friday morning: in consideration that the said Stephen Thomas was set at liberty on Friday last, and that he has not been seized afresh till this morning, which are not mentioned in the Report, the Court has adjudged that the said Thomas is incapable of being prosecuted upon the present Report, and that he be set at liberty." That was the sentence of the Court?—Yes.

1120. They neither affirmed nor negatived the ground given by the advocate, but said, "here is an informality, and the man must be liberated?"—Yes: it was to avoid giving a decision upon that point.

1121. The strict rule is that no body should be sent to prison without the warrant of Sir John De Veulle, or some one authorised to give it, I believe?—I have been practising in Court, and have held the office I now hold, of dénonciateur, for thirty four years, and for twenty one years I have been autorisé to the Procureur Général.

1122. You instruct him, as we should say in England?—Yes. My belief is that no police officer has any right at any time to imprison any person till he has taken him before some magistrate, and obtained his sanction.

1123. By "imprison" you mean imprison in the gaol?—Yes: he has, no doubt, a right to keep him. That is the reason the constables have such a number of officers to assist in keeping persons prisoners.

1124. You have no lock-up house?—No. The custom formerly was that they were taken to a public house. The publican was obliged to receive them; and they were kept there by the officiers du connétable till the centenier had an opportunity of taking them before a magistrate.

1125. That you state to be your clear view of the law of imprisonment in gaol?—Yes.

1126. As matter of practice is that law adhered to?—No: quite the contrary.

1127. Do you mean that it is systematically infringed?—Yes, by almost all the Police. Mr. Chevalier's Report is worded in such a way as to intimate that, when he had put Stephen Thomas in gaol, he had the sanction of Sir John De Veulle. It is worded thus: "En conséquence, je saisis le dit Stephen Thomas, et le remis, avec la sanction de Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli, à la garde du geolier de la prison."

1128. The decision of the Court at present is that the defendant is illegally imprisoned or committed, which vitiates the Report and destroys the authority?—Yes.

1129. Have you known it practised, to get an authority and to enter it as previously obtained, ex post facto?—Yes: it is often done. It is generally done now in reports.

1130. In point of fact, is the law evaded by entering a subsequent permission as having been given previously?—Generally, the Police take a person to prison, and put him there, and keep him there some hours, or perhaps a day or two, and then apply to a magistrate for a permission.

JERSEY.

Mr. Hugh Godfray. 10 September, 1846.

1131 Of what date does that permission then appear to be?—The magistrate dates it the day he gives it. In the books of the gaol, for this Thomas, he is noted as being put in goal on such a day, and the permission as being received the next. The gaoler always takes care to do that.

1132. The inaccuracy never takes place at the gaol?—No: it is the police officer who commits the inaccruacy.

1133. Do the gaol books record the inaccuracy?—They ought to do so.

1134. Do they do so in this case?—The following is the entry: "Stephen Thomas—England—age 26—infraction of law for porters, boatmen, and carters. Where committed; St. Héliers. By whom seized; Centenier Chevalier. Date of confinement; September 4th. By whose orders; Sir John De Veulle. Date of trial; September 8th. Liberated. Date of discharge; September 5th."

1135. The book does not show an inconsistency upon the face of it?—Sir John De Veulle's order will show the date. That is at the prison.

1136. The entry in the book does not show the inconsistency, because it does not state the date of the order?—No: it is always supposed that the order ought to accompany the prisoner.

1137. But the order, having been given, remains at the prison?—Yes: it is filed.

1138. And may be compared with the prison book?—Yes.

1139. It was so in this instance, I presume?—Yes: the gaoler shewed it to me and Mr. Bromer: we both of us saw it.

1140. Have you anything further to add?—I may say that the centenier had no right to seize the man in the first instance; the law was périmée. It was a provisional law, and had expired at the end of three years.

1141. At the time this took place there was no law applicable to that case at all, I understand you?—No.

1142. Will you turn to Article 16th of the law of 1844?—

"Personne, si ce n'est les portefaix licenciés, ne pourra se charger, pour un salaire, du transport des effets des passagers lors de leur débarquement, sous la pénalité de deux chelins six pennys par chaque infraction. Si des personnes, dans la vue d'exercer l'état de portefaix sans être licenciées, se représentent habituellement comme ne recevant aucun salaire des passagers qui leur confieraient leurs effets, le maître de port, ou assistant, aura le droit de leur défendre de s'en charger. Les cochers, ou voituriers, qui se rendront sur les quais avec leurs voitures, lors de l'embarquement ou du débarquement des passagers, seront tenus de ranger leurs voitures à tel endroit que le maître de port, ou assistant, indiquera, et de rester près de leur chevaux, sous la pénalité de dix chelins pour chaque infraction."

1143. That inflicts a penalty of 2*s.* 6*d.* on every person who is not licensed, engaged in carrying the luggage of passengers from the place of their disembarking?—Yes.

1144. Will you look at Article 18?—

"Dans le cas du refus de paiement de l'amende à laquelle un batelier ou un portefaix se serait rendu passible, sa licence lui sera retirée pour tel temps que le maître de port, en ce qui regarde les bateliers, et le connétable de St. Hélier, en ce qui a rapport aux portefaix, le jugera convenable; et si des individus en contravention ne sont ni bateliers ni portefaix, et qu'ils refusent de payer les pénalités par eux encourues, ils seront saisis par la police ou le maître de port, et présentés en justice."

1145. Will you read Article 20?—

"Les amendes et pénalités portées au susdit réglement seront levées sommairement par le connétable ou centenier de la paroisse de St. Hélier, ou par le maître de port, et seront applicables, un tiers à la Reine et le reste au bénéfice des hâvres et chaussées."

1146. That gives the constable and centenier the power summarily of levying fines on parties?—Yes.

1147. The other Article gives the Police power of seizing them and bringing them to justice?—Yes.

1148. Does it authorize the Police to take a person to prison?—No: certainly not. I am the more certain of that, as it speaks of the maître de port. The harbour master's jurisdiction refers to the Harbour.

1149. What would be the proper course for the Police to have pursued in this case, supposing the law to have been in force, which you say it was not?—The proper course for Mr. Chevalier was to have taken either the man's cart or his horse; because I think, when a person has property to pay a fine, his property must be taken before his person. The person is too sacred to be trifled with in that manner.

1150. Will you look at the latter clause of the 18th Article: "Ils seront saisis par la police, ou le maître de port, et présentés en justice." Does that give the police the power of taking a man and confining him in prison, or only of summoning him to appear before the Court to answer for the charge?—My idea is that the Police might arrest a person, and bring him forthwith to the Court; but that in no way for 2*s.* 6*d.* can they put a man in gaol.

1151. They might arrest him and bring him before the Court instanter?—Yes.

1152. Supposing the Court were not sitting, what would be the proper course?—Not to take him up before the Court sits. Thomas was not taken up then. He was taken up the day after he had committed the supposed offence.

1153. Will you, upon consideration, abide by that answer, that in no case should the Police take him up unless the Court were actually sitting? Is it different from any other seizure? They have the power of seizure in general.—It is very different from a seizure for robbery. This is not a crime: it is a penalty which is incurred.

1154. So far as it gives the Police the power of seizing is not it put upon the same footing?—No: and I am borne out in that by seeing that it is "Le Maître de Port." He cannot seize an individual and put him in gaol.

1155. Not under these regulations?—An Act of the States could not give him the authority.

1156. Would not any Act of the States bind the inhabitants of the island till the law was repealed?—I do not think the States can give such a power to persons who are not in office, and who, by the constitution, have not such a power.

1157. Could not the States pass an Act for the regulation of the harbour?—Yes: but not giving such a power to the harbour master.

1158. You say, if the Court were not sitting, the Police could not take him up at all?—They could always find the person and bring him before the Court. Another way would be for the police officer, or harbour master, to make a Report to the Court; and then the Court would order its officer to bring the man before the Court.

1159. Have not you the means of compelling an appearance before the Court, called "signification?"—Yes. The Report would be the order; and there would be an order by the Court to make a signification to the person.

1160. Is the signification a simple summons?—Yes; a simple summons by the officer of the Court to appear?

1161. You say a man might be seized and taken immediately if the Court were sitting?—Yes: it says, he may be seized and brought before the Court.

1162. Could the harbour master seize him?—He could make a Report to the Court.

1163. Could he bodily seize him and take him up to the Court?—It is said in the law: "ils seront saisis par la police ou le maître de port:" but I do not think the harbour master would have the right of seizing.

1164. Not under any circumstances?—No,n o he person.

1165. You have no doubt that that is the effect of the law; but you think that so far it is invalid?—Yes.

1166. You think the only person upon whom they could confer a fresh power of seizure must be some officer already constitutionally invested with it?—Yes; officers of police or officers of justice.

1167. You think they could not create an officer of justice, pro hâc vice?—No.

1168. Supposing your construction to be wrong, and supposing your officer had the power, even then it would seem that the Act itself is liable to this difficulty, that, if the Court happens not to be sitting for a certain number of days, the parties may be in prison nearly as long as the final sentence of the Court?—They might be in prison more than the eight days.

1169. (To Mr. Dupré.) You have heard what Mr. Godfray has said, as to the meaning o these words "seront saisis" by the Police. Do you agree with him in his opinion?—I think the harbour master is empowered by that Act to seize the parties mentioned in the second clause of the 18th Article, on their refusing to pay the fine incurred: and it follows of course, by the custom of the country, that they are entitled to detain them, with the sanction of the magistrate, till they can be presented in Court.

1170. That would also apply to the Police?—Yes.

1171. So that, in fact, as far as taking this man up and putting him into prison, if they had had the previous authorization of Sir John De Veulle, the proceeding would have been regular?—Yes.

1172. That is, without reference to the question of the expiration of the law?—Of course, if the law had expired, it would have been altogether illegal. I must also observe that, though the law should have expired when the party was seized, if a fine had been incurred while the law was in force, it would still have been punishable. The fine would still have been exacted, in virtue of an Act of States of the 18th of July, 1843, confirmed by Her Majesty in council on the second of October in the same year:—

"Considérant qu'il paraît, par un Acte du Corps de la Cour, du 18e Août 1837, qu'il a été jugé qu'une infraction à une loi ne peut être poursuivie après que la loi est périmée: les Etats, dans la vue d'assurer l'exécution des lois passées par les Etats, ont résolu, moyennant la sanction de sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil, d' établir le réglement suivant. Toute infraction à une loi passée par les Etats pourra être poursuivie et punie, même après l'expiration de la loi, pourvu que les poursuites aient été instituées, ainsi qu'il se pratique pour tous délits et torts, dans l'an et jour de l'infraction."

1173. Mr. H. Godfray. I wish to know whether the Solicitor General knows any occasion of the harbour master having seized a person?

1174. Mr. Dupré. The Act of States has not created a new office. The office of harbour master was created by a law confirmed by the King in council; and I think that the States could, by provisional ordinance, extend the power of the harbour master for the proper discipline of the harbour.

1175. Even to the extent of giving him a power to seize the person?—Yes.

1176. (To Mr. H. Godfray.) Have you an apprehension that, in cases where the Police are implicated, there is a difficulty in obtaining justice from the Court on account of the political constitution of the Court?—Yes; I have. There is hardly any chance of redress.

1177. By political constitution, you mean the political influence which the Police exercise?—The connection there is between the Police and the magistrates.

1178. The Commissioners understand that the party of the Police is not always the same party in the different parishes?—No.

1179. The Commissioners presume that, even if there is a strong political bias, it is not the same with all the Jurats. That some will have a political bias for the Police of one parish, and some for the Police of another?—There are only two or three magistrates on the bench of one party; the remainder are all of the other.

1180. Do you think the tribunal on the whole is influenced by party?—It is the Police which places them there; there is no regard to whether their abilities are sufficient to be magistrates.

1181. In the present case, the Commissioners observe that the Court dismissed the charge against Thomas upon the ground of some informality on the part of the Police. On this particular occasion, therefore, they did not favour the Police.—No; because it was so very clear and open.

1182. You observe that the force of the judgment is concentrated, as it were, upon the error of the Police, and avoids the question of the merits of the case. That looks not at all, as far as it goes, like partiality for the Police: they select that view of the case which tells most against the Police.—That is the reason given.

1183. Was your brother in law replaced as harbour master by Mr. Chevalier?—Mr. Lerrier, my brother in law, was harbour master about twelve years. That office was renewable every three years, by the appointment of a Committee of the States.

1184. Is it a lucrative office?—It is very much so, for Jersey.

1185. When did he cease to be harbour master?—A little more than three years ago.

1186. Against his will?—Yes. He was not re-elected by the Committee of the States. Mr. Chevalier had made sure of a majority more than twelve months before the time his office expired.

1187. Who succeeded your brother in law?—Mr. John Chevalier.

1188. The centenier?—Yes; he is both centenier et maître de port. My brother in law was turned out of office for no other reason than to make room for Mr. Chevalier, and to reward him for his great efforts as a partizan. Mr. Lerrier, in the election of Jurat, between Mr. Le Gallais and Mr. Arthur, voted for the former; and it was then decided that the harbour master should be turned out of office.

1189. You suppose that was the cause?—It is notorious. Mr. Lerrier had the approbation, during the twelve years he was in office, of all the merchants and shipowners of the place. He was recommended again to the committee by the greatest majority of merchants and shipowners.

1190. You were very much dissatisfied by that result?—Certainly; it was most unjust and iniquitous.

---

Mr. Edward Nicolle, jun.

Mr. Edward Nicolle, jun., examined.

1191. You live in St. Héliers, do not you?—I do.

1192. You are the son of a gentleman who is a Jurat?—Yes.

1193. I understand there has been some occasion, lately, in which you have been dissatisfied with the means of finding the Police when you wanted them?—On the occasion of a theft having taken place of some property of mine, I took into custody a little girl who had been accused of stealing coals and other matters, and I thought it advisable to apply to the Police. I am sure those gentlemen would have done every thing in their power, as they did ultimately, to do what was proper: but the first to whom I applied was engaged, and about to proceed on his own business to St. Aubins.

1194. He stated that as his reason for not acting?—Yes.

1195. What rank did that gentleman hold?—He was a centenier. The second to whom I applied informed me that he could not attend to the business, inasmuch as his coadjutor was absent from the island.

1196. His coadjutor in the Police?—No. That was the harbour master.

1197. His coadjutor in the duties of harbour master?—Yes; his deputy. The third to whom I applied informed me that he had all the duty thrust upon him; and he requested that I should go to the fourth.

1198. All the duties of the Police?—Yes. The fourth gentleman, as soon as I found him (I went to his house twice), immediately came and did the duties of his office.

1199. As I understand, the imperfection to which you wish to draw our attention is, not being able to find at the moment persons whose sole business it is to attend to that?—Yes; I am quite sure that the men who now hold the office are as efficient as any set of men could be under the present system. It is with the system that I find fault, and not with the persons.

1200. Do you contribute to a private police?—No.

1201. You know the fact, of course, that there are such associations in the town?—I believe there are several.

1202. In your opinion, do you consider the Police, as at present constituted, a sufficient defence for the lives and property of the inhabitants of St. Hélier?—No; I do not.

1203. I understand you to say that that inefficiency results from the system, and not from the individuals?—Decidedly.

1204. Have you had any opportunity, from your own knowledge, of observing how far party spirit of one kind or another influences their conduct?—I should rather say that the Police of the town parish influence the elections of almost all the Jurats.

1205. I meant, particularly, whether it influenced their conduct as police men; whether it interfered with their efficiency as Police.—I am not prepared to say any thing on that point.

Mr. James Bolton examined.

Mr James Bolton.
10 September, 1846.

1206. Have you been a long time a resident in this island?—I have.
1207. In the parish of St. Hélier?—Yes.
1208. In the year 1844 were you rated to the parochial rates?—Yes.
1209. At how much?—I was rated, a number of years, at eight quarters.
1210. Up to 1844?—Yes.
1211. Afterwards in 1845 was your rate increased?—Yes, to twelve.
1212. Between 1844 and 1845 did you part with any of your property?—Yes.
1213. Had you acquired any fresh property in lieu of it?—No; I had not.
1214. To whom did you sell it?—I sold it to an English gentleman, Mr. Morton.
1215. Have you had any opportunity of knowing at what Mr. Morton was rated?—Ten quarters.
1216. Upon that house solely?—Yes; upon the one house which I sold him.
1217. Upon your rate being increased, after your property had been diminished, did you apply to the Assembly to have your rate lowered?—Yes.
1218. Did they relieve you?—No.
1219. They still kept you at twelve quarters?—Yes.
1220. Soon after this, was there an election for a Jurat?—Yes.
1221. Did you vote in that election?—Yes.
1222. For which candidate did you vote? For the Police candidate or the other?—I voted for a person who was independent of the police body, that is, Mr. Arthur. He was brought forward by the Police.
1223. He was the favourite candidate of the Police, was he?—Yes.
1224. After having voted in this way for the candidate whom the Police favoured, did you apply to have your rate altered?—There was a public meeting.
1225. A Parish Assembly, I suppose you mean?—Yes.
1226. Was that the next Parish Assembly after the election?—Yes.
1227. Did you then apply to have your rate reduced?—Yes. I asked to have it reduced.
1228. What did they do?—They reduced it.
1229. To how much?—To six quarters.
1230. Do you happen to know how Mr. Morton voted?—He voted on the same side with me; and he was reduced to six quarters.
1231. Do you know whether Mr. Morton applied to be lowered?—No; he did not.
1232. Have you generally voted on the same side?—Never before. I never voted but once; and that was for Mr. Handley.
1233. When was that?—Thirty years ago and more. I cannot exactly say.
1234. For thirty years you had never voted till this election?—I never voted but once before.
1235. Have you engaged yourself on either side on any occasion?—No; I have never interfered at all.
1236. You had not given any promise to vote for either party?—Never.
1237. I suppose you had no knowledge that the vote you were giving would have this beneficial effect upon your rates?—I rather expected it.
1238. You had applied to the Parish Assembly, you say, to have your rate lowered; but they still kept you at the same amount?—Yes.

---

Mr. Philip Godfray examined.

Mr. Philip Godfray.

1239. Your are a merchant resident in St. Hélier?—I am a merchant and banker in the town.
1240. Have you had any opportunity of judging of the efficiency of the police system?—I have.
1241. Will you state it?—If the Commissioners will allow me, the first thing I will speak about is as to Stephen Thomas. The Commissioners asked him whether he was rated, and whether he was a householder. At the last Parish Meeting, a few months since, he applied to me to get his name inserted on the rate list. I asked him whether he had sufficient property to pay the rate. He told me he rented a house of 15*l.*, and that he had sufficient property to pay it. At his request I proposed him.
1242. You are one of the principaux, are you?—I am one of the principaux of the town. The question was asked, "Who is Stephen Thomas?"
1243. In the Assembly?—Yes. I did not then know the man; and I said "He is here; he can explain what he is worth." Thomas came forward; and the moment he was seen by Mr. centenier Le Cronier, who is now dead, that centenier held up his fist and said, in French, "C'est ce bougre là: je propose qu'il ne soit pas admis." I propose that he may not be admitted. And the man was refused.
1244. That is the person who was assassinated?—The person was Mr. Le Cronier. To all those who composed the parish meeting he was known to be of a most hasty disposition, a most intemperate man. Three weeks ago, a Frenchman of the name of Fontaine came to my office to transact business. One of the clerks received from him a Jersey bank note, which he shewed me. It bore the name of Nathaniel Westaway. I looked at it, and immediately found that it was a forgery. That the bank note had been issued by a person of the name of Le Couteur, from twenty five to thirty years ago. The name of Mr. Le Couteur had been written with faint ink, and could hardly be made out. I asked Fontaine from whom he had received it: he told me that he had received it from a butcher in the market. I took the bank note; and, in my way to the market I met the son of Mr. Westaway. I told him that there was a forged note with his father's name in circulation.

Mr Philip Godfray. 10 September, 1846.

1245. In what way did the note bear the name of Mr. Westaway?—It was originally issued by Le Couteur: that name had been erased; and the name of Westaway was upon it. I applied to Richard Le Lièvre, the butcher. He told me he had given the note to Fontaine, and that he had received it from a man of the name of George Bisson, residing at St. Saviour's. I returned to the bank, and gave back the note to Fontaine, who told me, a day or two afterwards, that Le Lièvre had returned him the amount. Last Saturday fortnight, Mr. Westaway jun. came to tell me that this note was again in circulation. I went a second time to Le Lièvre, who told me that he had returned it to Bisson; and, on my applying to Bisson, he mentioned having returned it to the party from whom he had received it, a man of the name of Le Riche. I had no time then to attend to the business; but, in the evening, I met Mr. Westaway jun., and told him: "Now, if you have time, we will go about this business." I returned to Le Leivre, to the market, and got the same explanation from him. I told Mr. Westaway: "Remain here; and I will go for the Police." I went to Mr. Mahy, who is a Police officer, and who keeps a wine and spirit store at some distance from the market. He was not there: but, a lad in his employment having pointed out where centenier Duparcq lived, I went to Mr. Duparcq's. We first of all went to a person of the name of Jukes, who had the bank note in his possession, who mentioned having received it from a party at a public house in exchange for five franc pieces, and that he would point the party out. He accompanied us to the public house. Jukes, the centenier and myself went; and it was found that Jukes had received it from a person of the name of Barrington. I went with the centenier to Barrington's house. He was not there; but they said he would be probably met with at the Divan, which is a public house in the town. In going from Barrington's house to the Divan, we again met young Westaway. He told me that, in the mean time, he had found the father of Mr. Gruchy, to whom Bisson had returned the note, and that they wished to settle the business.

1246. Was it young Gruchy, or the father?—Gruchy, jun. The centenier inquired of Gruchy were his son was; he told him, he did not know. Mr. Duparcq then told Gruchy: "Send your son to me on Monday morning." I left him, and have had no conversation with Mr. Duparcq on the subject since: but, two or three days afterwards, Mr. Westaway, the father, came to my bank; and he told me: "The matter is finished; they have repaid the pound to Jukes; and there the matter ends." Mr. Westaway observed: "Old Mr. Gruchy made a curious mistake: he told me, we are all on the same side; I am a police officer of Trinity; and the matter must be finished in that way:" or words to that effect.

1247. (To Mr. Nathaniel Westaway.) Did Mr. Gruchy tell you this?—Not exactly in the same form.

1248. Mr. P. Godfray. Mr. Westaway spoke in French. He is an Englishman. The conversation I had with Mr. Gruchy was in French. He is an Englishman, and not over well versed in French.

1249. (To Mr. Westaway). What were the words which were used, as far as you can recollect them?—He asked me to settle the business. I told him, as for myself, the note had not been presented to me for payment, and I had no wish to prosecute. He said: "Nous sommes de la police de la Trinité." I said, not comprehending what he meant: "Vous êtes de nos gens." He said "we are roides." The answer I made him was "il sera facile à arranger."

1250. (To Mr. P. Godfray.) Who would be the person upon whom the loss of the forgery would fall at the time of this supposed arrangement? You were not holder for value, were you?—No.

1251. Who was holder for value?—Jukes, to whom it had been passed a second time.

1252. Mr. Westaway. The note was cancelled. Mr. Duparcq called on me on Monday, and asked me where this man lived. He told me the thing was settled, and Jukes had had his money; and I told him I was very glad of it.

1253. Was Mr. Duparcq present at this conversation which you have been detailing to us?—No. I never saw Mr. Duparcq on the subject till he called on me on Monday morning, and told me it was settled.

1254. On what day was it that Mr. Duparcq informed you the thing was settled, and Jukes had had the money?—The Monday following, Mr. Duparcq came to know where the man who had had the note lived, as he owed him a penny, and he wished to return it.

1255. Mr. P. Godfray. That is to say, Mr. Gruchy gave one pound and a halfpenny to Mr. Duparcq for this note.

---

Mr. Richard Duparcq.

Mr. Richard Duparcq further examined.

1256. Have you any thing to say to this?—Mr. Godfray came to me on Saturday evening about nine o'clock. He told me, I believe, that he had received this note first from Mr. Le Leivre, a butcher.

1257. When was this?—Saturday evening, about a fortnight ago.

1258. The point which the Commissioners wish explained is, your telling Mr. Westaway that this thing had been settled?—Mr. Westaway junior came on the Monday morning, with a young man. I still had the note in my possession, from the Saturday evening, and would not et it go.

1259. That was the son of Mr. Westaway, who has been examined?—Yes. Mr. Westaway junior told me that every thing was settled with his father; that he would not prosecute the young Gruchy; and then I spoke to the young Gruchy, and asked him where he had got the note. He told me that he had received it of a person whom he did not know. I could not find who had given him this note. I asked him whether he would repay it again, and destroy the note.

1260. Asked whom?—Gruchy, the one who had had the note in his possession.

1261. You asked whether he would pay the amount of the note to Jukes?—Yes.

1262. And destroy the note?—Yes. I told him, as Mr. Westaway did not wish to prosecute him any further, I would destroy the note in the presence of Mr. Westaway and Mr. Gruchy.

1263. Did you do so?—I did, in my own house, in the parlour. We had a candle, and destroyed it in the candlestick before Mr. Westaway and Mr. Gruchy.

1264. How long have you been a police officer?—Going on three years.

1265. When did this take place?—About a fortnight ago.

1266. Mr. P. Godfray. Last Saturday fortnight.

1267. (To Mr. Duparcq.) Is Mr. Gruchy senior a rate-payer of St. Helier's?—No; of Trinity parish.

1268. Do you know at all of what party he is?—No. I had never seen the man before, to my knowledge.

1269. Did it occur to you that what you were doing, in burning the note, was improper to be done by a constable?—Not at all, as I could not trace any further than that Mr. Gruchy told me he had received a note, but he could not say who had given it to him.

1270. He offered to pay for it?—Yes, and paid for it; at least his brother did. Gruchy is quite a young man, about nineteen or twenty.

1271. Did not you take a particular oath when you were appointed centenier?—I did.

1272. Do you recollect the terms of that oath?—Yes; but Mr. Westaway sent his son, saying he did not wish to prosecute the man any further.

1273. Do you consider, acting as a police officer, that a public offence is a question between two parties?—I did not know what party he was.

1274. Do you think, if a man robs me, and I let him off, the public has no interest in the crime?—Certainly they have.

1275. Did not you swear in your oath, "Vous garderez et ferez garder la paix de sa Majesté, vous opposant et saisissant de fait tous mutins, séditieux, larrons, homicides, et toutes autres personnes qui interrompent le cours de la paix publique, dont vous informerez le connétable, afin qu'ils soient présentés en justice." If any crime takes place, is not it your duty to present the parties in Court? Did that never occur to you?—Never.

1276. You are aware that, if you had gone to Mr. Le Sueur, you could have had the best advice possible?—I did not go to him.

1277. He never heard of it, of course?—No: a thing of the kind had never occurred to me before.

1278. Mr. Le Sueur. From time to time those notes signed Le Couteur have found their way into circulation; and they have been issued again without people knowing that they are forgeries. There is no reason for suspecting Gruchy of having issued the note knowing it was forged.

1279. Supposing he had received the note from the most respectable man in the island, the question is not as to the respectability of the person, but as to destroying the evidence of the crime.

1280. Mr. Le Sueur. Mr. Duparcq very likely did it to prevent its being circulated again.

1281. Mr. Duparcq. That was my only motive.

1282. Mr. P. Godfray. Mr. Duparcq states he had been centenier three years: I believe he has been a police officer for many years.

1283. (To Mr. Duparcq.) Is that so?—Yes.

1284. Did you call upon Mr. Westaway the next day, and say that the matter had been settled?—I told him on Saturday. I told him what Mr. Westaway had stated, that I could not trace the note any further than Gruchy. He told me he had received it.

1285. You thought, seeing the instrument in the hands of a person whom you could not suspect personally, it did not signify what became of the instrument?—I never gave a thought about that. I thought, when I had the note, and Mr. Westaway would not prosecute any further, I could destroy the note.

1286. Upon meeting old Mr. Gruchy, he was asked where his son was?—I asked him where his son was: he said, he did not know.

1287. You then said, tell your son to come to me on Monday morning?—Yes.

1288. Did he come to you on Monday morning?—Yes.

1289. Then this meeting took place?—Yes.

1290. Who were present?—Mr. Gruchy, the brother, and the young man himself, and Mr. Westaway junior.

1291. Did you examine the young man as to how he came by the note?—Yes: but he said, he could not tell; that some one had given it to him, but he could not tell who: and I thought it was better to destroy the note than to let it circulate any longer.

1292. Mr. P. Godfray. I do not know whether the Commissioners understand me right. The note was returned, in the first instance, to Gruchy. He was told the note was forged, and, after being told of it, he reissued it a second time.

1293. Did you mention that fact to Mr. Duparcq?—I do not recollect whether I did so or not. I told Mr. Duparcq that the note was forged; and Mr. Duparcq knew it well.

JERSEY.

Mr. Richard Duparcq.

10 September, 1846.

1294. Mr. Duparcq was in the position of knowing that the note was forged, and of finding the last person, who says, I cannot account for it?—Yes.

1295. In what part of St. Hélier's is your office?—In Hill Street, eighty or one hundred yards from here.

1296. Have you any thing to add to your previous evidence?—Yes. Three or four years ago, I was informed that a lad had entered my premises, and had stolen a few bottles. I told the lad that I would forgive him if he would shew me where he had sold them. He took me to a little broker's shop in Hillgrove Lane, kept by a Mrs. Joste. The boy insisted that he had sold her the bottles; but Mrs. Joste denied it. I sent for vingtenier Durell. He is no longer in office. I sent for him: and he came. Some explanation took place as to those bottles; and it was found out that this woman received a good deal of stolen property.

1297. Were the particular bottles found?—Yes. It is very difficult to swear as to bottles.

1298. Bottles were found, which you stated you suspected to be yours?—Yes. There was a grate which she mentioned having purchased from an apprentice of this town. The master and apprentice were sent for. The boy, in my presence, owned having stolen the property from his master, and that he had robbed him to some amount. Vingtenier Durell said, that it was a very serious business, and he would not take upon himself to arrest the parties, but sent for centenier Le Cronier. I mentioned to him what had taken place. The two boys owned that they had stolen the property which was in the shop; and I insisted that he should do his duty. The lad who had stolen my bottles was an English lad; the boy who had committed the other thefts was a Jersey boy. The English boy was committed to gaol; and the Jersey lad, who in my opinion was ten times more guilty than the other, was let go. The English lad was brought before the Court. I was present when he was tried. I mentioned to the King's Procureur that he was not the only one who ought to be there; but I refused to tell him what I knew about it, and referred him to the centenier, or to the constable: he spoke to the constable, who had not been made aware of the circumstance.

1299. To Mr. Le Sueur?—Yes; Mr. Le Sueur left his place at the bar and spoke to Mr. Le Cronier; but what passed between them I do not know. The Court took into consideration that the English lad had already been in prison for a few days, and let him off. As to the other boy, nothing was done.

1300. Have you any other point to which you wish to advert?—Yes. In September, 1843, a person brought me a cheque for 100*l.*, which I sent up to London for payment, but it was returned.

1301. A cheque on a London banker?—Yes; on the house of Williams, Deacon, and Co. I gave it back to the party.

1302. Was it returned "no effects?"—No; they never give an answer as to cheques; they simply refuse them; and there is an end to it. I gave it back to the person from whom I received it; but soon afterwards I found that the cheque was a forgery. I went to the centenier Darthenay, who was then in the office, and apprized him of the circumstance. He went with me to the party; but he had destroyed the cheque.

1303. The party had?—Yes. He however took him up, and put him in gaol; and, on searching his papers, it was found that he had a forged letter of credit in his possession. I wrote to the banking house of Williams, Deacon, and Co. respecting that letter of credit; and they informed me that they had not given it, although it bore their name. The proof was positive, in my opinion, against the man; but, to my great astonishment, he never was brought before the Court; but, on the contrary, after being kept six days in gaol, he was liberated by Centenier Darthenay, and not by an order from a magistrate, although he had been committed by Mr. Le Gallais, a magistrate.

1304. (To Mr. Le Gallais.) In your commitments, do you specify what the parties are committed for?—Yes.

1305. Do you remember what this person was stated to be committed for?—No.

1306. Mr. P. Godfray. It is in September, 1843.—My reason for bringing this case before the Commissioners is to show that the Police have, or claim to have, the right, after a person is committed for forgery, of liberating him without the consent of a magistrate.

1307. The prison book under the head of "by whom seized," says "Centenier Darthenay;" "By whose order;" "Mr. Le Gallais." "Date of trial;" blank. "Sentence;" "Liberated." "By whose order;" "Centenier Darthenay."—Yes: and the man paid 3*s.* for gaol fees.

1308. The following entry from the Gaol Book was read:—

CONTINUATION of CRIMINALS in HER MAJESTY'S GAOL at JERSEY, 1843.

| No. | Criminal's Name. | Of what Country. | Age. | Accusation. | Where Committed. | By whom Seized. | Date of Confinement. | By whose Order. | Date of Trial. | Sentence. | Date of Discharge. | By whose Order. | When taken before the Court. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 181 | John Frampton | England . | 21 | Forgery . | St. Héliers | Cent. Darthenay | Sept. 7 | P. Le Gallais | | Liberated | Sept. 12 | Cent. Darthenay. | |

1309. Did you mention the case to the Crown officers?—No.

1310. (To the Vicomte.) Perhaps you would know, as having the gaol under your charge, whether a centenier, or constable, or any other officer of police, has the power to direct the liberation of the person confined?—I do not know that they have the power: they exercise it.

1311. It is exercised, and obeyed by the gaoler?—Yes.

1312. It would be regular, according to practice, that the gaoler should dismiss the man upon the order of centenier Darthenay?—Before he is presented.

1313. Mr. Le Sueur. I believe it has been the practice for the police officer, either the centenier or the constable, to give an order to liberate the party when the charge was not sufficiently substantiated; but in 1844 the Prison Board gave directions to the gaoler that all orders for the liberation of prisoners were to be signed by the committing Magistrate or the Bailiff.

1314. The subject has been brought before the Prison Board?—Yes.

1315. Sir John De Veulle. I have given orders to the gaoler in writing upon the subject. They are sent for; and they will be produced to the Commissioners. Mr. Le Sueur says they are the orders of the Prison Board. I thought they were my own orders. I have sent the gaoler for them; and they will be here shortly.

1316. Mr. Le Sueur. The subject was mentioned before the Prison Board; and I understand that an order was then made to that effect.

1317. Was that in 1844?—Yes: it was in 1844 or 1845.

1318. You mean that the practice was for the centenier or the constable to judge of the sufficiency of the charge?—Not, of course, to judge of the sufficiency of the charge without consulting the Crown officers, and at the same time the Magistrate who had committed the prisoner; but generally the order was not signed by the Magistrate, nor was it given in writing, but given verbally by the centenier or the constable to the gaoler.

1319. A discretion to liberate rested with the constable or the centenier, guided by the advice of the law officers?—I understood so.

1320. So that it would be irregular in a centenier, before this order, to direct the liberation without consulting the law officers?—I do not suppose that any centenier, if the charge had any gravity, would have liberated the party without first consulting the Crown officers.

1321. The question of gravity or no gravity would be of course then a question for the centenier?—Yes; that was the case previously to the order. It occurs to me that the Prison Board made an order to that effect. I know the subject was discussed before the Prison Board; and I believe an order will be found to that effect.

1322. The Vicomte. The last liberation made by a centenier was on May the 7th, 1844. Therefore I have no doubt that Mr. Le Sueur is correct as to his date.

1323. Mr. Le Sueur. I suppose, if the Magistrates who have had committals are asked, it will be found that before that time their order was not required.

---

Mr. Philip Godfray further examined.

Mr. Philip Godfray.

1324. Will you proceed with your statement?—At the last parish meeting of the parish of St. Héliers, of which I am one of the Principaux, a person named Mr. Philip Haia was present. He applied to be rated as one of the principaux, that is to say, to pay twenty quarters on the rate. He had been a rate-payer for many years, and I believe was taxed at twelve quarters. A proposal was made to admit him, and an amendment to reject him; but he was not admitted. The whole of the police officers, who came there with the intention of not admitting persons who voted for the Laurel party, voted against him.

1325. Mr. Le Sueur. I can state positively that that was not the case.

1326. Mr. P. Godfray. Nearly all those that were proposed by the Laurel party were rejected by that very same Police. I hold in my hand a list of forty seven individuals who paid a lesser rate than twenty quarters, who had voted for the Rose candidate at the previous election, and who were admitted as Principaux, while only eight individuals who had voted for the Laurel party were admitted, and four or five who had not voted were also raised to the rank of Principaux. I find that there are twenty two persons on the rate list at fifteen quarters in the parish of St. Héliers. Five are minors; two electors did not vote; two were out of the island; and thirteen voted for Mr. Mallet; that is the candidate of the Laurel party: and only two persons that were rated at fifteen quarters voted for the Rose party. It is obvious that those thirteen persons are kept at fifteen quarters that they may take no share in the parish meetings. I must observe that I have not the rate list; and perhaps there may be some slight difference: but that can always be rectified by the person in whose possession the rate list is.

1327. You say that twenty two persons were rated at fifteen quarters: do you happen to know whether those parties have a property sufficient to entitle them to be rated at twenty quarters?—I should say, the greatest part of them. Soon after the election of Mr. Le Gallais as Magistrate, there was a rectification of the rate.

1328. Does what you are stating now refer to the last election?—I refer to the rate of the present year. At the time of Mr. Le Gallais's election in 1843, there were nearly 1500 rate-payers in the town. Mr. Gallais gained his election by ten or eleven votes. Shortly after, a rectification of the rate took place.

1329. How soon was the rectification of the rate after Mr. Le Gallais's election?—It was about a month.

1330. Was that for the same year?—The same year, and the following year. The rate list was increased by 300 votes. The greater part were brought in by the Rose party. They refused to admit those that were proposed by the Laurel party. By that means, they have increased the number of their voters; and at this moment, I do not see that any Laurel candidate has the least chance of being elected; but the Police of St. Hélier's have the elections entirely in their own hands. When a party offers to be rated, if he is known to be of the Laurel party, he is very seldom admitted. On the other side, whether he has means or not, if he is proposed by the Rose party, he is sure to be put on the rate list. It is said to be one of the greatest privileges of the island to elect their Magistrates; but that power is entirely in the hands of the Police. At the last election, in last November, there voted for the Laurel candidate ninety seven Principaux.

JERSEY.

Mr. Philip Godfray. 10 September 1846.

1331. What was the election for?—For Jurat. For the Rose candidate eighty five; which shews that there was a majority of the Principaux in favour of the Laurel candidate. I find that sixty voters rated at one quarter voted for the Rose party, seven voted for the Laurel party, and eighty eight paying two quarters voted for the Laurel party; which leaves a majority of one hundred and eighteen voters paying two quarters in favour of the Rose party. Those persons are most of them placed on the rate list to have their votes at elections.

1332. In fact, the richer party are in the minority?—I do not say, the richer party; but I say that there was a majority of twelve Principaux in the last election, and that forty seven Principaux have been added since to the Rose party, while only seven or eight have been added to the Laurel party.

1333. Can you give us the number rejected?—It was not I who took the memorandum; it was taken by a gentleman who can be brought before you.

---

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.

Peter Le Sueur, Esq. (Advocate), examined.

1334. I have found the note in Millard's case, which was alluded to yesterday, and also the Report which would have been presented in Court if the Attorney General and myself had thought there was sufficient ground for the accusation. I mention it, as I refused to give the note up to Mr. Bromer this morning, before having produced it to the Commissioners. Mr. Bromer stated that the statute of limitations had barred the recovery of the bill since the time the complaint was made to the police.

1335. Mr. Bromer. Since the time it was torn.

1336. Mr. Le Sueur. I have the note; it is dated, Jersey, May 14th, 1830. It is payable one month after date.

1337. Therefore in June 1840 it would be gone?—Yes. Mr. Bromer's complaint was lodged on the 23rd of November, 1841. Perhaps I had better read the commencement of the Report which was intended to be presented.

"A Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli, et à Messieurs les Jurés Justiciers de la Cour Royale de l'île de Jersey. Mardi, le 23 Novembre, 1841. Mr. David Bromer me porte plainte qu'étant porteur d'un billet à ordre, contenti, le 14 Mai 1830, par Eliza Ormond et E. J. Millard, à Elias Gaudin ou ordre, et payable un mois après date, de la somme de vingt six livres deux chelins, monnoie de la Grande Bretagne, et endorsé Es. Gaudin, il avait chargé Mr. Charles Dupont d'en demander paiement; que ce dernier s'étant rendu chez Mr. Henry Millard, ainsi que sa femme, qui avait signé le dit billet sous le nom de E. J. Millard,"—

I did not write any further. I mentioned the case to the Attorney General; and he was of opinion that there was no ground for an accusation against the party.

1338. Mr. Bromer. I applied at Mr. Le Sueur's office, yesterday morning, to have the document returned to me. I was referred to the Court; where, of course, he was occupied, as he generally is, as an advocate, through the middle of the day. When I saw him in the evening, he said, I must come in the hours of business. I asked, what hours they were; and he said, the hours to apply at his office, as constable, were from nine to four. The consequence of which is, if those are the hours, the public will very seldom find him at home.

1339. The police hours you were told were from nine till four?—Yes, that those were the hours during which to apply on public business.

1340. The following Order was produced to the Commissioners by Sir John De Veulle, and read:—

"20th May, 1844.

"The Board has charged the gaoler with respect to debtors. 1. Not to allow an entry to be made on the Register of prisoners, but of such persons as shall be delivered into his custody, that is to say lodged in gaol. 2. Not to allow the discharge of any debtor without having previously received an order in writing to that effect signed by the officer of justice who shall have made the arrest; the discharge shall be immediately entered on the Register for prisoners. With regard to Criminals: To discharge no prisoner who shall not have been presented at Court, unless it be on receipt of an order to such effect, signed by the Chief Magistrate, one of the Lieutenants Bailli, or a Magistrate empowered by the Bailli. J. Le Couteur, Viscount.

"The only magistrates empowered to sign orders for committals or discharges, are Lieutenant Bailli Marett, Lieutenant Bailli Bisson, and Judge Le Gallais.

"Signed, J. De Veulle, Bailli.

"St. Héliers, 21st. May, 1844."

Adjourned to to-morrow at ½ past ten o'clock.

Friday, 11th September, 1846.

Mr. John Chevalier. 11 September 1846.

Mr. John Chevalier examined.

1341. You are centenier of this parish?—Yes; and Harbour Master likewise; as Mr. Godfray explained to the Commissioners yesterday.

1342. Have you been present in Court while the evidence touching the Police of the parish of St. Hélier's has been given?—I have, several times. I happened to be in the room when Mr. Dupré, the Solicitor General, began; and I was called away.

1343. Do you wish to make any statement on the evidence which has been given?—I do, in the case of Thomas. I think Thomas related the thing, as far as I can recollect, pretty correctly, except one thing. He said, I told him that he might go to dinner.

1344. Were you present all the time that Thomas was examined?—I think I was. Thomas was plying without a license.

1345. You took him in the first instance to prison, did not you?—When I met him on the pier, I told him I would go to his house.

1346. Did you go?—I went in the afternoon twice or three times; he was not at home.

1347. It was on the same day that you asked the 2*s*. 6*d*. of him?—Yes; I had repeatedly told him not to come without a license with his van taking luggage.

1348. You did not find him at home on the day that you called?—I did not. I think I found him the next day. The next day, when I went to his house, I asked him for the money or for bail. He told me he would give me neither of the two. Then I told him that of course I must seize him, and put him in gaol. "Very well," he said, "I am willing to go; that is what I want."

1349. Was that at his house?—No; I think it was in the street.

1350. Where did this conversation take place?—I think it was in the street; but it was so long ago, that I cannot very well remember. I think it was in Grove Place, near Dr. Dickson's house.

1351. He said he would go to prison, for that was what he wanted?—Yes; that that was what he wanted.

1352. And you took him to prison?—Yes; I took him to prison.

1353. At the time you took him to prison, had you, or had you not, the authority of Sir John De Veulle to take him there?—No; I had not.

1354. Is it the habit for the police to put people, when they are charged with crime, in prison, and afterwards to obtain a sanction from the Bailiff or one of the other Magistrates who are authorized to commit, subsequently to their putting them in prison?—I have never applied for a committal till after the person was in gaol.

1355. Did it ever occur to you to ask the constable, who of course is a gentleman much better acquainted with the law than you can be?—No; I do not think I have. I had served under the constable previous to Mr. Le Sueur; and I never have done so.

1356. You were centenier before Mr. Le Sueur was constable?—Yes.

1357. How long have you been centenier?—The inhabitants have elected me, I think, four times.

1358. How many years have you served?—It must be about ten years now, I should suppose.

1359. During the whole of that ten years you have always pursued this course of first imprisoning, and then getting an authority?—As soon as possible, I always made it a duty. I think the gaoler will always say I have always been very punctual in getting the committals.

1360. Did you ever hear, from either of the constables under whom you have served, that you were doing an act which in strictness was illegal?—Never.

1361. Did you ever confine any person charged with a crime in your own house, or in a public house, or any place except the prison?—No. I have been centenier many years; and my father filled the office of centenier: and I never heard that he did. We had a guard-house at one time.

1362. Is there a guard-house now?—Yes; it was formerly a guard-house; till within a year we have used that; some soldiers were kept there in war time; but, since the peace, it was left to the police to incarcerate drunkards, or detain people there.

1363. During the time you were centenier, was this place in existence as a guard-house at any time?—Yes.

1364. How long has it been applied to its present purpose?—Not above a year.

1365. You say that, till within a year, there was a place in which you could confine people charged with crime?—Yes.

1366. During the existence of the guard-house, and while it was capable of being applied to that purpose, did you take your prisoners thither or to the gaol?—I have very frequently placed them there; and at other times, when they were drunkards, and I was afraid of keeping them there for the whole night, fearing something would happen, I sometimes took them to the hospital; or, if they had been drunk and had committed a crime, I took them to gaol; and then the turnkey stopped with them the whole night, fearing they might injure themselves.

1367. Do I understand you to say that this place was up to a year ago specially appointed for the use of the Police?—The Police made use of it.

1368. Under whose authority?—We centeniers generally had a key.

1369. By whose order was that done? Was it by order of the Court?—No; we took it upon ourselves. I have done it frequently in the presence of both the Attorney and Solicitor General.

1370. During the existence of this place, did you always put people who were charged with crimes into this place of which you had the key, or did you take them to gaol, or to the hospital?—Sometimes I took them there, when I thought there was no crime. If it was only drunkards I picked up, I left them there till they were sober; and, if they promised to behave, I let them loose. At other times, when there was a crime, I took them to the gaol or to the hospital.

1371. So that you used the guard-house to confine drunkards and riotous people in; but, when they were charged with crime, you took them to prison or to the hospital, and afterwards procured the sanction of a Magistrate to do so?—I have not always done so when I put them in the hospital.

1372. When you put them in the hospital, under whose charge where they?—There is a governor of the hospital. I went there the next morning; and, if there was not sufficient ground to put them in gaol, I let them at liberty. If there was, I put them in gaol.

1373. In all cases of crime, you took the people to gaol?—Yes; in cases of robbery, or breaking into houses, or what not, I always took them to gaol.

JERSEY.

Mr. John Chevalier.
11 September, 1846.

1374. Is there any book kept, either by the constable or by yourself, for entering the names of people who are taken up?—No; not that I am aware of.

1375. Of course you would be aware of it if there were such a book. Do you keep such book yourself?—No.

1376. Do you keep books?—I have kept extracts or copies of the Report, when there was something of consequence that I wished to refresh my memory before I came to depose in Court, as they would not let us take notes to bring them into Court. I have read them over in the morning, before they went into Court.

1377. What I ask you is, whether a list is kept by yourself or any body else of all the people taken up for any police charge which happens from day to day?—I am not aware that there is.

1378. I think we may pass from Thomas's case. There is no great difference between your statement and his?—Only he says that I discharged him, which I never did.

1379. Ultimately he was dismissed by the Court?—Yes. One reason was because I did not put something in my Report. My Report remained all the time in the Attorney General's hands; but I did not think it necessary, because he went away and I never saw him till he came back that day.

1380. The act of Court, which you have probably seen, states that Stephen Thomas was discharged because he was informally brought before the Court, your Report containing this informality, namely, that it omitted mention of the previous discharge, and treated him as if he was in custody on the original caption. That you do not agree to, I understand?—No; I never discharged the man. I considered him to be still in my custody.

1381. Would it be possible always to find the Chief Magistrate to obtain from him a committal before the person is lodged in gaol or the hospital?—Last night I was called, about eleven o'clock. A woman came to me, without shoes or stockings, and holding two children in her arms, and begging of me to go to her house, as her husband, she was afraid, had murdered one of the children; that he was mad. I went down to the house with the police officers, and found the man there. After what passed yesterday, I did not know whether I was justified in seizing the man. The man was in the room, cursing and swearing and dancing; and, the moment that he heard we were coming, he shut the door; and we had great difficulty to get in. After what passed yesterday, I thought proper to go first to Mr. Judge Le Gallais. I rang the bell for a quarter of an hour. I suppose I rang it seven or eight times. I then went to Sir John De Veulle with this man and the Police Officers; and Sir John was not at home. I did not know what to do; but I left him in the lodge; and he is there now.

1382. In the lodge of the hospital?—Yes.

1383. The question yesterday was not as to the right of a centenier to seize a person in case of a breach of the peace, but as to his right to put him in gaol before a Magistrate's warrant was obtained for so doing?—What was I to do in this case, which has happened not only once but hundreds of times in my experience?

1384. Is there any other case you wish to mention?—With respect to the practice, without boasting, I may say that I do not think that there has been an officer who has ever put as many into gaol as I have. I think, now, that there are not less than forty I have seized, who have been sent over to Botany Bay.

1385. Do you follow any other business besides that of Harbour Master?—I am an iron merchant, besides, in company with my son.

1386. You are an iron merchant, and the Harbour Master, and have been centenier for the last ten years?—I think it is about ten years.

1387. Where do you live?—In Don Street.

1388. I suppose you have applications made to you at all times of the night, have not you?—I have sometimes left my house seven times in a night, and very frequently four and five times. Sometimes there might be a month without a single call.

1389. Is your office of centenier totally unpaid?—I do not receive anything for it. The inhabitants have, for my activity and conduct, voted me a piece of plate by voluntary subscription.

1390. You do not receive any fixed payment for it?—No; I never received a farthing, and never asked for it. I have been offered some; but it is a thing I have always refused.

1391. I need scarcely ask you whether the office of centenier does not materially interfere with your private avocations?—Yes; but, thank God, I have the means to do it; and for the good of my country I have done it. It was the wish of the inhabitants that I should.

1392. Do I understand you rightly, that, in this town of St. Héliers, the only places of confinement you have are the gaol and the hospital; that the Police are totally without any place in which to detain an offender?—Those are the only places that I know of; and I know the town, I think, as well as any body.

1393. What is the hospital? A poor-house?—Yes.

1394. Is it a house for the reception of sick people?—Yes.

1395. Where are those people you take placed in the hospital? Is there a place appropriated for people brought by the Police?—There are three lodges in one part of the hospital, where they are generally put if they are drunk.

1396. By lodges you mean cells?—Yes: there are three or four; I think four.

1397. They are kept for the purpose of detaining people who are put in by the Police?—Yes: since the guard-house has been taken away, the Police generally take them there.

1398. When they are put into those cells, are they placed under the care of any police officers?—No.

1399. Does any member of the Police remain in the hospital to be applied to in case of necessity?—No.

1400. In whose custody are they? They are locked up, I suppose?—They are locked up in their cells.

1401 Who keeps the key?—The governor, I expect, or one of the turnkeys. There is a turnkey comes; and sometimes the governor of the hospital.

1402. By turnkey, do you mean an officer belonging to the gaol?—Yes; the person appointed there, I suppose by the Hospital Committee: I should suppose he is.

1403. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Who appoints the Committee of the hospital?—The States.

1404. Is the Committee of the hospital a part of the States, or is the whole of the States the Committee?—A part of the States. The Committee is named by the States.

1405. I understand that the States appoint a Committee for the management of the hospital?—Yes, consisting of nine members.

1406. Have they the power of appointing the officers of the hospital?—The States appoint the Governor, and also the Governess, the Surgeon and the Chaplain; and the Committee appoint the other officers.

1407. Of course it is with the sanction of the Committee that the hospital is used for the purpose of confining people who are charged with police offences?—It is with the knowledge of the Committee; and I believe a part of the hospital has always been used for that purpose.

1408. Is any particular person appointed by the Committee of the hospital to have the charge of those people who are so confined?—No; there is a doorkeeper or porter.

1409. Then, in point of fact, they are in the custody of the officer, who is the porter of the Hospital?—They are in custody of the Governor; but the porter keeps the key.

1410. Does the Governor, ex-officio, hold any police authority? Is he, from his office as Governor, a member of the Police?—No. Within the walls of the hospital of course he has the control.

1411. He is not a member of the town Police?—No.

1412. Is there any book kept at the hospital for entering the names of people who are confined there?—Yes.

1413. In that book are the police cases inserted?—All persons who enter the wards of the hospital. Their names are always entered in that book; there is no separate book for those brought there by the Police; their names are all entered in the list of inmates of the hospital.

1414. Would the names of the people who are brought by the Police be entered?—They would, of course. In some cases, where people have been brought there only for a night, such as drunkards, very often their names might not be entered in the book.

1415. Do I understand you that any special directions are given by the Committee of the hospital to the Governor with regard to police cases?—The regulations are printed; but I do not recollect any instructions to that effect.

1416. (To Mr. Chevalier.) You say that the parties who are taken up for trifling offences are sent for security to the hospital, there being no other proper place in which to put them. Parties for serious crimes are taken straight to gaol?—Yes. Very often I have not got the key of the gaol with me at night; it is impossible for me to make the gaoler or any of the turnkeys hear; so I go and ring the bell of the hospital, and place the people there till the next morning.

1417. Besides those people who are brought up for police offences, people for serious crimes are lodged in the hospital for the night when it is too late to take them to gaol?—If it was a very serious case, I have the key of the outside gate of the gaol; and I should come home for the key, and go and put them in the cell at once.

1418. If a man is taken up for drunkenness in the street, you would put him into the hospital?—Yes.

1419. What becomes of him next morning?—I should go and see in what state he is; and, if he is fit to go home, I should admonish him, and tell him to go home.

1420. Is not he brought before any Court? Supposing a case of drunkenness, should you think it necessary to bring such a case before the Court?—No.

1421. Suppose two men were fighting in the street, what would you do in that case?—Most likely, if I knew the aggressor, I would put him in gaol, and present him before the Court; it would all depend upon circumstances. If a man had ill treated another very much, then of course I should put him in gaol.

1422. For what cases do you put people in the hospital? Will you mention some of the cases?—For no cases, but where it is not worth while troubling the Court with them.

1423. Do you exercise a discretion as to what should go before the Court or not?—I have done it.

1424. Do you exercise that discretion without first making a Report, either verbally or in writing, or consulting the constable, or Attorney or Solicitor General?—I have, in some cases, consulted the Attorney General, who has told me it was not worth while.

1425. Do you ever exercise your own discretion at all without consulting the constable, who is your superior officer, or the Attorney General?—If I have any advice to ask, I generally go to the Attorney General.

1426. What is the course you take? In all cases do you take the advice of the constable, or the Attorney or Solicitor General, if the constable has not satisfied you? Or, in some cases, do you exercise your own discretion?—In some cases, when it is for a trifling offence, such as drunkenness, I generally act upon my own discretion. Sometimes I have gone to the Attorney and asked his advice, and he has told me it is not worth while, and I have let him loose again.

1427. Do not you in every case make a Report to the constable of every thing that occurs?—No.

1428. Not day by day?—No.

1429. If you were obliged daily to make a list of all parties whom you apprehended for any offence, and take it to the constable, and receive his instructions upon it, and then proceed to deal with the parties as you were directed by the constable or by the Attorney General, would not that take up a very great deal of your time?—It would so, if it were done. For a week sometimes there is not a police case; sometimes not for a month; and at other times there are a great many.

JERSEY.

Mr. John Chevalier.
11 September, 1846.

1430. Does a month go by without any drunkenness in the streets?—We do not see all the drunkards there are.

1431. You do not look after all of them?—Generally, when they know I am coming in the way, they get out of it.

1432. What do you do with prostitutes and loose women walking in the streets?—I generally put them in the hospital, and bring them before the Court.

1433. Do not cases of that kind every now and then occur?—Yes.

1434. Frequently?—Yes. I have sometimes brought up half a dozen, and even nine or ten of them.

1435. If you had to make a Report of all of those cases, would not it sometimes occupy a great deal of time?—It would.

1436. Do you wish to make any remarks upon any other evidence which has been given?—That is the only one I heard. I was not here all the time that Mr. Dupré was being examined; but I was here when the first question was put to him as to how the Police of the island were chosen. He spoke of some of them being publicans. From what I know of those police officers who are publicans, they are spirit merchants; and the law will not allow them to retail a smaller quantity than a pint and a half; so that they are obliged to have a license to retail by the pint. They have no table: they do not sell liquor to drink in their house. There is not one in St. Hélier's who keeps a table and glasses for the retail of liquor.

1437. The Commissioners understood Mr. Dupré's evidence to apply rather to some of the Police who were merchants furnishing some of the taverns with spirits. Do you happen to be yourself a person who has taken an active part in the different political disputes which agitate this island?—Yes; the same as the Messrs. Godfray.

1438. Only on the other side?—Yes: that is all that there is between us, I suppose.

1439. As matters are conducted here, does your office of centenier enable you to be of considerable use and importance to your party?—No. I am rated at sixty quarters in the parish; and I have voted in the parish meetings just the same. Some people put me down as having a vote as belonging to the Police; but I have a vote besides that.

1440. Does your office of centenier enable you to be generally of use to your party? I do not mean to say by giving you the right of voting; but is it an office which it is advantageous to the party to have one of its members fill?—Not to me.

1441. Is it to your party?—I do not know whether it is to any others. I can only answer for myself.

1442. Of course you were elected to your office of centenier?—I was. I did not seek nor ask for it. The inhabitants elected me. It is very true, they have tried to get up an opposition to me; and, I think, the last time the opposition candidate had eight votes and I had more than three hundred.

1443. When you became centenier it was by election?—Yes; but I had a vote in the parish meetings before that.

1444. Was not your election a party election?—I do not think it was.

1445. Was there any body opposed to you?—Yes; there was a next-door neighbour of mine; and he had three or four votes.

1446. Then you were elected comparatively without opposition?—There was a trial: it was nearly unanimous; it was only to say it was not unanimous. Every time I have been elected, there has been one put forward that I might not be elected unanimously.

1447. Do I understand that you have been always elected and re-elected without opposition?—I cannot say it was without opposition; there was always one. I really believe that there was one put up that I might not be said to be elected unanimously.

---

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur further examined:

1448. I believe you are constable of the parish of St. Hélier's?—I am.

1449. When were you elected?—I think it was in November, 1839.

1450. The office of constable in town is a triennial election, is not it?—Yes; I have been elected without opposition; or, at least, with the exception of one or two votes.

1451. You have been twice re-elected?—I have been twice re-elected.

1452. To what extent are the officers of inferior rank subject to yourself? Have you the power of saying to a centenier, "You ought to have done this or that"?—I have the power to say so; but I have not the power to suspend, or remove them from office.

1453. Have you the power to compel them, in case you suggest any particular mode of attending to complaints, or watching the streets, to take your views?—If I required the assistance of a police officer, and he refused, I could make a report of it before the Court; but I know of no case where a constable has presented a report against a police officer for mere neglect or dereliction of duty.

1454. Have you, as head of the Police, any means of compelling the officers to act upon your views? For instance, if you had taken a particular view upon any question which we have inquired into?—Of course, I could give them general orders not to take any one to gaol, without obtaining the sanction of a Magistrate; and, if they refused, I could make a Report.

1455. Whom should you report to?—I should present the report to the Attorney General, who would read it in Court.

1456. In the Royal Court?—Yes.

1457. What would be the effect of that?—The Court would examine whether I had the power to give such orders or directions, and, I suppose, would either fine or suspend the police officer.

1458. The Cour Royale has the power of fining or suspending?—Most decidedly.

1459. To what ranks of the Police is that power applicable? Could they do so to a centenier?—With a centenier, and with the constable's officers.

1460. From the highest to the lowest rank?—Yes; without exception.

1461. In the case of their suspending a centenier, does that create a vacancy in the office?—As to suspension, I do not know whether the Court has suspended a centenier for a time; but there are some instances where a constable has been deprived of his office by the Court.

1462. Absolutely deprived of it?—Yes; and I suppose the Court could also suspend, if they could deprive. I do not recollect any case where an officer has been suspended.

1463. There are instances of his having been deprived?—Yes.

1464. Supposing you thought it important, upon any particular occasion, such as apprehending a riot or any thing of that kind, for the officers to meet you at a particular spot, must they obey you?—They are bound to assist, and obey the orders of the constable and centeniers in the discharge of their duty.

1465. They would be bound to obey you?—Yes.

1466. Does the way in which that assistance is to be rendered rest upon you?—If they refuse to assist me, I should present the report to the Court.

1467. If you were to issue a circular to the police, to say that they should meet the constable at a particular place and at a particular time, would they be bound to obey that?—Yes; I should think so.

1468. Suppose, for instance, you thought there was a riot likely to happen at the weigh-bridge, and the centenier said, "No, I think it is somewhere else."—The constable has the power of calling all the officers together at the time and place he thinks proper.

1469. They have not a discretion opposed to your's?—I think not.

The evidence of Mr. Le Cras was read to the witness.

1470. Is there any statement you wish to make upon the evidence you have heard?—When Mr. Le Cras came to my office, I asked him several questions relating to the assault he had complained of, and under what circumstances it had happened; and whether Mr. Seward did not complain to him of a paragraph that had appeared in a paper called the "Jersey News."

1471. Mr. Seward was the party who had committed the assault?—Yes. Mr. Le Cras prints his paper under the name of his son; whether to screen himself to a certain point against any responsibility or not, I cannot say. However, the paper does not appear in his own name.

1472. Did he give any answer to that?—I saw that a paragraph in the paper was the cause of the assault; and I told him that I would arrest Seward, and present a Report against him for the assault: but, with regard to Mr. Mahy, the police officer or vingtenier, I had ascertained that, when he was called upon by Mr. Sullivan, the affray was over, and that Mr. Le Cras had taken refuge in a house; that it was not in his vingtaine; and that it was doubtful how far he was bound to act: that it was the impression on Mr. Mahy's mind, at the time, that he had no such power, and he had referred Mr. Sullivan to one of the centeniers: therefore, I said that I would present no Report against Mr. Mahy, but that he might apply to the Crown officers, if he thought proper.

1473. That is as to Mr. Mahy?—Yes.

1474. Did you present a Report against Mr. Seward?—On the same day, I suppose on the same morning, I went to Mr. Seward's house, but did not find him. I called several times without seeing him; and, thinking that he was secreting himself, or at least that he was not disposed to show himself, I left word that I would take bail for his appearance in Court.

1475. You left word at his house?—Yes; I left word that I would take bail for his appearance in Court; that it would be much better for him to come forward, if he was at home. He came to the office some day in that week, with Mr. Copp, who remained bail for his appearance in Court. Seward asked me to put in the Report under what circumstances the assault had taken place. I said, that I might do so, but that I had not Le Cras's newspapers; and he promised to bring them down to the office; but he did so too late to enable me to write out the Report, before Mr. Le Cras presented a remonstrance in Court against Mr. Seward, praying for the ajonction of the Attorney General, which was granted. The remonstrance stated that I had refused also to arrest or take any proceedings against Mr. Seward; and I stated, at the time, that that was incorrect.

1476. The application on the part of Mr. Le Cras was a day after the assault was committed, was not it?—I think it was two days after; but I cannot say positively whether it was two days or the following day.

1477. Can you state at all what interval of time elapsed between the application of Mr. Le Cras to you and his presentation of his remonstrance?—I could not say for the present; but I think the remonstrance was presented the same Saturday; I am not positive. I mean the Saturday of the week in which the occurrence took place.

1478. What would have been the ordinary day for delivering your Report?—On the Saturday, if there had been time to write it out.

1479. The Saturday after the occurrence had been committed would have been the day for your presentation of the Report?—Generally Reports are presented, for what takes place during the week, on the Saturday.

1480. Did you, on the next Saturday, make a Report, or was not it ready by the next Saturday?—It was not ready when the remonstrance was read in Court.

1481. You think the remonstrance was presented on the Saturday?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.
11 September, 1846.

1482. You took bail of Mr. Seward before the Saturday?—Yes.

1483. In what amount?—I think it was 20*l.* I am not positive as to the amount, whether it was 20*l.* or 50*l.* In cases of common assault, when a party has obtained an ajonction of the Attorney General, which allows the Court to inflict a fine on the defendant, and also to give damages to the plaintiff, the Report of the constable, or the criminal prosecution, is generally dropped.

1484. Could they both proceed together?—There is no impossibility; at least, I suppose there is none; but still that is generally the course. As to proceeding together, that would be perhaps impossible, because, on the conclusions of the Attorney General, the party might be fined, or even sent to gaol, and of course he could not be committed in two different forms of proceeding for the same offence.

1485. That is owing to the cause en ajonction being itself a Crown proceeding?—Yes, to which the party himself is joined.

1486. So that the presentation of your Report after this became useless?—Yes; it became useless.

1487. Upon receiving Mr. Le Cras's complaint, and hearing his statement, I observe you went to Mr. Seward, the party complained against, and heard his statement?—Yes.

1488. You took security to keep the peace, and heard his statement?—Yes.

1489. In cases of crime generally, is it the course that the Police pursue, to examine, as far as they can, into the truth of the matter by examining both sides?—Certainly.

1490. In all cases?—Yes.

1491. For instance, if a person were accused of a crime, such as stealing, if the accused desired it, you would think it necessary to examine any thing that could be said on his behalf?—To hear what they had to say. There is a prior investigation made.

1492. The Report of the constable in Pigeon's case stated what the prisoner had said on being questioned on the subject?—Yes; it is the practice.

1493. It would also have said what any witness of their's had said, if there had been any?—Any thing important to show that it was doubtful whether they had committed the crime.

1494. The constable investigates?—Yes; and the constable's account of the investigation is entered in the Report; and indeed it is on the Report, and on informations given by the police officer who arrests the party, that the Crown officers are enabled to examine the witnesses, and frame the accusation on the Report or the statement of the constable. The Report is a statement made out of all the important circumstances of the case; and the accusation is drawn up by the Attorney General, usually on the Report: but, of course, if there is any important circumstance which is not mentioned in the Report, the Attorney General is not obliged entirely to ground his accusation on the Report.

1495. The Report forms the materials upon which he frames it?—Yes.

1496. Would there not be the risk of the accusation being ill framed, if the Attorney General were in ignorance of the defence proposed to be set up?—Yes; in some cases, when the accusation has not been exactly grounded on the Report, I think the Court has thrown out the accusation, or part of it.

1497. Is it your apprehension of the duty of the constable, that he is not merely to act upon the complaint of a party complaining, but to investigate the whole of the circumstances of the case before making his Report?—Most certainly, and to exercise to a certain extent his discretion. I must observe that, if the Police refuse to do their duty, the parties can always complain to the Attorney General or to the Court.

1498. May they make a complaint to the Court without making the Attorney General their medium?—If the Attorney General refused to take up the case, they could apply to the Court by means of a remonstrance.

1499. Is that to get a cause en ajonction?—Praying for redress, and stating that redress had been refused, either by the Attorney General or by the police officer.

1500. Do you recollect any instance of that?—I do not at the present moment.

1501. It would be to present a remonstrance against the party who had injured them, and not against the Police for not acting?—I think they could also present a complaint against the Police for not acting, if by their neglecting their duty they had suffered in any way.

1502. If they could show damage resulting to them from the neglect of the Police?—Yes.

1503. They would have a civil remedy?—There would be a civil remedy, unless the Court upon that statement directed the Attorney General to file an information or take some other ex officio proceeding.

1504. Can the Court direct the Attorney General to do that?—I should think so.

1505. (To Mr. Le Breton.) What should you say?—I should think not, except by way of suggestion.

1506. Are not your functions in effect judicial?—We give no decision. I consider that we are bound to put forward anything in favour of the prisoner.

1507. I understand that all prosecutions are instituted by the Attorney General, or, in his absence, by the Advocate General: they are judges of what ought to be prosecuted. Has the Court the power to order them to prosecute?—I do not think the Court has the power to do so.

1508. Or to review the exercise of their discretion?—No.

1509. Am I right in supposing that they are themselves a constituent part of the Court, acting as a criminal court?—The Court cannot be held without the presence of one of the Crown officers.

1510. Not even a civil court?—No.

1511. By the Crown officers now, you mean the Procureur Général or the Avocat Général?

—Yes; or, if they are both absent from the island, there must be an advocate sworn in to replace them.

1512. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) You think, in extraordinary cases, the Court would have the power at least to suggest a prosecution?—Yes; to request the Crown officers to institute proceedings. I never saw a Crown officer refuse to draw his conclusions in cases where the Court had requested him to do so. In cases, for instance, where any party had made a disturbance in Court, the Court would request the Attorney General to draw his conclusions against the party; and I have never seen the Attorney General refuse to do so: and I may say that I have seen him wait till the Court requested him to draw his conclusions, so that, to a certain extent, he considered himself bound to act on the request of the Court. I have here a case which has been handed to me by the Vicomte, where a police officer is condemned to a fine for having refused to assist a centenier. "L'an mille sept-cent vingt-huit, le vingt-cinquième jour de Mai, Mr. Simeon Du Prè, officier du connétable en la paroisse de Ste. Marie, est condamné à l'amende, à l'instance du Procureur du Roi, pour avoir refusé de sortir hors de l'église avec Mr. Jean Renouf, centenier en la dite paroisse, pour faire visite des cabarets et faire observer l'ordre durant le Service Divin, selon le devoir de sa charge, suivant les prémisses." With respect to the complaint of Mr. Le Cras, it is not the first complaint I have had from him. Here are two letters (producing the same) which were written to me by Mr. Abraham Jones Le Cras in 1842; complaints that he had been murderously assaulted in the public market, both he and his son, and requesting me to bind the party to keep the peace, and also to take measures to cause him to be dealt with according to law.

1513. In what way do you use these letters?—Mr. Le Cras had been assaulted, on account, of course, of an article which appeared in his paper, by Mr. Du Jardin. He complained of having been murderously assaulted, when a whip had been used. I suppose it was more to shew his contempt of the person than anything else.

1514. You introduce these letters to shew that Mr. Le Cras takes a rather exaggerated view of assaults upon himself?—Yes; that is the object of it. Mr. Le Cras now, I dare say, is on friendly terms with the party.

1515. Is there anything else you wish to add?—With respect to the affair of Stephen Thomas, and Mr. Chevalier's sending him home to dinner: I told Mr. Chevalier that his Report could not be presented before two o'clock, or nearly two o'clock. Shortly afterwards the Court broke up; so that the Report could not be presented on that day.

1516. (At the request of Mr. Le Cras.) With regard to the assault committed upon Mr. Le Cras and his son in 1842, did not you promise to enter a report against the assailant?—I did not: I do not suppose I ever saw his son about it.

1517. Is it customary for you to examine the contents of a newspaper to see whether the contents justify a breach of the peace?—Most certainly, if the party tells me that such a paragraph has appeared in a paper, and it has provoked an assault, I think it is my duty to examine it.

1518. I understand you to say that, where a party is charged with an assault which has been provoked by a paragraph in a newspaper, you think it your duty to examine the newspaper to ascertain what were the expressions used?—Yes; to examine the paragraph, that it may be stated in the Report to be presented to the Court. The Report is to be, and ought to be, in every case, not a one sided view of the case, but to show both the complaint of the party, and under what provocation the other party may have acted.

1519. How is it that the provocation which has appeared in a paragraph constitutes one side of the question, when a breach of the peace is the offence complained of?—If the paragraph in the newspaper is so very insulting as to have provoked a party to commit an assault, and the assault has not been violent, I think the Court would of course take into consideration under what circumstances the assault had taken place.

1520. I assume that, as a lawyer, and dealing with it as a strict question of law, you would admit that no paragraph in a newspaper could legally justify an assault?—Not legally: I do not speak of it as a justification, but only as an extenuating circumstance.

1521. As likely to be important in mitigation?—Yes.

1522. Do you think it part of the duty of a constable, not only to state those facts which constitute the crime in his report, but also those things which may have led to it?—Yes.

1523. All the collateral circumstances you think should form a part of the constable's Report?—Yes.

1524. Suppose a woman had murdered her husband, should you think it necessary to examine whether the husband had provoked her by infidelity?—Certainly: all those circumstances would be entered in the Report. If a murder took place by a husband of his wife under circumstances in which the husband found the wife committing adultery, it would be stated.

1525. Do you make any minute in your books of the bail which you take, and the names of the parties who give it?—No.

---

Mr. Weston Le Cras examined.

1526. Do you wish to state any circumstance to the Commissioners?—On the day the assault was committed upon me in 1842, I waited upon Mr. Le Sueur at his office, in the company of another person; and I showed him the marks of the assault which had been committed upon me that day. I stated the circumstances, and asked him what he intended to do in the matter. He said he should bind the assailant to keep the peace. I also asked whether he intended to enter a Report. He said that he should; which he has never done. This I am ready to state upon my oath.

JERSEY.

Mr. Weston Le Cras. 11 September, 1846.

1527. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Is your recollection consistent with that statement?—I have no recollection of having seen Mr. Weston Le Cras upon the subject. The letter is from the father; and, as Mr. Le Cras says he called at my office, he may have done so; but I have no recollection of the circumstance at all.

1528. Do you generally make any minute of those calls?—No: the minute which I made of the call of Mr. Bromer I produced to the Commissioners yesterday. Of course, if I am to act in the case, I make a note of the name, and so on.

1529. Do you keep those minutes?—To the day the Reports are entered, but not after.

1530. You did not in fact enter a Report against Mr. Du Jardin, did you?—No; I entered no Report. I bound him to keep the peace.

1531. What led you not to enter the Report?—I suppose I thought the assault was not sufficent to enter a Report upon: but in most of those cases, if there has been a provocation, the course is to present a remonstrance in Court, and ask for the ajonction of the Attorney General. That is usually the way in which those cases are disposed of.

---

Mr. Charles Carus Wilson.

Mr. Charles Carus Wilson examined.

1532. Have you any statement to make to the Commissioners?—I was walking up Gloucester Street, on a certain morning. I was suddenly struck with a very large stone in the small of the back. I looked round to see who the assailant was; and I found it to be a certain person who lodged in the same house. I ascertained the names of two persons who saw the assault, and took the stone and a written statement to Mr. Le Sueur, at his office, by appointment. He promised to enter a Report and proceed. From that day to this he has done nothing.

1533. Mr. Le Sueur. I saw the party, and ascertained that you had provoked her, and addressed very insulting language to her, and that she had taken up the stone and thrown it at you.

1534. Mr. Wilson. I never spoke to her upon any one occasion.

---

J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

John Le Couteur, Esq. (Viscount) examined.,

1535. I believe you are the Vicomte of the Island of Jersey?—I am.

1536. It is an office of considerable importance in the Island?—It is.

1537. How long have you been Vicomte?—Nearly four years.

1538. Does the appointment to the office rest with the Crown?—It is by Letters Patent of the Crown, during pleasure.

1539. Will you tell the Commissioners what the duties of the office of Vicomte are?—He has the charge of the prison, with the assistance of the Prison Board. Anciently he had it nearly solely in his own charge, under the guidance of the Bailiff. Since the establishment of the Prison Board, his duties have merged in a considerable degree with those of that Board. All summonses are issued from his office in criminal cases. He is sheriff, and may make all arrests.

1540. Does the summons in criminal cases extend to the summons of people to give evidence?—Yes.

1541. He is also, I believe, the executive officer of the Crown in the Island?—Yes. He is also Coroner.

1542. Will you inform the Commissioners in what mode the Coroner's Inquest is held. Is the Inquest held by the Coroner of his own authority, or is it by direction from the Court to hold an inquest?—By direction of the Bailiff. A Report is made in the first instance to the Crown officer, and to the Vicomte, that a death has taken place. That Report is made by the constable, or one of the police officers of the parish in which a sudden or violent death has happened. The Vicomte then obtains an order from the Bailiff to hold the inquest, and assembles twelve men, and they hear evidence.

1543. Do the Attorney and Solicitor General form part of the inquest?—The Attorney General attends with the Vicomte.

1544. Evidence is heard?—The jury are sworn; and evidence is then given, but not on oath.

1545. Have you the oath which is taken by the jury?—

"Vous jurez et promettez, par la foi et serment que vous devez à Dieu, que bien et fidellement vous rapporterez comment vous croyez que la mort est arrivée à——; ce que vous ferez sans faveur, haine ou partialité, comme vous voudrez en répondre devant Dieu, à l'acquit de vos consciences."

1546. The evidence which is given is not upon oath?—No.

1547. Is the case summed up at all to the jury?—No; it is not.

1548. Is the Attorney General heard at all?—The Attorney General asks what questions he thinks proper.

1549. And then the jury give their verdict?—The jury give their verdict.

1550. Does that terminate the proceedings altogether?—The jury is summoned to attend the following Saturday, to justify their verdict before the Court. Notes of the evidence are invariably taken in writing, and kept in my office. I should say that these inquests are usually held by the Deputy Vicomte, except in his absence, when I hold them myself.

1551. The verdict is recorded?—The verdict is recorded in the presence of three Jurats. The Bailiff and three Jurats must sit to receive that verdict.

1552. What is the number of persons who constitute the coroner's jury?—Twelve.

1553. How are they selected?—Properly they are selected by the Vicomte. Sometimes the constable in the country parishes assists in finding them; but, strictly speaking, it is the Vicomte.

JERSEY.

J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

11 September, 1846.

1554. Are they the nearest twelve men who can be assembled?—The nearest twelve respectable men who can be assembled. In cases of poisoning, or serious cases, a surgeon or two surgeons are called in. Every possible pains is taken to select, not only the most respectable men possible on the jury, but to obtain all the evidence that can be obtained; and we have adjourned from day to day on various occasions where it was necessary to investigate very fully.

1555. Is it necessary that the jury should come from a particular parish?—No; it is not so; but we generally take them, as matter of convenience, from the parish.

1556. You said that an inquest took place when there was a murder or violent death: I suppose also when a body is found?—Invariably in all cases of uncertain death.

1557. Upon whose discretion, in the first instance, does it rest whether application should be made to you to hold an inquest?—It rests with the Police in the first instance. If we do not receive information, we are not supposed to act officially. If a flagrant case occurred, no doubt the Attorney General would take notice of it.

1558. In case of the neglect of the Police, the Procureur Général could call upon you to attend, could he not?—I should think so.

1559. (To Mr. Le Breton.) In case of violent death, and the constable neglecting to apply for a coroner's inquest, should you do so?—Yes; I should mention the circumstances to the Bailiff, who has the power of ordering the inquest. It would remain in the discretion of the Bailiff to issue a writ or not.

1560. In case of a coroner's inquest being called, and a verdict being returned of wilful murder, do not the proceedings still go on before the Criminal Court? If a person is apprehended, he is brought up, and the whole proceedings follow in the same order as they would do upon a Report from the Police?—Yes; the constable would equally make his Report, quite independent of the Report of the Coroner's Inquest. The inquest is merely to report the cause of the death.

1561. Are the jury sworn on the Saturday to the truth of their verdict?—No; they are called before the Court, and confirm their Report by virtue of the oath which has been administered to them.

Adjourned to to-morrow, at ½ past 10 o'clock.

Saturday, September 12, 1846.

J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

12 September, 1846.

John Le Couteur, Esq. (Viscount), further examined.

1562. Will you proceed with any further observations which you may have to make to the Commissioners?—I should like to be allowed to make one or two other observations relative to coroner's inquests. I think that the witnesses should be heard upon oath. I see a very great inconvenience, and also that the witnesses are put in a false position by being merely examined as they are now. A witness will sometimes say, on mere parol evidence, what he would not say upon oath; he would be more careful in the latter case; and I believe it would be more advantageous to the ends of justice, and enable the Attorney General to frame his case better, if the witness spoke the entire truth under oath at the first examination before the coroner. We have sometimes seen discrepancies between evidence given before the coroner and that afterwards given upon oath before the Royal Court.

1563. Perhaps that would be strengthened by the fact that the investigation, not only does not take place upon oath, but takes place in a less formal meeting, where you are all standing round the body?—Yes.

1564. You would therefore say that it would be the more necessary to be on oath?—The whole proceeding does not take place in the presence of the body; because, after the viewers have seen the body, and are satisfied with the report of the surgeon, they retire to a room.

1565. It is rather a meeting of twelve or thirteen gentlemen together, than a court sitting in form?—Perhaps so.

1566. Before becoming Viscount, you had served the office of Jurat, had you not?—Both of Constable and Jurat.

1567. You have had a great deal of experience, in those capacities, in administering the criminal law of this country?—To a great extent. I have been twenty five years connected with the Police of the parishes of the island in one way or the other. I was six years constable, and rather more than two years Jurat, and since that Viscount, four years.

1568. The latter is an office connected with the administration of criminal justice, is it not?—Yes. I think I have derived more information from searching the Rolls of the Orders in Council, and assisting in making a précis of 806 Orders in Council, than in any other way.

1569. One of the members of your family held the distinguished rank of Deputy Bailiff for many years, whose manuscripts you have made it your care to investigate and study?—Yes; Sir John Dumaresq.

1570. In point of fact, you are acquainted practically, during your own time, with the working of the system, and, by the records you have in your possession, with the working of the system before your time, in the time of Sir John Dumaresq?—Yes; Mr. Le Geyt was also an ancestor of mine.

1571. One gentleman, who was under examination here, stated that he thought it extremely important, not only with reference to the coroner's inquests, but to ordinary acts of accusation, that the evidence should be given on oath previously to the Attorney General framing his accusation. Do the remarks you have made as to coroner's inquests apply also to those?—That would require a little consideration. It would entirely alter the form of the law here. I think, if a proper magistrate were established like a Justice de paix in France, or a police court in England, it would be most advantageous to the public at large to have all depositions taken before him on oath.

1572. Do you think, having had the advantage of your very long experience, that any person ought to be put on his trial for a criminal charge before some evidence has been taken on oath for the purpose of committing him?—It would be very desirable that a magistrate should sit for that particular purpose, and give as summary a decision as possible upon it.

1573. It would be desirable that a magistrate should sit for the purpose of taking evidence upon oath before committing a person to take his trial?—Certainly. I have found a precedent for confiscating goods in case of suicide. That I believe to be the law now; but it has never been the practice.

"L' An mille sept-cent vingt-neuf le douz^me^ jour d' Avril, sur le Rapport de Jean Briard, François Hamon, Phillippe Le Brun, Elie Vibert, Thomas Le Maistre, Elie Mauger, Josue Esnouf, et Philippe le Gresley, qui assistèrent à la visite et levée du cadavre de Jean le Gresley, trouvé noyé dans la mare de S^t^. Ouen, lesquels ont été cejourd'huy convenus en Cour par le Procureur du Roy pour déclarer à la justice de quelle manière la mort seroit arrivée au dit Jean le Gresley, la Cour, les conclusions des officiers du Roi sur ce ouyes, a confisqué tous les biens meubles du dit Jean de Gresley au bénéfit du Roy ou des seigneurs de fief auxquels il appartient, excepté les droits de varage clutage et entamage appartenant au Vicomte, vu que la pluralité de dits hommes, sçavoir dix des douze, sont d'opinion que le dit Jean de Gresley se seroit precipité et causé la mort à luy mesme sans l'aide ni participation d'autruy."

1574. Can you from your knowledge recollect any Report of an inquest in which the technical language of felony is applied to homicide de soi même?—I think not.

1575. Will you tell the Commissioners the shape in which the verdict of the jury is taken when a person dies by his own hand?—

Mr. Philip De Ste. Croix (Deputy Viscount). "Qu'il s'est lui même donné la mort, en se pendant par le cou, ou en se coupant la gorge, dans un moment d'aliénation mentale," as it may appear by the evidence.

1576. Is that the invariable verdict?—That is the invariable verdict which is returned.

1577. (To the Viscount.) You were reading to the Commissioners a verdict which differed from that?—In this instance it is "que le dit Jean le Gresley se seroit precipité et causé la mort à lui même sans l'aide ni participation d'autruy."

1578. What is the date of that finding?—The 12th April, 1729.

1579. If, in searching through the ancient records of the Vicomte's office, you can find any inquest in which the verdict of the jury is that of felo de se, or in any way differing from this, perhaps you will be kind enough to present it to the Commissioners?—I will do so.

1580. In case of murder, does the coroner's inquest find the fact that the death was occasioned by the crime of another person?—It would state that it was wilful murder. The return of the jury is usually embodied in the Report; all the information they collect the constable embodies in his Report. In every case where a murder took place, the Report of the constable would be made to the coroner instantly; and then, the coroner's inquest being held, the Attorney General would frame his prosecution upon the Report of the constable.

1581. In point of strictness, the accusation is framed upon the constable's Report, though the coroner's inquest is one of the elements of that Report. The inquest itself is not sufficient to set the Attorney General in motion?—I would rather refer that question to the Attorney General himself. I do not understand here that the constable could avoid making his Report. He could not avoid noticing that a verdict of wilful murder had been recorded. Here is a Rapport made in the case of natural death.

"Convenus à l'instance des off^rs^ du Roy, pour déclarer par quel accident la mort seroit arrivée à Mons^r^. Phle. Falle, trouvé mort dans le lieu où il faisoit sa démeure, ont à nous declaré, comme lors de la visite et levée du cadavre sur serment devant le Dénonç^r^ Aubin, agiss^t^ pour le Vicomte, croire en leurs consciences que la mort serait venue au dit Falle subitem^t^ sans aide de luy même ny d'autruy."

1582. What is the technical name of the inquest?—Levée de corps. There has been a dispute with respect to the mode of paying the coroner. In 1828, on the 5th of April, Mr. Le Gallais, the Deputy Viscount, presented an account for 193*l.* sterling for the coroner's inquests.

1583. Presented to whom?—It was originally presented to the King's Receivers. The account was referred by the Receivers to Lord Beresford, then Governor of the Island, who objected to pay it.

1584. Formerly the fees for holding coroner's inquests were defrayed out of the revenues of the Crown, were not they?—Yes. The Deputy Viscount actioned the King's Receivers before the full Court.

1585. What was the last time that those expenses were paid by the Crown?—I should think about the year 1825 or 1826. The Deputy Viscount sued the Receivers before the Royal Court: and the Court ruled that, in future, the Governor should pay for Inquests held on the bodies of persons who had been in the service of his Majesty; the Island for those of strangers; and the parishes for their respective inhabitants.

1586. Then an action was brought, the judgment upon which was exclusively prospective, as to future practice?—Yes.

1587. Is that usual?—They wanted to avoid picking a quarrel with the Receivers.

1588. The judgment in that action is in fact the law?—It is what we follow now, or at least we try to follow it; but the Parish of St. Hélier refuses to pay our account, though we have paid the jury their 2*s.* 6*d.* each.

1589. Each juror receives 2*s.* 6*d.* on a Levée de Corps?—Yes.

1590. The verdict of a Levée de Corps is called the Rapport, is not it?—Yes.

1591. Did not the Cour Royale give some judgment in the particular action?—I will obtain that for the Commissioners.

It was put in and read as follows.

A la Cour Royale de l'île de Jersey.—L'an mil huit-cent vingt-six, le vingt-deuxième jour de Septembre. Sur l'action du Procureur Général du Roi vers Hélier Touzel, écuyer, et Matthieu Amiraux, écuyer, Récéveurs des Revenus de Sa Majesté en cette île, pour voir ordonner par justice sur la représentation faite à la Cour de la part de Monsr. Jean Millais, tant pour lui même que pour les autres hommes, qui ont assisté aux levées de corps de quatre étrangers, dont les rapports furent présentés devant la Cour, le 20me jour de Janvier dernier, au sujet du refus du Député Vicomte de leur payer ce qui leur est dû pour avoir assisté aux dites levées, prétendant que Messrs. les Récéveurs des Revenus de Sa Majesté lui ont déclaré qu'ils ne s'y croyoient pas sujets, le tout selon qu'il est contenu en l'acte, en date de l'an 1825, le 20me jour de Janvier, suivant les prémisses, et ouir droit et jugement par devant le corps de la Cour, suivant à l'envoi de la cause, par acte en date de l'an 1825, le 26me jour de Février. La Cour a jugé que les frais des levées de corps des personnes qui manquent de moyens doivent être portés, savoir: Par la recette des Revenus de Sa Majesté pour les personnes au Service de Sa Majesté, et ceux de la famille de telles personnes; par le public pour les étrangers; et par les paroisses pour leurs habitans respectivement. Partant que les frais des levées de corps des quatre personnes dont il s'agit présentement doivent être portés par le public.

FRS. GODFRAY, Greffier.

1592. So that, as far as the sentence of the Court can effect it, the expense of inquests held upon bodies of men who have been in the service of Her Majesty is paid by the Governor; and those held upon other people ought to be paid, according to the judgment, in the case of strangers by the Island, and of others by the parish in which they reside.—Yes; that is, for the poor of the parish: in the case of a rich family they pay for the inquest.

1593. What was the result as to the 193*l.*?—It was paid upon my motion by the States provisionally. I was constable of St. Brélade's at that time.

1594. That reserved the right of the States against the Receiver General?—Yes. With regard to the enditement, I have cited some precedents; and I have come to the point where Rouillé shews the enditement is to be composed of twelve "indifferent" men or "impartial" men. Upon this ground, and my own experience, as a constable and having presided at the enditement myself, I object to the constitution of our enditement.

1595. You think it is not conformable to the law?—I do not think it is in the spirit of the law.

1596. You object to the composition of it by the Police because they are not indifferent men?—I will state distinctly the view I take to the Commissioners. I will point out, from Le Geyt, and from the work of Messieurs Dumaresq and Hémery, that they support my view. I find in the "Manuscrits de Philippe Le Geyt," under the title Enditemens, p. 251: "En 1563, le 17 Mars, il est dit que six hommes sermentez rapportoyent que deux accusez étoyent plustost larrons que loyaux, &c. Et en 1611, le 20 Juillet, que, le connétable et six sermentez de St. Ouen se trouvant différens sur le crime de Rachel Le Blanc, justice n'avait pu tirer outre et avait différé jusqu'à la prochaine Cour de Cattel, pour avoir l'avis des Justiciers absens; avec charge aux officiers de s'informer plus amplement. La même année, le 5 Décembre, il est dit que, si les sermentez varient, il en faut douze pour enditer." Then he goes on to quote what is done in England:—"Voilà, comme je crois, l'origine du nombre de douze sermentez qui doivent à cette heure dans les enditemens accompagner le connétable ou centenier de la paroisse du criminel, et jamais moins." In England, inquests of malefactors ought to be by twelve lawful men. "Concordes Scil. Le nombre y est ordinairement de dix-sept, dix-neuf et vingt-un."

1597. Are not the sermentez the same as the officers of the constable?—I suspect that formerly they did not take the constable's officers, but that they took twelve respectable men, not the principaux. I think I have read that somewhere. I am speaking from memory; but my impression is that they were not officiers de connétable, but that they were twelve indifferent men.

1598. Are not the officiers de connétable also called sermentés?—I think not. We have sermentés de vraic, but not others.

1599. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Are the officiers de connétable now, or were they ever at any time, called sermentés?—I have never heard them so called.

1600. Mr. Francis Godfray (Greffier.) I believe they were anciently so called.

1601. (To the Viscount.) In point of fact, the people who formed the enditement in the passage cited by you are called sermentés.—Yes.

1602. In that case six of them found the verdict?—Six with the constable.

1603. Is the constable mentioned there?—No; but they could not sit without the constable.

1604. If you liken it to a grand jury, and your view is that the constable must preside, that would tend to show that they must have been Police. If they resembled a Jury of Examination, they would have elected their own foreman?—The constable is afterwards mentioned; the constable and six sermentés are mentioned.

1605. Your theory is, that the six who are mentioned there, together with the constable, make up in number seven, the majority which is necessary to find a prisoner guilty.—Exactly so.

1606. How do you account for the constable not appearing, and six sermentés appearing by themselves, in the Act of Court of 1563?—It was the same process; the six appeared with their constable; only the constable does not happen to be mentioned.

1607. Mr. F. Godfray (Greffier.) The following are the two Acts of Court which are alluded to in the extract which has been read from Mr. Le Geyt.

JERSEY.

The same are read as follow.

J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

12 September, 1846.

"A la Cour Royale de l'Isle de Jersey.—L' An mil-six cent onze, le vingt-unième jour de Juillet. Par devant Monsr. Bailly, présents Daniel Dumaresq, Hugh Lemprière, Hélier De Carteret, Elie Dumaresq, Clement Dumaresq, Aaron Messervy, Philippe Journeaux, Jurés.

"Hélier Le Montays, connétable de la paroisse de St. Ouen, Jean Ricard, Thomas Bichard, Jean Fondan, Magdolain Le Cerf, William Le Rossignol, sermentés de la dite paroisse, soy trouvant différens sur l'enditement de Rachel Le Blancq, Justice n'a pu tirer outre en la cause touchant l'homicide de Jennette Le Blancq, dont elle est suspectée, et partant les Justiciers présens ont différé la cause decy à la prochaine Cour de Cattel, et commandé au dit connétable et sermentés d'y garder leur jour, pour avoir l'avis et bon conseil de Messrs. de Justice absens, donnant charge au dit connétable et sermentés s'informer plus amplement de la cause, et de saisir la personne de la dite Rachel et l'apprehender en justice. Le dit William admis sermenté en cette cause.

"A la Cour Royale de l'Isle de Jersey.—Mars 18. L'an mill vts. lxiij. le xviijième jor. du moys Mars. Par devant Monsr. le Bailly, présents John Lemprière, N. De Soulemont, Ts. De Soulemont, L. Hamptoñe, Jurés.

"Après le Rapport de Philippe Le Boutillier, connétable de la paroisse de la Trinité, John Le Masurier, Philippe Romeril, Philippe Bisson, Thomas Cabot et Helier Bisson, sermentés de la dite paroisse, lesquels nous ont rapporté par leurs serments qu'ils croyaient en leurs consciences que Jacques Le Gros et Philippe Grandin sont plustôt larrons que loyaux, à raison de quoi les dits Jacques Le Gros et Philippe Grandin sont regardés aller, en détention corporelle, au château, en prison fermée comme criminels, et est commandé au Vicomte ou Dénonciateur en faire l' exploit."

1608. (To the Viscount.) I understand you to say that you think the origin of the enditement consisting of twelve was the decree of the Court in 1611?—The difficulty found in this case, which was decided by a decree of the Court of the 5th of December, 1611, that, if the sermentés differ, there must be twelve to make the enditement.

1609. The Court there say that, if the sermentés differ, there must be twelve to form a jury, and then that seven must agree to find him guilty?—Yes.

1610. Your opinion is, that the sermentés were not officers of the Police, but were sworn for that purpose?—I do not positively say that: but I think I have read that the constable might call upon any twelve respectable men to act.

Mr. Dupré (Avocat Général). The acte of the 20th of June, 1611, shews that the men of the enditement were members of the Police. Five are called "sermentés," and the sixth "admis sermenté en cette cause". The party accused was not in custody. The same appears from the acte of the 18th of March, 1563. The arrest is ordered on the rapport of the enditement. The proceedings were only preliminary, being the report of the Police to authorize the detention and trial of the accused. The evidence before the men of the enditement was taken out of court.

1611. (To the Viscount.) You would say that that which you find in the entry of 1563, namely the constable and six men, represents the origin of the jury of twelve, mentioned in the passage from the "Stille de Procéder: Du procédement à la vue et enqueste des dicts et bref, et clameur de haro?"—Yes. I said I objected to the constitution of our enditement. In what I am about to say, I am speaking particularly of my own parish, and within my own knowledge.

1612. Your parish was St. Brélade's?—Yes; it is a country parish, with a seaport attached to it. I have known instances, where an individual, who has committed an offence, has been taken up and conducted to prison by the police officers, and I had those same individuals sitting on the enditement afterwards.

1613. You differ from the evidence given the other day, then?—If an officer saw the act committed, or saw the person immediately on the act being committed, you would not have that individual be on the jury: but those who took him up and are in conversation with those who seized him, whose minds may be more or less prejudiced, in consequence of the conversations they may have held with such individual as may have arrested him, would be received.

1614. Perhaps the number of Police in a country parish is so limited that, if you take the enditement from the Police, you must be obliged to take somebody connected more or less with the crime?—We are generally obliged to do so. There is also this other case, that, if the prisoner should happen to be a near relative of one of the Police, the case becomes still more complicated. No man, I consider, under those conditions, can fairly, according to our old Rouillé, be called "indifferent," or ought to sit on a jury to try a person whom they have conducted to prison. It appears to me that a very easy remedy would have been found by making the constable and twelve men from the Eastern district, we will say from Grouville, or St. Martin's or Trinity, sit for the trial of crimescommitted in St. Brélade, St. Ouen or in St. Mary's. That would have got rid of the difficulty at once.

1615. You mean that, supposing you have no choice as to the constables' men, you might mitigate the evil by that expedient?—Yes. They would have no connexion with the prisoner. I do not agree with Messrs. Hémery and Dumaresq upon this point. In page 42, they say, "We need not, as we conceive, point out the impropriety of this course of proceeding. The constable and his twelve officers are styled in the language of the country "l'Enditement," and, when the majority of them find the prisoner 'rather guilty' (this is the term of their Report) 'than innocent,' he is said to be criminally indicted, and a jury, if demanded by the prisoner, is then called to try the fact. This first inquiry carries in all its parts such striking features of the functions of a Grand Jury in England, as leave no room to doubt but that they were originally constituted for the same purpose, and (proportion kept) both equally well adapted for this preliminary step in a criminal suit." I do not think they are equally well adapted, because the Grand Jury in England can have no connexion, direct or indirect, with any person who can be brought before them.

1616. You think this worse than our Grand Jury?—Certainly I do.

1617. The Grand Jury, you are aware, except in London, are usually gentlemen of fortune and education?—Yes. The remedy would appear to be easy. The Parish Assembly in January, when the rate is fixed, might select a number of intelligent men to serve as jurors. Those should be sent in to the proper officer.

1618. Whom would you call the proper officer?—I do not think the Crown Prosecutor is the proper officer. The Sheriff would be a proper person. He should draw a certain number of names by lot from each district. A Western jury to try offences committed in the East, and an Eastern jury those committed in the West. This does not exactly belong to the examination; but, as it is a fact, I will bring it forward. In our Agricultural Society, which has been formed ten years, we have adopted that system of having committees of the Western district to adjudge the cattle in the Eastern, and the contrary: and we have found it most advantageous. It has given universal satisfaction. I think the principle would hold good in juries, and that an impartial judgment would be likely to be obtained.

1619. With respect to the Parish Assembly, you are aware that a great deal of evidence has been given before us, that it is in itself very much subject to the influence of the Police. The names, you say, are still to be selected by the Assembly: they could not pack the jury therefore; but they could pack the panel?—I think the names would be fairly selected. What would it signify to one party or the other, that a given number of men should do justice in criminal matters?

1620. According to your view, the selection being antecedent to any particular cause, their interest might be one way just as much as the other?—Exactly so. They would be named for the year.

1621. A jury then might be selected by the Parish Assembly as at present constituted?—I do not mean to go the length of saying as at present constituted.

1622. Assuming the constitution of the Parish Assembly to remain as vicious as it has been represented to be by certain witnesses, do you still think a jury could be fairly selected by such an assembly?—A very great improvement might be obtained.

1623. You are perhaps aware that, according to all the theories of the original constitution of the enditement, that would still be a greater deviation than any one you have yet suggested, because you violate the principle of the vicinage?—That is only in the grand enquête.

1624. The old principle was, that they were to come as near as possible to witnesses of the offence?—I differ from that entirely.

1625. As the enditement is at present constituted, do you know whether the prisoner has any right of challenge?—Yes; he may challenge them for a cause.

1626. Is it also the fact that the Attorney General may exclude any person who is near akin?—No doubt of it.

1627. So that there is a mode, in the hands both of the accused and the Crown, to object for reasonable cause to any member of the enditement?—Certainly.

1628. This difficulty would still remain, that no challenge would get rid of the esprit de corps. Though you might get rid of a relative of the person charged, the enditement would be composed of a body among whom there would be an esprit de corps injurious to a fair consideration of the case?—Yes.

1629. Are you aware whether this Island is so split into divisions that there is a jealousy between two different parishes, so that there may be for instance a feud between the parish of St. Brélade and the parish of St. Martin?—No; there is nothing of that kind.

1630. Are there no parochial feuds of one parish against another?—No, nothing like it. I wish to add that the evidence before the enditement should be given vivâ voce. I think it would be so according to the law as it stands now. Dumaresq and Hémery, and Le Geyt before them, all recommend that the evidence should be vivâ voce. At page 44 in Dumaresq and Hémery's work you will find this passage. "For it were to be wished that the men, who compose both the one and the other, should themselves hear the witnesses vivâ voce:" and Mr. Le Geyt, at the word Enditement, page 253, says: "Je n'estime point néanmoins qu'il ne soit encore permis de produire des témoins et des preuves après l'Enditement, et même le jour où l'Enquête passe. Car il serait à souhaiter que les hommes, tant de l'un que de l'autre, peussent entendre eux mêmes les témoins de vive voix."

1631. Looking at that passage of Mr. Le Geyt, it would appear that, at the time he was writing, vivâ voce evidence was taken before the enditement?—Yes; I see it bears that inference.

1632. The statement of Hémery and Dumaresq, learned as it is, was a statement drawn up for the purpose of showing that trial by jury was the law of this State, was not it?—Not exactly. It was to deduce from ancient practice that trial by jury was very desirable to be established here. The fact is, that they wished to carry it into civil cases as well as criminal. There was a strong contest between the two parties.

1633. I understand, that an Act had been passed by the States recommending or introducing as the law trial by jury, which applied to all cases civil and criminal?—Yes.

1634. The Cour Royale objected to that law, and appealed to the Privy Council against its enactment; and, upon that, the Privy Council directed Messieurs Hémery and Dumaresq, who were supporters of the law passed by the States, to draw up a statement of the mode of proceeding in civil and criminal cases for their information, and upon the other side the Attorney and Solicitor General for the time being, Mr. Durell and Mr. Pipon, were to draw a contrary statement, stating what their view of the law was?—I do not know that it was a contrary statement. It was their own view. I find they agree in a good many points.

1635. They agree in the authorities to which they refer; but they draw different deductions?—Yes. But I think both state the law fairly. I now beg to present to the Commissioners what I consider a very important case. I have always considered the decisions of the Sovereign in Council as positive law. The following is an Act dated 20th of April, 1727.

"L'An Mille Sept-cent Vingt-Sept, le Vingt^e Jour d'Avril, Sur l'action du Proc^r. du Roy, et de Guillaume Dumaresq, Esc^r., Récéveur des Revenus de Sa Majesté, et de George de la Bère Gent, délateur, ajoints vers Mons^r. Brélade, en cette Isle de Jersey, le 21^e jour de Septembre 1726, et ensuite sequestrées, par ordre de la Cour, entre les mains du Député Vicomte, où elles sont encore, po^r. avoir, contraire à deux Actes de Parlement, l'un de l'an 12^e du regne du Roy Charles Second d' heureux mémoire, comunement appelé l'acte de Navigation, et l'autre de l'an 7^e du regne de notre Souverain Sire George, Roy de La Grande Bretagne &c., fait apporter en fraude dans un certain vaisseau étranger, nomé le St. Esprit, et navigué par des étrangers, les susdites marchandises des Indes Orientales, dans le havre ou port de la Tour, ordinairem^t. appelé la Chausée de St. Aubin, et du bord d'iceluy vaisseau, le St. Esprit, avoir fait décharger les dites march^dises, partie de la cargaison du dit vaisseau, le St. Esprit, dans un bateau ou chaloupe étrangere, dont Guill^me le Noble, aussi étranger, étoit maistre, quel bateau, avec les d^tes march^dises, auroit ensuite mis à terre, et seroit demeuré à sec proche la maison d'Edouard Touzel, Gent, à S^t. The Crown Officers appealed: and here is a case, which I maintain to be the law of the Island. It is dated on the 26th of March 1729, and was registered here on the 10th of May following.

"Upon reading this day at the Board a Report from the Right Honorable the Lords of the Committee for the affairs of Jersey and Guernsey, dated the 7th of this instant March in the words following, viz.:—Your Majesty having been pleased, by your Order in Council of the 12th of June 1728, to refer unto this Committee the humble petition of Philip Le Geyt, William Dumaresq, and George de la Bere, setting forth their having appealed from a sentence passed in the Royal Court of the Island of Jersey on the 20th of April 1727, in favor of La Laude Magon, Le Balue Magon, and De Premeny, French, owners of some East India goods brought into the said Island, and also in favor of William Noble, Master of the Shallop, on board which the said goods were seized, upon an information filed by the petitioners against the said Magon and others, to have the said India goods condemned, one moiety to Your Majesty and the other moiety to the informer, by virtue of two Acts of Parliament, of the 12th of King Charles the Second and the 7th of King George the First, as being imported into the said Island contrary to the said Acts; and complaining of several extraordinary proceedings during the hearing of the said cause in the said Courts, particularly with regard to the said Courts ordering and admitting several of the witnesses for the French owners to bring their evidence ready written into Court, notwithstanding the petitioners objected thereto, and then not making any entry of such order on record, and afterwards preventing the petitioners from cross-examining such witnesses, as to such points as they apprehended material in the said cause; and therefore prayed that the said sentence might be reversed, and relief granted them in the premises. And your Majesty having been pleased by another Order, of the 6th of November 1728, to refer unto this Committee the humble petition of the said La Laude Magon and the other respondents in this appeal, praying that so much of the above mentioned petition as relates to interlocutory proceedings before the final judgment was given may be discharged, and that the appellants may be confined to the matter of their appeal from the said final judgment. The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to your Majesty's said Orders, this day took both the said petitions into their consideration, and heard all parties therein concerned by their counsel learned in the law; and it appeared to their Lordships that several of the witnesses for the respondents had been admitted in a very extraordinary and unprecedented manner to bring their evidence ready written into Court, and that the appellants had not been allowed free liberty to cross-examine such witnesses, and the Court had not entered on record several resolutions or orders they had come to upon the objections which had been made thereto by the appellants, by means whereof the appellants had no opportunity to show by the record whether they had demanded an appeal to your Majesty from such proceedings. And their Lordships, considering that the evidence, thus taken, is the foundation of the sentence passed by the said Court, are humbly of opinion that the said sentence ought to be reversed, and that the said Royal Court should be directed to proceed to a new trial of this cause, and that the witnesses on both sides be examined in Court, vivâ voce, with liberty to each party to cross-examine all such witnesses, and to reduce their evidence into writing, after they shall be so respectively examined; and that the said Court should, within three months time, proceed in a legal manner to hear and determine the cause, and give judgment therein according to law, with liberty to either party, who shall demand the same, to appeal therefrom. And that, whatever resolutions the Court shall come to during the course of such new trial, they do enter up the same by way of order, if desired or insisted upon by either party, so as to appear upon the Acts of the Court. And that this should be a general standing order, to be observed, not only in this cause, but in all other causes for the future. And that the said Royal Court should be commanded to pay a strict regard to the due observance thereof, and not presume in any case to deviate therefrom. His Majesty this day took the said Report into His Royal consideration, and was pleased, with the advice of His Privy Council, to approve thereof, and to order, as it is hereby ordered, that the said sentence, passed in the Royal Court of Jersey on the 20th of April 1727, be reversed, and that the said Royal Court do proceed to a new trial of this cause, and examine the witnesses on both sides in Court vivâ voce, and do give liberty to each party to cross examine all such witnesses, and do reduce their evidence into writing, after they shall have been so respectively examined; and that the said Court do, within three months' time, proceed in a legal manner to hear and determine the cause and give judgment therein according to law, and allow liberty to either party, who shall demand the same, to appeal therefrom. And that, whatever resolutions the Court shall come to during the course of such new trial, they do enter up by way of order, if desired or insisted upon by either party, so as to appear upon the Acts of the Court; and that this be a general standing order to be observed, not only in this cause, but in all causes for the future. And the Bailiff and Jurats of His Majesty's said Royal Court of Jersey, and all others whom it may concern, are to pay a strict regard to His Majesty's pleasure hereby signified, and not presume in any case whatever to deviate therefrom."

1636. You think that that is inconsistent with the present method?—Our evidence is not given strictly vivâ voce.

1637. It says that it is to be given vivâ voce, and taken down in writing. The essential point of difference between the two systems, as at present adverted to, is that, though in each case you have the evidence taken vivâ voce, and taken down in writing, the enditement or inquest to try does not hear it. The evil, which caused the reversal of the judgment, is not that the enditement or grande enquête did not hear it, because there was none, but that the party brought the evidence into Court ready written, and merely handed it in.—Yes.

1638. The informality, upon which this appeal was taken, was that the witnesses came into Court with a statement on paper, and handed it in. The Privy Council say, that is an incorrect mode of taking evidence; and they direct then that evidence shall be given vivâ voce. Before the enditement, no evidence is now taken at all; but the evidence, which has been taken vivâ voce, and transmitted to writing and subjected to cross-examination on behalf of the party, is read over to the enditement; so that the evidence is taken in accordance with this very order which you have now read.—Except that it is not before the jury. That is very important; the single reading of evidence in a long cause is not sufficient. It struck me that the expression "in all cases" covers every cause that comes into Court. If the Commissioners will look at the subsequent Act they will see that that is so.

1639. Mr. F. Godfray (Greffier).—You will see that the depositions had been taken in writing before the Bailiff and two Jurats, and finally it came before the whole Court.

1640. (To the Viscount.) The point of divergence of the two systems is, not the original taking of the evidence, but, after it is so reduced to writing, whether, after that, the enditement or the grande enquête, when they try, should hear or see the witnesses then.—Yes.

1641. Mr. Dupré.—If I understand right, the Vicomte supposes this to apply to a case before the enditement, and that in virtue of that order the evidence ought to be heard vivâ voce before the enditement. I do not think it extends to that. The kind of cases, to which this refers, never comes before the enditement; they are always tried before an inferior number first, with an appeal to the full Court.

1642. (To Mr. Dupré.)—Assuming for the present that the Vicomte is right in giving the larger interpretation to the concluding sentence, do you agree with him in saying that that would require that the enditement or the grande enquête should hear the evidence vivâ voce?—I do not. The evidence now is always given vivâ voce, and taken in writing, with the liberty of cross-examination. Every part of the order is complied with. In this very case, as the result of the appeal shews, the evidence in the cause was heard before the Bailiff and two Jurats, and afterwards read to the full Court, who gave judgment on the 14th of April, 1730; against which there was also an appeal to the Privy Council, but not grounded upon an objection to the mode of taking the evidence.

1643. When the new trial was had in consequence of the order, the depositions were so taken?—Yes.

1644. You think that, in that particular instance, the mode pursued upon the new trial was, that the evidence was taken in writing from the vivâ voce depositions of the witnesses before the inferior number, and those depositions so taken were read to the full Court?—Yes; and we should pursue the same course in other cases of a similar nature.

1645. (To the Viscount.)—However the law may stand at present, whether evidence may or not legally be taken before the grande enquête or the enditement, you think it ought to be taken vivâ voce?—Yes.

1646. You think that the jury who decide should hear the evidence and see the witnesses?—Yes; and for that I have Messrs. Dumaresq and Hémery and Le Geyt with me.

1647. Do Messrs. Pipon and Durell advert to that?—I do not think that they do.

1648. What is the reference to Messrs. Hémery and Dumaresq's work?—Page 44, the last

J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.
12 September, 1846.

passage of the first paragraph; that is a mere translation of Le Geyt; but they assume it, I take it, by quoting it.

1649. Were you here, when Mr. Marett gave his evidence upon this subject?—Yes.

1650. You were not convinced by that?—I was not.

1651. Nor of course do you agree with Mr. François Godfray, who was for retaining the present form?—No; I am not of that opinion.

1652. Looking to the effect that the trial by enditement has upon the prisoner, do you think that the course of proceeding is favourable to him or against him?—It may leave a stain upon his character. Supposing twelve men find him guilty of a crime, and he appeals to the grand jury, who absolve him, thirty or forty years afterwards, when the case is not clearly known, the record remains upon the books of the Court, his family may be taunted with his having been found guilty of murder or theft or any other crime, and that record remains against him. It is a stain upon his memory.

1653. That perhaps would be an objection to two trials in any case?—Yes.

1654. Therefore the extent of your objection is against a second trial?—Yes; I prefer Messrs. Dumaresq and Hémery's proposal to have but one jury.

1655. If a person were committed merely for the purpose of trial, the only entry would be that he was committed to be tried, and the record would show that he was acquitted?—Exactly so.

1656. Is your office an office of emolument?—As Vicomte, I have a salary from the Crown of 100*l.* a-year, old currency.

1657. Are there any other paid officers, connected with the Cour Royale?—The Bailiff, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and the Greffier of the Royal Court.

1658. What is the Government salary of the Attorney General?—I think, it is 100*l.* a-year, the Solicitor General 50*l.*, and Mr. Greffier 40*l.* The salary of the Bailiff from the Crown is 300*l.* a-year. The Denunciator also has a nominal salary of about 7*s.* 6*d.* yearly.

1659. Are those salaries paid from the revenues of the Crown or from the fees of the Court?—From the revenues of the Crown.

1660. Are you aware whether those salaries have been the same for a great number of years, or have they been increased of late years?—I think, they have been increased. A change was made in 1791.

1661. You are aware that the duties of Attorney and Solicitor General are very heavy?—They are.

1662. Can you state, upon your own knowledge of criminal proceedings, whether they have increased very much of late years?—Undoubtedly.

1663. Within the last thirty years have they done so?—I think, a very clear date is since the introduction of steam here. There has been an immense increase of population since that time. It began at the close of the war, and has been especially the case since the introduction of steam.

1664. When would that be?—Since the year 1824.

1665. Since that period, has the number of English residents in the Island greatly increased?—Very materially. I could show you that accurately by a reference to the census.

1666. And the number of visitors also?—Undoubtedly. All ranks and classes, high and low.

1667. From this increase in the population, some of which of course is not of the very best sort, are you able to say whether crime has been very much on the increase in the Island during that time?—I should certainly say so. I do not know that proportionately crime has increased; but the number of cases has increased. If the population has increased, from twenty five thousand to fifty thousand, the number of crimes is very much greater. I cannot say whether the proportion of crimes has increased.

1668. Should you say that the number of cases has doubled?—I should think so; but I can show how that is from the prison returns.

1669. I need not ask you whether the duties of all those officers would not be considerably increased?—Undoubtedly they would.

1670. You proposed to give the Commissioners some information about the grande enquête. From what source do you suppose the grande enquête to be derived?—I beg you to turn to Rouillé, De Suyte de Meurdre, c. lxviii. folio 91. "Telle enqueste doibt estre faicte par vingt et quatre loyaulx hommes au moins, qui ne soient pas souspeçonneux par amour ne par haine."

1671. The suit was the action of the private person who was injured; the next of kin appears to have had a right to sue by challenging the man whom he had accused of murder. If nobody sued, then justice interfered. The Coustumier has it: "Se aulcun n'est qui face suyte ne clameur de meurdre, et aulcun en est blasmé communemēt, il doibt estre arresté par la justice, et mis en prison jusques à vng an et vng jour, à peu de menger et de boire, s'il n'offre, dedens ce, à soustenir l'enqueste du pays." Suyte de Meurdre, folio 90.—We have cases, where a person has refused to stand an inquest of the country. Then the Commissioners will find it is said, "Et sil la veult soustenir, la justice y doibt pourueoir, et faire semondre ceulx que elle cuydera, qui sachent aulcune chose du meurdre de quelque lieu quilz soient et quilz viennent soudainement et despourueumēt sans sçauoir pourquoy ils sont ainsi mandez par justice, pour et affin que les amis de cil, qui est en prison ne les divertissent corrūpent ne facēt ou dyent aulcune chose, soit par prière ou par loyer ou par quelconque aultre moyen illicite, qui puisse empescher ne retarder, que justice ne soit faicte et accomplye. Si doibt len appeller chascū par soy pardeuant quatre cheualiers qui ne soient pas souspeconneux et enquerir diligemment se cil qui est en prison detenu a faict iceluy meurdre."

1672. I understood some gentlemen to say that the Jurats are the body who are placed by the constitution of King John in the place of the quatre chevaliers?—Yes. And it strikes me, that, in this Island, it comes within the range of historical probability that, previously to the time of King John, the four Fief Hauberts were created here to form a Court.

1673. Mr. Dupré: There is a fifth. They are St. Ouen, Rozel, Melleches, Saumarez, and Trinity.

1674. Mr. Hammond: It was a question whether Trinity was one of the Fiefs Hauberts: but we find, by a document in 1513, that there was an enquête, where it was declared that it had been held by that tenure. Therefore in effect it was decided to be a Fief Haubert.

1675. (To the Viscount.) Will you proceed?—"Et quand len aura ouy leurs dictz et mis en escript, cil qui est en prison doibt estre amene deuant eulx, et luy doibt on demander s'il en veult aulcuns saonner. Et sil dict sur aulcūs deulx suffisant saon, chose, que dyent ceulx, qui sont ainsi saonnez, ne doibt estre en rien comptée. Mais se le saon ne est suffisant, ce qu'il dira sera receu avec les aultres."

1676. To go back to what you have been saying with regard to the enditement, we do not find any trace in Rouillé of any proceeding by enditement?—In the Style de Proceder you do.

1677. That is assuming that the Style de Proceder bears upon it. Leaving that out of the question, Rouillé is now treating of the mode in which murder is proceeded against when there is no relation of the murdered person to make suyte. The suspected party is to be kept in prison upon bread and water for a year and a day. If you look in the notes you will see he is to be tormented to make him confess. If within a year and a day he does not confess, I apprehend it would be for the Court to detain or set him at liberty. If, on the contrary, he likes to get out of prison before this, he is to submit to the inquest of the country; not to take the benefit of it as at present; but he submits to the inquest of the country. And the inquest is summoned: but there is no trace of any proceeding by enditement.—No.

1678. The note here is: "Par ce texte doibt on noter q̃ saulcun a esté meurdry et ses amis ne font point de suyte, et que ils en delaissent la suyte à la justice, justice de son office y doibt proceder en cette manière, cestassauoir que cil, qui est accuse du crime, doibt estre arresté et mis en prison. Et se doibt justice informer du cas; et icelle information veue et deliberée par justice et par les conseulx du Roy, ainsi quil est acoustumé, on le doibt mettre en questions et en tourmentz, ainsi qu'il est acoustumé à faire, cestassauoir ou plus ou moins selon ce quil est plus clerement trouvé coulpable par information, et selon la faculté et puissance de son corps, et au regard de sa renomée. Et se il confesse le cas, on le juge selon sa confession. Et jasait ce que le texte ne déclare poinct en ce pas, que len doye mettre en tourmentz cil qui est accusé de tel cas, si le y peut on mettre, et ainsi est usé et gardé notoirement. Et la cause pourquoy le texte n'en parle est pour la diuersité et variation des questions et tourmentz, qui y sont cōuenables en tel cas. Et aussi pour ce que ce sont procés ordinaires, qui gisent et démeurēt en la discretion de justice, à les faire ou plus ou moins, ou à les cesser selon ce que les diuers cas le requierent. Et si peut on dire, que telles destresses peuēt assez estre entendues par le texte, qui met que on doibt tenir en prison cil, qui est accusé de tel crime, jusques à vng an et vng jour à peu de boire et de menger lesquelles choses supposent destresse. Ou len peut dire q̃ le texte en faict ailleurs mençion et mesmemēt où il met que jadis quād femmes estoient accusées d'aulcun crime, et elles n'auoient qui les défendist, cest à entendre par forme de gaige, elles s'enpurgeoient par feu et par ignise. Sur quoy, on peut entendre les questions, et tourmentz acoustumés en tel cas, ainsi que plus à plain est declairé en chapitre, qui de ce faict mencion. Et pource nen parle point le texte en ce pas." Then there is another passage with regard to torture. "Ou len pourrait dire, que se le texte ne parle point en ce des dictz tourmentez, c'est pour ce que en ce chapitre il n'entend traicter, fors seulement des procés coustumiers qui se font en cas criminel, par especial en cas de meurdre, cestassauoir du gaige de bataille, et des enquestes qui sont accordées et ottroyées à ceulz qui les attendent en telles matières, et non point de procés extráordinaires, que justice faict de son office par questions et tourmentz comme dict est. Et oultre len doibt noter que si cil, qui est accusé, veult attendre lenqueste sur le cas, et elle luy est ottroyée, on y doibt procéder ainsi et par la manière, que le texte declaire. Toutefois nest il pas à entendre, que se l'accuse démande l'enqueste que justice soit subjecte et abstraincte de luy accorder et cesser les tourmentz tantost quil la démande. Car se justice voit quil soit expédient de lui ottroyer l'enqueste, elle lui accordera." There is no mention of any process by enditement.—I think it can be made out that they have tried them with twelve men as well as twenty four.

1679. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do you consider this to be law now?—The practice is quite different.

1680. What has changed it?—It is impossible to say.

1681. What the Commissioners want to learn is this, whether they are correctly informed that the law may be found in Rouillé, except as altered by special enactments?—We differ in our practice in many respects from the old law of Normandy.

1682. Some of the Ordinances by the kings of France, which are since the separation, represent your law better than the Coutumier?—Yes.

1683. The Commissioners have been referred to a book which they are told is law in default of other Ordinances. They find that there is much in that book which is not law; but they cannot find any other Ordinances. What has been said as to Suyte de Meurdre would apply to nearly all other criminal processes that we find in the Coustumier?—(The Viscount.) Surely that is law which is consecrated by time.

1684. (Mr. Dupré.) In 1503 a fire destroyed the records of the Court. It is now impossible to find out how and when the change took place, because our records are so recent.

1685. (The Viscount.) The records of our legislative Acts were all burnt previous to the year 1503.

1686. (To Mr. Dupré.) In endeavouring to ascertain the law as it stands now, the Coustumier is a very insufficient guide?—It is not altogether a guide.

JERSEY.

J. Le Couteur. Esq., Viscount. 12 September, 1846.

1687. (The Viscount.) It is the basis of most of our laws. Formerly, up to 1771, th Court had the power of making Ordinances: and the Court of Guernsey has preserved that power to this day.

1688. I understand the Solicitor General and yourself to say that the form of proceeding now differs exceedingly from the former practice. You are aware that an appeal of murder might be tried by wager of battle, by the law of England, up to within a very recent period, and that it was necessary to have an Act of Parliament to repeal that law. You say that certain laws are not obsolete, but that they have been changed, most likely by orders of the Court, the Court having then a legislative power, and that it is probable the course of proceeding has been changed by Ordinances of the Cour Royale, which have perished in the fire which took place in 1503?—Yes. There is one instance, where they directed that, if the six sermentés did not agree, there should be twelve.

1689. What was the time that the Cour Royale was deprived of the power of making such ordinances?—It existed till 1771. All Ordinances were then set aside, except those which had received the Royal Assent.

1690. Then, among the records from 1503 up to 1771, one would expect to find Acts of Court, which would have the force of law and bear upon these points?—Yes.

1691. Here is an inquest in 1646, taken on a murder, which has been given us by the Greffier,* the jury consisting of the constable of the parish and the people mentioned. The grande enquête is not there claimed as a benefit, or as a Court of Appeal; but the prisoner submits himself for his purgation to the inquest. That is conformable to the words of the Coustumier?—Precisely so. Terrien in the Chapter De Veues, Lib. XII. c. 18. p, 502, mentions the quatre Chevaliers. Then, in the note, he tells us, "Ceste veue par la Coustume se faisoit par quatre Cheualiers, et par la Justice." To return to the mode of summoning the grande enquête, the commentary at the foot of folio 91 of Rouillé has this. "Sur ce texte doibt on noter que en enqueste de crime de roberie ou de larcin ou d'aultre malfacon, on a acoustumé de prēdre de trois paroisses: cestassauoir de celle, où l'acusé a converse, et celle ou il fist la roberie, et de la prochaine paroisse de celle où il a conuerse. Et la cause pourquoy on prent de trois paroisses est dessus declairée, toutesfois la tierce parroisse demeure en la discretiō de justice: car le text ne faict mention quil en soit requis nécessairement que deux, et en meurdre que une. Et pour ce jasoit ce que len ait acoustume à prēdre de trois paroisses en tel cas; neanmoins se justice ensuyvoit le texte, et procedoit selon iceluy sans faire si grandes soleñitez ce ne seroit pas mal procédé. Et le pourroit justice faire se elle veoit quil fust expédient. Mais pour la grandeur des cas, on a accoustumé à procéder ainsi solennellement."

1692. This is quite your own law, except that you take from the parish where the crime was committed, and the two neighbouring parishes?—Yes. There is, however, a curious deviation, which ought to be given. "Se alcun est accusé de roberie ou de larcin, et il estoit de Angleterre ou daultre estrange pays, et y auoit tousjours converse, pour quoy on ne pourroit pas auoir en acomplissant le texte des gentz, ou il auroit converse en la paroisse: il suffiroit de prendre des lieux, où la roberie et larcin auroit esté faict. Car le texte, qui parle, que on prenne de ceulx où laccuse a converse, s'entend, se on les peut avoir, et non aultrement. Et par semblable conuiendroit faire se ung homme estoit accus de meurdre, et il avoit faict le meurdre en estrange pays."

1693. Then they tried a man out of the jurisdiction, according to that. Supposing a man committed a murder in England, would you try him in Jersey?—We should send him back to his own country. If a murder was committed on the high seas, and the vessel came into Jersey, we should try the case. To return. Then follows, in Rouillé, the mode of delivering the verdict, which also corresponds with the present mode. It is quite clear that the verdict of the members of the enquête was always kept secret. I beg leave to refer the Commissioners to a passage in Le Geyt's manuscripts, vol. I. p. 447. "Si les hommes de veue doivent faire leur Rapport en public." In proceeding to follow Rouillé and the grande enquête, at the foot of that passage just cited (likewise at folio 91), we find, "Item len doibt scauoir que le texte qui met en la fin, 'Et ce que les vingt diront soit garde et cetera,' que il fault vingt jureurs à ung acord pour condemner l'accusé, et la raison est pour la grādeur du cas: toutesfois use len que se la greigneure partie est à ung acord quil suffit pour condemner laccusé." That would be the thirteen men that we still retain in the enditement out of the twenty four.

1694. You think at this time thirteen could have condemned?—No doubt of it, by that passage. With Hémery and Dumaresq I hold it to be objectionable that the men of the grande enquête should be named by the public prosecutor. I do not object to the way in which the Attorney General exercises this duty. No man can be more fair or more impartial or more humane; but the jury, I consider, should not be selected by any man. It should be drawn for by lot. I think that the grande enquête, in this Island, is almost over favourable to a prisoner. Its members are always men of the first consideration in the country. They are warned late at night, commonly too late to have a chance of conferring together: and, wherever I have sat with them, I should say they are most patient in their investigation, and very mercifully inclined. I have known an instance where a juryman changed his opinion to the side of mercy in his way from the chamber to the Court. Indeed, I think, in the present state of mind with regard to passing sentence of death, there are so many individuals who object to death as a punishment, that I hardly think you would find twenty four men now who would consent to give a verdict which would subject a person to capital punishment.

1695. In spite of their oath?—I think, the oath is on their side; they would find according to their conscience.

1696. Their conscience would oblige them to say whether the man were rather guilty than innocent of the fact.—In the working you would not find it so.

---

* Vide ante, p. 104, where the proceedings are set out.

1697. You think it would be very difficult to find twenty men out of the twenty four who would agree to a verdict of Guilty where the punishment would be death?—In the case the other day, I heard very able men say they would not find a man Guilty on such evidence as that.

1698. Mr. Dupré. Out of the five last trials for murder two were found Guilty.

1699. (To Mr. Dupré, Avocat Général.) Do you ever try libels by a purely criminal proceeding?—There was one case.

1700. Supposing, for example, it was said, that the Government sent over troops in a boat which they knew to be leaky. Would that be tried by a cause en ajonction?—That would be a purely criminal proceeding.

1701. Inciting soldiers to desert, or a libel against the Government: how would such offences be tried?—They would be tried criminally.

1702. (To the Viscount.) What do you think of the composition of the grande enquête or enditement in matters that may involve political disputes or party feeling?—I do not recollect a case of libel before the grande enquête. I should think, in a case like Mr. Lemprière's, who was the leader of one of the great parties in this island at that time, Mr. Dumaresq and his friends being the leaders of another, if one of their party had been brought before a grand jury, and evidence taken, he would have stood a great chance of being found Guilty.

1703. The moment it became an important political case, the Procureur Général would naturally feel a very strong bias on the part of the Crown. There would be, at all events, a risk of a suspicion of partiality?—Certainly.

1704. With the enditement a libel case would involve some suspicion?—That goes back to my feelings when I was a constable. Necessarily the first duty of a constable was, on finding himself in power, whenever he could secure an addition to his party by putting in one of his own friends as an officer, not to fail to do so; at least I never did. I took very good care that all my friends were put into power, and to exclude every one else, as far as I possibly could.

1705. Those would be the materials out of which the enditement would be constructed?—No doubt.

1706. Supposing the case of a violent article in a newspaper upon the Police generally, which no policeman could make a cause en ajonction?—It would not be quite safe to try the man before that particular Police.

1707. (To Mr. Dupré.) Would the enditement sit upon a purely criminal libel in the first instance?—Undoubtedly they would. Private libels would not be brought before them.

1708. (To the Viscount.) Have you anything to add as to the method of summoning the grand enquête?—I believe, I have stated that I think it ought to be by lot.

1709. Do you think that both processes, the enditement and the grande enquête, are necessary?—I think that one jury would be better, for the reasons I gave, that a man, who is convicted by the petty jury, though he may have a better chance, yet, the record remaining, that he is found Guilty, is more or less a stain upon his character. His friends could always be told that twelve men had found him Guilty.

1710. Which of the two do you think it would be more safe to dispense with?—I have not given my attention sufficiently to that. I should like to consider the question further.

1711. To what extent is the English language prevalent in this island?—In the town every body can speak English; but the vernacular of course is Jersey.

1712. Have you had any means of judging how far that has spread into the country?—When I returned from the Island of Curaçoa in 1814, I married and settled here. We then found that there was no Sunday school in the parish. When we did set a Sunday school on foot, we found there was scarcely a child in the parish who spoke English. My mother and a number of ladies and gentlemen, upon instituting one of those schools, gave English testaments and other prizes to those who should learn English soonest: and in the course of ten years such a change took place that, I believe, there were very few children, in the whole district of St. Aubin, who did not speak English, and probably in the whole parish now.

1713. What is the name of the parish in which Grosnez is?—St. Ouen's. I rather believe that there is an English school now in every parish of the island.

1714. On one occasion, when we were there, we could not understand an old woman in a cottage: and her daughter, who was quite a child, came forward and interpreted.—I do not think there is a child of any of the principaux who cannot speak both English and French.

1715. Are there also French Sunday schools in the parishes?—Yes, in St. Brélade's. We have an English Sunday school at St. Aubin's, and a French Sunday school at St. Brélade's.

1716. Do you suppose there is a French Sunday school in every parish?—I think there is.

1717. With respect to the communication with England: it is very common now, of course?—It is constant.

1718. Do you think the communication with England is more constant than with Guernsey?—I should think very much more. Here is not very much business carried on between Jersey and the other Channel Islands.

1719. I observed, the other day, that sentence was passed upon the prisoner in English?—That was upon an English prisoner.

1720. Have you any means of stating what proportion of sentences are passed in English to those passed in French?—I cannot recollect that. The prison returns will show it.

1721. In the case of English prisoners, they hear their own defence conducted in a language which they do not understand?—Of course.

1722. As to the depositions, they have no means of instructing their counsel as the case goes on?—The counsel here all speak English and French.

1723. But the prisoner himself, if, in the course of the counsel's remarks, he heared something which suggested to him, the prisoner, an important point of defence, would have the means

JERSEY.

J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount. 12 September, 1846.

of checking him. In England he has.—Here he has not; he relies entirely upon his counsel, if he does not understand the French language.

1724. It is left to the ingenuity of the very able gentlemen who here defend prisoners to think of it themselves?—Yes.

1725. When the evidence of the English witnesses is taken down in writing, the accused hear the evidence given in English, and their counsel hears the interpretation into which it is transfused when it is put on the notes?—They write the very words that are spoken.

1726. When English evidence is given, is it taken down in English?—Invariably, either in Court, or, if leaving the island, before the Vicomte.

1727. When French evidence is given, the counsel for the prisoner who attends of course interprets it to the prisoner?—Yes.

1728. The evidence of an English witness in taken in English and read at the enditement and the grande enquête in English?—Yes, in all cases. If any of the enditement do not understand English, the Procureur Général translates it to them.

1729. (To Mr. Dupré.) Is there any sworn interpreter?—Not for English and French. In the case of any other languages there would be.

1730. Have you turned your attention to the extent to which the Police protects the streets?—Generally I have, since I held the office of Vicomte; and those recent cases of murder have drawn my attention to the subject.

1731. What is the general opinion you have formed upon their efficiency as a means of protection?—As a detective police, I would honestly say that, during the time I was constable, and in my experience while I was a Jurat, and since I have been Vicomte, I have always found the whole Police ready to attend to my orders, or to support me in any way that was required by me in my official capacity. They are a very zealous, energetic and active body of men. But there, I think, is pretty much the limit of their efficiency. We have no protective police in Jersey. We have nothing to be compared to the London Police; nothing to anticipate and to prevent a crime. We have no men whose business it is to be out all night watching. The Commissioners heard from Mr. Chevalier what very hard duty he has to perform occasionally as an unpaid officer. Mr. Chevalier is a most efficient and excellent police officer. Still, but for the peculiar circumstances of Nicolle's case being discovered by an accidental circumstance by one of the subscription watchmen, if it had not been for that man's evidence, I think, he would not have been traced to his house. It appeared to me quite the leading evidence in tracing him. I have heard gentlemen say they were obliged to sit up, and that their friends have been obliged to sit up and watch their houses at night. There was an instance lately of a gentleman's house which was attempted to be burned, Captain Groombridge's. A paid Police, that would be patrolling the town in the night, and a paid Police walking about the harbour at night, would prevent a great number of crimes committed by boys in the first instance, and by an organized set of thieves that we have had here for a great number of years. I think the importance of this town is so great, and its commerce is so extensive, that it requires a police force, such as they have in London. I am the more convinced of this, because in the island of Curaçoa, where my father was Commander in Chief and Governor, robberies were carried on to an enormous extent while the old Dutch Police was in existence; and he framed a system, antecedent to that in London, precisely on the same principles, young men, from twenty four to thirty five years of age, placed under a superintendent of Police: and in one month the whole system of thieving was put down. The security of the town was completely established.

1732. At present, it would seem that, the greater the respectability and the higher the station in life of the gentlemen who perform those gratuitous functions of police, the less reason there is to expect them to be about the town in the way required?—Undoubtedly. But it must be well understood that it is a distinction; it is a mark of the confidence of their fellow citizens, and a position of honour. Let the party be what it may, the man who is selected by his party is looked up to for some excellent qualifications; and they generally are as sober and steady a body of men as are to be met with in the world. The very admirable order which was kept in this immense town, with the vast population assembled in it on the late visit of Her Majesty, could not fail to strike every reflecting mind. There was not a quarrel; there was the greatest possible order; and the Police behaved with entire courtesy.

1733. They had the assistance of special constables on that occasion, had not they?—Yes, a great many; and the whole of the militia were out. I suppose there were three thousand men under arms, artillery and infantry.

Mr. David Bromer.

Mr. David Bromer further examined.

1734. The Commissioners understand that you wish to make some observation to them?—While incarcerated in prison for the first six or eight months, there was no regulation to prevent the debtors speaking to felons; and I have repeatedly been asked advice before they went to Court; and, when they returned, they have stated that they were not aware of the accusation against them, as they spoke English exclusively; nor did they know their sentence when they returned. And also in defending them, as I have been allowed, through the kindness of one or two officers of the Court, occasionally to act for people, I have often experienced the same. I have repeatedly seen men sent back from the Court through the absence of advocates; and that is a very serious inconvenience, particularly when the Crown Officers are absent.

1735. The Viscount. No one but the chief magistrate could permit Mr. Bromer to act or to speak.

1736. (To Mr. Bromer.) You mean, by their being sent back, that their trial has been put off on account of no advocate being there to defend them?—Yes.

Mr. Francis Godfray (Greffier), further examined.

Mr. Francis Godfray, Greffier. 12 September, 1846.

1737. Have you the actual depositions which were taken in Nicolle's case? Will you produce the deposition of John Weston?

The same was produced and is as follows.

(Fac simile.)

"On the 23rd day of January, 1846, and to the same purpose, Mr. John Weston, aged 45 years, has deposed upon oath as follows. On the morning of the 9th of the present month, as deponent was employed ~~to watch~~ the brook in Church Street, where a drain was being made, soon after the clock struck two, he heard the footsteps of persons running down Library Place. He went in that direction; and opposite to the Library, saw two men, ~~one of them of the ground and th~~ the prisoner at the bar and Mr. Seward. The said prisoner was down on the ground; on coming up to them, deponent placed himself between them, and desired Mr. Seward ~~to desist, which he did,~~ not to strike him, he replied, I will not, and went back towards his house. Deponent then told the said prisoner to get up, and go home: he got up, and in going ~~by Brook Street,~~ he said, I will give him a lesson. He went by Brook Street, and deponent returned to his place of watch; a few minutes after that, deponent heard the report of a gun; he went towards Mr. Seward's house, deponent met him, Mr. Seward, coming out of his door, and asked him what was the matter. He replied, that fellow has shot two persons in my house. Deponent went into the house, and saw a man shot, sitting on the floor with his head ~~on the shoulders~~ supported by ~~a man~~ Mr. Jeffries. Deponent asked Mr. Jeffries where he was shot. He said ~~in the back through the lungs,~~ through the back and lungs.

Did the said prisoner say anything more than what deponent as already stated?—Not that deponent heard.

Questions by the Prisoner.

Was the weather very dark at the time deponent as alluded to?—Not very dark.

Mark of
John Weston."

1738. What is the history of those alterations?—They must have been mistakes in the first instance.

1739. Are those depositions read to the witness?—Yes; this deposition must have been corrected in the presence of the witness. This was written by Mr. D'Allain.

---

Mr. Hugh Godfray further examined.

Mr. Hugh Godfray.

1740. You were Dénonciateur?—Yes.

1741. Have you acted for the Greffier occasionally?—Yes, and for the Deputy Viscount.

1742. Were you present when these depositions were taken?—Yes; and I am certain that the man did say that the witness desired Mr. Seward to desist, which he did.

1743. That is as it originally stood?—Yes; at that time I remarked to myself that Mr. Seward was in the wrong.

1744. It struck you, on hearing the evidence, that that was a point in Nicolle's favour?—Yes.

1745. The witness gave the evidence in the form in which it originally stood?—Yes.

1746. How came it to be altered?—I do not know: it is the same hand-writing. Perhaps, in reading it again to the witness, the witness might have made him change it: but I know that originally he did say so.

1747. Will you tell us the mode in which these examinations are taken? Is an oath first administered to the witness?—Yes, by the Greffier, in the presence of the Court.

1748. Is the prisoner present?—Yes.

1749. Is the witness in a position to be seen by the prisoner?—Yes, quite close. There is a small table before the Bar; and it is upon that table that the evidence is taken down in writing.

1750. After the witness is called and sworn, does he begin to make a statement of his own accord, or is there a question put to him by the advocates?—When a witness is called by the Attorney General he is questioned by the Attorney General.

1751. You call a witness an informateur?—Yes; against the prisoner he is called informateur à charge; and, when the informateur is called at the request of the prisoner, he is called informateur à décharge.

1752. Suppose a witness to be called by the Procureur Général, what is the first thing that takes place after he is sworn?—He is taken to the table, and stands by the écrivain, who is taking down the deposition in writing. Then the Procureur Général proceeds to question the witness, or asks him to state what he knows of the accusation. He then states it, and afterwards sits down by the écrivain, who writes down what the witness has said.

1753. Does the écrivain take it down from him as he delivers it?—No.

1754. He repeats it first to the Court, and then to the écrivain?—Yes.

1755. Is that in an audible voice in both cases?—Not when he repeats it to the écrivain. Very often the écrivain writes it down without the witness repeating it to him.

1756. This is supposing that he makes a statement without any question being put to him?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Mr. Hugh Godfray. 12 September, 1846.

1757. After he has repeated it to the écrivain and the écrivain has taken it down, what takes place?—Then both the écrivain and the witness stand up; and it is read out by the écrivain to the Court.

1758. What takes place after that?—After that they generally proceed by questions.

1759. After it has been read by the écrivain to the Court, is the witness asked whether he agrees to it as the écrivain has read it?—No: it is read out, and of course, if it is not written as he says, he has a right to correct it.

1760. Is any question put to him?—No; sometimes the deposition is corrected when the Attorney General or the counsel for the prisoner find that it has not been put in exactly the same words as the witness had used.

1761. After he has made his statement, what takes place?—The Attorney General goes on with his questions.

1762. What is the mode in which the question is asked?—It is asked by the Attorney General, and it is written down by the écrivain.

1763. That being written by the écrivain, what follows?—The écrivain stands up by the witness, and reads it aloud to the witness and to the Court; and the witness then gives his answer.

1764. Is the same mode pursued with regard to his answer that was pursued with the question?—Yes.

1765. And so with the cross-examination?—Yes.

1766. The examination being concluded, what takes place?—The witness signs the deposition.

1767. Before it is signed, is it given to the witness to read over?—No; it is not required.

1768. Can the witness have it if he wishes?—Certainly.

1769. Before being signed by the witness, is it read over from beginning to end to him, that he may ascertain its accuracy?—It is not now; but I recollect, at the time when I first practised in the Court, that that was the case. As he has answered, each passage is read.

1770. But, when the evidence has been given, it is not all read over to him?—No. Before the deposition is signed, the chief Magistrate asks the Attorney General if he has any more questions to put to the witness. He also puts the same question to the advocate who defends the prisoner. They both of them, very often before they answer, require the deposition to be handed to them; and, on their declining to put any more questions to the witness, the deposition is put before him. He signs it; and it is handed by the écrivain to the Greffier, in whose custody it remains.

1771. I observe that, in the particular deposition which you have in your hand, there are several alterations. When an alteration is made in a deposition, by the witness wishing to amend or vary his statement, are the variations not signed by the witness deposing?—No. Those variations and interlineations had all been made before the deposition was signed.

1772. Is there any mark put to show that those alterations were made with the consent of the witness?—No; there is not.

1773. Neither the signature of the officer of the Court, nor any thing else?—No; there is not.

1774. Would not it be proper that there should be some means of verifying alterations in a deposition?—I think so.

1775. Have you ever looked to the method of taking affidavits in England?—I have seen English affidavits.

1776. With alterations?—Yes. We do it here also, when it is to send documents to England.

1777. Do not you think that method might be adopted with advantage in the depositions here?—Yes.

1778. The whole of the depositions in a case are not taken the same day?—No; they extend over several days; in this case over seven days.

1779. In the particular case of Nicolle, what intervals occurred between the days of taking the depositions?—The depositions in this case were taken on the 23rd of January, and the 27th; the 13th of February, the 18th, and the 20th; the 11th of March, and the 12th of March. Another deposition was taken, before the Deputy Vicomte out of Court, on the 3rd of February.

1780. In the order of time that would be the third taken?—Yes.

1781. How many witnesses were examined in this case?

1782. Mr. Francis Godfray (Greffier). On the 23rd of January, the first day, there were six witnesses heard. On the second day, that is the 27th, one of those who had been heard on the 24th was again heard, and ten new ones were examined. On the third day, there were two, who were recalled, and 15 fresh ones were examined. On the 18th, the fourth day, five were recalled, and six new ones examined. On the 20th, three new ones were called, and none recalled. On the 11th of March, one was recalled, and four new ones examined. On the 12th of March, three were recalled, and a new one examined.

1783. Then there was the one who was examined out of Court before the Deputy Vicomte: was that a witness recalled?—No; it was a witness who did not appear.

1784. How came that witness's evidence to be taken out of Court?

1785. Mr. Hugh Godfray (Dénonciateur). He was a Frenchman, and was about to leave the island.

1786. When a witness is about to leave the island, and his evidence is taken out of Court, is it taken in the presence of the Procureur Général and the prisoner?—Yes.

1787. With regard to these recalls, can you easily ascertain how many times the same witness was recalled?—Yes; that might be ascertained.

1788. When a witness is examined out of Court, who takes the deposition then? Is it taken by an écrivain?—No; the Vicomte, or the Deputy Vicomte. Sometimes it is before the Dénonciateur, who writes it down.

Mr. Hugh Godfray.
12 September, 1846.

1789. On that occasion is any oath administered to the Deputy Vicomte, that he shall take the evidence down as it is given by the witness?—No; he does it on the oath of his office. Everything that he does, for which he keeps a record, is always under the oath of his office.

1790. With regard to the écrivains, who take down the evidence in Court, is any oath administered to them to take down the evidence correctly?—No.

1791. After the evidence is all taken down in writing, are the witnesses again sworn to the truth of it?—No.

1792. Before signing, they are not again sworn to the truth of their depositions?—No.

1793. The evidence is taken in the presence of the Bailiff and two Jurats?—Yes.

1794. Is the evidence of more than one witness taken at the same time?—Sometimes three, sometimes four; sometimes, at the request of the advocate for the prisoner, it is taken singly.

1795. In that case, is there a separate écrivain to take the evidence of each witness?—Yes.

1796. The Procureur Général asks the questions?—Yes.

1797. Does the Procureur Général examine the four witnesses all at once?—One after the other.

1798. Then it would not be contemporaneous, if it was one after the other?—He does not ask four questions at the same time; but the examination of the four goes on one after another. They put one question to one; while the écrivain is writing it down, another question is put to another witness; and so it goes on.

1799. That must tend to produce some confusion in the taking of the evidence?—It does sometimes. Each time the witness is recalled, he is sworn again, and the deposition of the former day is read to him before he is questioned further.

1800. You have told us that the écrivain is not sworn in the particular case to take the evidence; is there any general oath of office for the écrivain?—None at all.

1801. There is neither a particular nor a general oath?—No.

1802. The reliance is very much upon the vigilance of the counsel?—Yes; and the Court, who are watching also.

1803. Does the Court itself interrogate the witnesses at all?—Yes, sometimes.

1804. The Bailiff?—Yes.

1805. And the Jurats?—And the Jurats do. In my opinion it ought to be through the Bailiff; but very often they do it without. Thirty years ago, Sir John Dumaresq would not have allowed a question to be put, except through himself.

1806. In that case, is the question and answer taken down precisely in the same manner?—Yes; it is generally put, "question by the Court."

1807. Then the deposition would shew that the question was put by the Court?—Yes.

1808. Has the counsel for the prisoner a right to demand that only one witness should be examined at a time?—He has.

1809. Are the depositions taken down in the actual words of the witness?—As much as possible. I must say that some of the écrivains are not so shrewd or intelligent as they ought to be.

1810. You think inaccuracies occur from that, do you?—Sometimes; but they are generally corrected. Some may pass uncorrected.

1811. I observe that, in those depositions, the language is in no instance the witness's own. For instance, in this case, "Was the prisoner in the habit of shooting rats?" the answer is, "He has frequently heard the report of fire-arms." The witness would naturally say "I have frequently heard."—The witness said so, no doubt; but it is always put in the third person.

1812. Do the écrivains, to any extent, take upon themselves to put the effect of the witnesses' words in any other instance?—No; not otherwise.

1813. That is the only instance in which they intentionally vary from the very words?—Yes.

---

Mr. John D'Allain examined.

Mr. John D'Allain.

1814. Are both the original and the alteration in this deposition in your handwriting?—Yes.

1815. Will you explain the alteration in the deposition?—The first alteration, I should say, was done in writing it over. The second, I think, was done after I had read it over to the Court and to the witness. I think I recollect now that, after having read it as it was, without the erasure, I do not recollect whether it was the Attorney General or the Court, or any other, wished me to alter that part, which I did. I think that was done after it had been read to the Court.

1816. Was it after the witness had signed it?—No. It was in reading it over, just after it had been written; in reading it over to the Court, the Attorney General or the advocate desired me to alter that part; which I did, and read it over to them again.

1817. Was it read, as altered, to the witness before he signed it?—It is always made a point, the moment there is any alteration, to read it over again to the Court, and to the witness.

1818. That was so in this instance, was it?—It was so in this instance, certainly.

1819. Are you confident that, in that particular case, the witness, before he signed it, heard it read over as altered?—Positive. I never alter a deposition unless it is read over again as altered.

1820. You say you are confident of that, because it is always done. Do you recollect, that it was so in this particular instance, or do you speak of your general practice?—In this particular instance it was done. And, I think, I recollect that it was afterwards, in reading it, that some one made the observation, and I altered it, and read it over again.

1821. You are sure that all that was before it was signed?—Positive.

1822. This is not a copy from a draft which you made, but the original as taken down from the mouth of the witness?—Yes.

1823. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Greffier.) Upon none of those depositions, as I understand you, is there anything to verify their having been taken before the Court, excepting your custody, and the signature of the party making them?—Nothing.

1824. Supposing an officer were wicked enough to destroy the deposition and to substitute another, or supposing some one were to get into your office and do so, would there be any check against that?—No.

1825. During the time that the depositions are in your custody, has any body, on behalf of the prisoner or otherwise, a right to apply to you for copies or take copies of them?—Yes.

1826. Are those copies authenticated in any way by you?—Yes. Very often the advocate of the prisoner examines them; frequently he takes notes and takes no copies.

1827. I understand you to say that the prisoner would have a right to ask you for copies of the depositions?—Yes.

1828. Would those copies be under your seal or signature?—Yes, under my signature.

1829. "Au Greffe" would be written upon them?—My signature would be written upon them.

1830. Can they be copied in any other way?—Sometimes the advocates have their clerks to copy them in my office.

. Have the Advocates access to the original documents in your office to copy them?—Strictly speaking, they have no right to do so perhaps: but it is done.

1831. It is possible that essential alterations, in the shape of erasures or interlineations, might take place on occasions of that kind, is not it?—I have never seen an instance of it.

1832. Do I understand you to say that, during any time prior to the grande enquête, the prisoner may upon demand have copies of any of the depositions?—Yes.

1833. Is that at the expense of the prisoner, or are they furnished gratis, if the prisoner is unable to pay?—If the prisoner is able to pay for them, he is desired to pay for them: if not, they are given gratis. It is very seldom that a copy is required; generally the advocate takes notes.

1834. Supposing a prisoner, who had not the means of paying for it, wanted to obtain a copy gratis; can he do it by application to you, or must it be by the intervention of the Court?—He or his advocate may apply to me; and I will give it gratis.

1835. Is the intervention of the Court necessary to procure it?—No.

1836. He would have it as of right?—I should think so.

1837. (To Mr. D'Allain.) Are you clerk to any advocate?—No. I had been for some years.

1838. To whom?—To Mr. John Hammond.

1839. When did you cease to be so?—In the year 1832. I am still in the same office; we occupy the same office together. He has one room; and I have the other adjoining it.

1840. You have no connexion in business?—No.

1841. You left his employ in 1832?—Yes.

1842. Were you écrivain while you were in his employ?—No.

1843. Are any écrivains clerks to advocates?—Several to advocates, and to other écrivains.

1844. Do you mean that they act as écrivains, and as clerks to advocates and to other écrivains, at the same time?—Yes.

Adjourned to Monday next, at ½ past 10.

Monday, September 14, 1846.

1845. The following Memorial, addressed to the Commissioners, was read.

A Messieurs les Commissaires Royaux siégeant actuellement en l'Ile de Jersey.

Mme. Rosalie Rabecq, femme de Mons. Philippe Mourant, de la paroisse de St. Sauveur en l'Ile de Jersey, la dite femme native de la Commune de Regneville, Département de la Manche, en France, très humblement remontre.

Que vers Pâques, l'année 1845, avant son mariage, elle était domestique chez le dit Sieur Mourant, depuis à peu près cinq mois. Mr. Jean Le Cronier, officier du connétable en la paroisse de St. Hélier, vint, le Samedi après Pâques, 1845, trouver la remontrante chez Mrs. Gillman, en la dite paroisse de St. Hélier, peu après le soleil couché, l'accusa d'avoir volé une pièce d'indienne, et qu'elle était de mauvaise vie, et lui ordonna de le suivre, ou, si elle ne le faisait pas, il irait chercher de l'assistance et mettrait la populace après elle. Comme elle savait qu'elle n'avait commis aucun crime, elle le suivit; et il la conduisit à l'Hôpital Général, en disant au directeur qu'il lui amenait une jeune personne, que ce n'était pas pour rien de mal, et de la soigner bien, et qu'il se trouverait qui paierait. La remontrante resta là vingt-quatre heures, et fut libérée par ordre du dit Jean Le Cronier, sans donner aucune raison par rapport à sa détention.

Quelques semaines après, le centenier Abraham Aubin, Jun., de la paroisse de St. Sauveur, accompagné de plusieurs personnes, fit des recherches des cinq heures du matin chez Jean Ollivier, pour saisir la remontrante, et ne la trouva pas: mais, vers les six heures du même matin, c'était un Mercredi, le centenier Chevalier, de St. Hélier, vint trouver la remontrante chez la Veuve Gillman, et la fit lever, et lui dit qu'il y avait eu un vol commis dans une grande maison à St. Sauveur, qu'elle avait été vue, avec un nommé Johnson, à la dite maison, à y voler; et que le dit Johnson avait été arrêté et mis en prison; et de venir avec lui voir si elle le reconnaîtrait; que cela ne la gênerait pas beaucoup; qu'elle n'y serait pas long tems. Elle répondit qu'elle avait été à St. Sauveur, qu'elle ne connaissait pas Johnson, et qu'elle n'avait pas entendu parler d'aucun vol: il la pressa d'aller voir ce prétendu Johnson, et l'emmena pour aller le voir à la prison. Arrivés à la porte de l'Hôpital, il la fit entrer, et donna des ordres à M. Jean Binet, le directeur, de l'enfermer, et que personne ne fût la voir; elle fut enfermée dans une chambre, dont les fenêtres étaient grillées, avec des femmes dérangées et de manuvaise vie, depuis le Mercredi matin, vers les six heures et demie, jusqu'au Dimanche, vers les huit heures du matin.

Le lendemain de sa saisie, le centenier Chevalier voulait l'envoyer à St. Malo. Elle refusa, d'autant que c'était loin de sa contrée. Elle lui observa qu'elle n'avait commis aucun délit ou crime; qu'elle voulait être présentée devant la Cour: le centenier Chevalier répondit qu'il n'en était pas nécessaire; qu'il agissait d'après les ordres du Général ou Lieutenant Gouverneur.

Le Dimanche matin, vers les huit heures, le centenier Chevalier, accompagné de M. Le Bas et de Phillippe Mourant, Jun., vint à l'Hôpital, et la fit monter dans une voiture avec eux, lui disant, que c'était pour l'envoyer à Granville. Au lieu de cela, ils la conduisirent à la Mare de Ste. Catherine, et la firent embarquer au bord du cutter la Rose, qui partit de suite pour Port Bail. Le centenier Chevalier, en la quittant, lui dit qu'elle ferait bien de ne pas revenir à Jersey, ou bien qu'elle se ferait envoyer à Botany Bay. Elle fut obligée de payer son passage.

Elle revint à Jersey, dans le mois d'Août, 1845, par la Mare de St. Catherine, où elle entra un peu de tems chez M. George Messervy. Elle a été informée que, environ dix minutes après qu'elle avait quitté cette maison, le centenier Sohier, de la paroisse de St. Martin, accompagné de plusieurs personnes, fut à la dite maison pour saisir la remontrante, et y fit des recherches très minutieuses en brisant ou enfonçant des portes. Le centenier Chevalier fit aussi des perquisitions dans la ville pour trouver la remontrante, entr'autres chez M. George Vardon.

Et la remontrante déclare de plus être prête à affirmer par son serment la vérité de faits susallégués.

Rosalie Rabecq.

Rosalie Rabecq, wife of Mr. Philippe Mourant, examined through an Interpreter.

1846. Is that your mark, and did you send that paper to the Commissioners (the foregoing Memorial being shown to the Witness)?—I acknowledge this as my mark; and this document is a complaint which I sent to Her Majesty's Commissioners.

1847. Are you now married?—Yes.

1848. To whom?—To Mr. Philippe Mourant, of St. Saviour's.

1849. Is that the father of the Philippe Mourant, junior, who is mentioned in this memorial?—Yes.

1850. When were you married?—On the 18th of September, 1845.

1851. Where?—At St. Saviour's.

1852. In this Island?—Yes.

1853. There was no marriage ceremony abroad, was there?—No: it was in the parish of St. Saviour's, Jersey.

1854. That was after your return to Jersey?—Yes.

1855. Have you been abroad since?—I have been to France with my husband.

1856. Of your own free will?—Yes.

---

Mr. Abraham Aubin.

Mr. Abraham Aubin examined.

1857. Are you centenier of St. Saviour's?—Yes.

1858. Do you recollect looking for Madame Mourant?—Yes.

1859. When was that? Was it somewhere between Easter and August, 1845?—Somewhere about that. I think it was on a Friday morning that I was called on.

1860. Was it early?—Yes; it was very early.

1861. You did not find her, I believe?—No.

1862. From what quarter did you receive your information?—From Mr. Philippe Mourant, junior.

1863. The last witness was a servant, at that time, of his father, was not she?—Not at that time; she had been away a month or so, I should expect.

1864. Whose servant had she been?—She did not live anywhere then, I believe. Before that, she lived with the father.

1865. By "lived," do you mean in his service?—Yes; in his service.

1866. She had been away from the house of Mr. Mourant?—Yes.

1867. What was the information, which you received from Mr. Mourant, junior?—He complained to me about his father keeping company with this woman.

1868. Was that the whole of the complaint?—Yes; I believe that was all.

1869. You had some persons with you, when you went to look for her, had not you?—Yes. I had one of the Police officers with me, and the son of Mr. Mourant.

1870. Did you go for the purpose of seizing her, or not?—It would have depended upon the circumstances.

1871. Upon what circumstances?—As I was informed they kept bad company together, I thought it my duty to go and search the house.

1872. To search whose house?—This Frenchman's house.

1873. Mr. Mourant's, do you mean?—No; a Frenchman that she was living with.

JERSEY.

Mr. Abraham Aubin.

14 September, 1846.

1874. Do you mean bad company with the Frenchman, or with the father?—With the father.

1875. You received information from the son that Rosalie Rabecq was keeping bad company with the father; and therefore you thought it your duty, in company with young Mourant, to go and search the house where she then was?—Yes.

1876. Did you give information to the constable?—No.

1877. Neither that you were going to do it, nor that you had done it?—No.

---

Mr. Francois Godfray.

Mr. François Godfray (Advocate) further examined.

1878. Were you constable of St. Saviour's at the time alluded to?—Yes.

1879. According to the course of practice, should the centenier have reported to you in this case?—By the directions which have been given, whenever a centenier goes to arrest a person, the constable ought to be informed.

1880. Before his going?—Either before or after.

1881. There was no arrest here?—He ought to have informed me before he went. I consider that the constable is the head officer of the Police, and that nothing can be done without him.

1882. That is the effect of the oath taken by him, is not it?—Yes. Nothing can be done without the constable.

1883. By his oath he is obliged to report to you, is not he?—I do not recollect the oath precisely.

---

Mr. John Chevalier.

Mr. John Chevalier further examined.

1884. You went in search of this woman, did not you?—I did.

1885. Can you give us the date?—I have a copy of the letter from the Lieutenant Governor, that Mr. Le Sueur put into my hands.

1886. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Can you verify that copy?—Yes; this is a copy of the letter.

1887. (To Mr. Chevalier.) What is the date of that letter?—11th of June, 1845.

The letter was read as follows.

1888. Sir, Governor's Office, Jersey, 11th June, 1845.

It appearing, from the papers transmitted to me in your letter of yesterday's date, that Rosalie Rabé * is a woman of bad conduct, and altogether a dangerous character, I request you will take an early opportunity of sending her to her native country.

I have the honour, &c. &c.,

To E. Gibbs, M.G. Lt. Gov.

P. Le Sueur, Esq., Constable of St. Héliers.

En conséquence de cet ordre, Rosalie Rabé fut renvoyée du pays: elle y est revenue furtivement, et y est restée quelques jours: mais elle a réussi à se soustraire aux recherches de la Police.

(Signé) P. Le Sueur, Connétable de St. Hélier.

1889. (To Mr. Chevalier.) You found her, she says, in her bed?—She was found in a room in Mr. Resnouf's Court.

1890. She was not up at the time, was she?—I do not know.

1891. It was about six in the morning, was not it?—Rather later than that. I think somebody told me that she was not up; and I waited about half an hour or so in the yard, till she dressed, or till she was ready to come.

1892. Was this before you had heard of the Governor's letter?—I think, it was after I had received this letter that I went. Mr. Le Sueur put this letter into my hands; and, I think, it was in consequence of that that I went.

1893. Was that the first time of your looking for her?—I have no recollection of ever having been but once.

1894. Did you tell her that there had been a theft committed in St. Saviour's?—I do not recollect that I did: but I rather think the son told me something had been robbed: but whether I told her that there had been I do not know. I know the son told me something had been robbed at his house, or at his father's. I paid very little attention to what he said.

1895. Did you mention the name of Johnson?—I do not know: I do not suppose that I did.

1896. Do you know the name?—No; I do not know the name.

1897. Did not you desire her to go and see Johnson?—I have no recollection of that at all.

1898. Did you take her to prison?—No.

1899. To the hospital?—Yes.

1900. Are you quite positive that this letter of the Governor had been seen by you before you did this?—I really think it was in virtue of that letter that I went to the house.

1901. Do you feel positive?—I have no recollection of my ever having seen the woman but that instant.

1902. May we take it down that you are certain of that?—I feel confident that that was the case. I have never accompanied her, except the Sunday following; and she herself says that I told her that I had a letter from the Lieutenant Governor.

1903. Are you confident that you never took her but once?—I have no recollection of ever having seen the woman but that single time.

---

* The name was mis-spelt.

1904. That is to say, two or three days continuously?—It was the Thursday or Friday that I took her. She told me she came from the coast of France; and she told me that she lived near Regneville. I made inquiries, and was told that a vessel was going to leave the island.

1905. What directions did you give, when you took her to the hospital, to Mr. John Binet?—I told him that it was most likely for a day or two, as she was ordered off from the island.

1906. You do not recollect that you did say so?—No; I cannot recollect now. I told her, I think, that it was for a day or two that I should have to send her out of the island; that I had a letter to do so.

1907. You do not give a direct answer to anything I ask you.—I have not the best of memory, unfortunately for me.

1908. Do you know what sort of place she was put into in the hospital?—No; I do not.

1909. Do you recollect her desiring to be taken to the Court?—No; there was an order from the Lieutenant Governor.

1910. Do you recollect enough to say that she did not express that desire?—There was an order from the Lieutenant Governor. I do not recollect that she ever asked me such a thing.

1911. Is your memory sufficiently positive to enable you to say that she did not?—I am most positive that she did not tell me so. I think I should recollect if she had.

1912. You do recollect telling her that you had the orders of the Lieutenant Governor?—Yes.

1913. You saw her again on Sunday, did you?—Yes.

1914. Did you charge her with any offence at all?—No.

1915. When you saw her on Sunday, you put her into a vessel, I believe?—I put her into a van or a coach that we had there, and drove her to St. Catherine's Bay, where I was informed a vessel was going near her native place, to Port Baile, near Regneville.

1916. How far is Regneville from Granville?—I should suppose about six leagues.

1917. Did you tell her that she was going to Granville?—No.

1918. Where is Port Baile?—It is on the coast of France, close by Regneville.

1919. Can you tell me how far it is from Regneville?—

1920 Mr. Pelgué. It is forty miles to the best of my recollection: I have been that way.

1921. (To Mr. Chevalier.) Did you mention Botany Bay to her?—No.

1922. Are you quite confident of that?—Quite confident.

1923. Did you tell her that she had better not come back to Jersey?—I may have told her that.

1924. Do you recollect telling her that?—No; I do not recollect saying so.

1925. Did you afterwards look for her, on hearing that she had come back?—I do not recollect that I did: that is the only time that I ever saw the woman, to the best of my recollection.

1926. Were you ever in search of her afterwards?—No.

1927. The first you heard of the application to the Lieutenant Governor was from Mr. Le Sueur putting that letter into your hand?—Yes; he put the letter into my hands; and by virtue of that letter I looked for the woman.

1928. Did you know that an application was intended to be made to the Lieutenant Governor?—No.

1929. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Is it usual, when the Governor exercises this power, for him to act through his own officers, or through the officers of Police?—Through the officers of Police. He generally directs, of his own authority, the constable to send away the person, if he is an alien.

1930. (To Mr. Chevalier.) Are you quite certain whether you said to her anything at all about a robbery having been committed by Johnson?—I may have told her that; the son told me that there was one.

1931. Did you do so or not?—Since that time I cannot recollect. I know that the son had told me so; it was some days previous to that he told me that this girl was living with his father, and that everything was going from the house; that a great many things were robbed from the house. I may have told her that a great many things had been robbed from the house.

1932. When you went with her, did you charge her with robbery, or did you tell her that you had had the Lieutenant Governor's order to take her out of the kingdom as an alien?—I never charged her with robbery.

1933. Nor with being concerned in a robbery with Johnson?—No.

1934. Then what she says in this paper is false?—I have not the least recollection; and, if I had, I think I should have recollected it.

1935. Do you keep no note at all of any of these circumstances?—No. If I have to present a person before the Court, I make notes to form the Report upon it; but in this case, as I had no Report to make, I did not make any note.

1936. It was prior to her marriage with Mr. Mourant?—Yes; it was before that. That letter remained in my possession for some time; and the son, on Saturday, came and told me that he had heard she was gone to Guernsey, and he wanted the letter back again; and I think I gave it to him.

1937. The Governor's letter?—Yes. The original was taken to Guernsey by the son. He left it in Guernsey; and this is a copy of it.

1938. What you had at the time you sent her out was the original, was it?—Yes.

1939. (To Mrs. Mourant.) Was it after or before your marriage that the centenier came to your house?—Before my marriage. Since my marriage, I have not been meddled with at all.

1940. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Mr. Le Cronier is unwell, is he not?—He is.

JERSEY.

Mr. Philippe Mourant, Sen. 14 September, 1846.

Mr. Philippe Mourant, Senior, examined.

1941. Are you the husband of Rosalie Rabecq?—Yes.

1942. Do you recollect her arrest by Mr. Le Cronier?—Yes.

1943. Do you recollect Mr. Aubin searching for her afterwards?—Yes; I recollect Mr. Aubin searched the house for her in St. Saviour's.

1944. Do you recollect Mr. Chevalier taking her afterwards?—She was at St. Saviour's, and was sent for, and went to town, and slept in town; and, the next evening, Mr. Chevalier went to her house and conducted her away. The name of the person is Clement Resnouf at whose house she slept in town.

1945. When was it that Mr. Chevalier took her away?—I was not present at the time.

1946. When did you first hear of it?—The same day.

1947. What day was that?—I cannot recollect the day.

1948. Do you recollect the month?—I do not recollect the month or the year.

1949. Have you made any charge to any body of any robbery in your house?—My house was robbed while I was in Guernsey.

1950. Before the time that she was taken up?—After she was arrested.

1951. Had you made any complaint of your being robbed before she was arrested?—She was in Guernsey with me at the time my house was broken open.

1952. Before Rosalie Rabecq was taken away, had you made any complaint of your house being robbed at all?—I had not complained to any body, as I had not perceived that my house had been robbed.

1953. Or that any articles had been taken from it?—I had not perceived that anything had been taken away from my house.

1954. Did your son live with you?—He had left the house in the month of August; after which the house had been robbed.

1955. Was your son living with you at that time?—Yes.

1956. Did your son sleep at the house at the time?—Sometimes; and at other times he resided with his wife.

1957. Where is his wife's house?—In Grouville.

---

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur further examined.

1958. Can you give the Commissioners any information upon this case?—I know, when this woman was first put into the hospital, I heard of it on the Sunday morning. The son, Mr. Phillippe Mourant, complained.

1959. Complained to whom?—I saw him in the course of the Sunday; and he was then complaining that a woman of bad character had induced his father to promise to marry her, and that she had robbed him.

1960. Robbed the father or the son?—I cannot say positively whether the father or the son; but I should rather say the son.

1961. This was after Mr. Chevalier had taken her?—It was the first time she had been placed in the hospital. She could not have been in the hospital twenty four hours, because she was liberated in the morning.

1962. Was this the first apprehension, before the apprehension to which Mr. Chevalier speaks?—Yes.

1963. You can give us the date?—No; it is impossible for me to give you the date.

1964. Was it before the Governor's letter?—Yes.

1965. Who put her in, then?—I think it was Mr. Le Cronier. He complained also that she had threatened the life of his children, that is, Mr. Phillippe Mourant, Junior's, children. At that time, I thought perhaps that the object of the son was to prevent his father, who was an old man, marrying this woman; and I think I gave directions to have her put out of the hospital.

1966. You thought she was not a proper subject for confinement?—I thought the charge was not sufficiently expressed.

1967. The charge of robbery?—Yes: and also about the threats that she had used.

1968. The impression on your mind was that the real object was to prevent an imprudent marriage?—Yes.

1969. Was she released?—Yes: I suppose she must have been released in the course of the morning, the Sunday morning. Sometime after, Mr. Mourant, Junior, again complained about this woman, and wanted her to be sent out of the island. I said that the Police had no such authority; but, though the marriage would be an improper one, however unfortunate it might be for the family, the Lieutenant Governor had alone the power to send her out of the island. He wrote a complaint to the Lieutenant Governor; and, I think, it was supported by two affidavits that she had threatened the life of his own children. Upon that, the letter came; and I handed it over to Mr. Chevalier. I had been before to the Lieutenant Governor, I think a day or two previous: some of the papers had been submitted to him; and I was informed that the letter would be granted. I think Mr. Chevalier had the letter before he acted.

1970. Was it from the Lieutenant Governor you heard the fact that the letter would be given?—From his secretary.

1971. Mr. Chevalier. I have referred to the books; and I find that I took the woman into the hospital on the 12th of June, and took her out again on the 15th; that was the day after the order of the Lieutenant Governor.

1972. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) The Commissioners understand you have some other evidence to give them?—I would wish to make a few remarks on the evidence, or the charges which have been brought forward against the Police of St. Hélier's, and especially to the complaints that they have acted, or been biassed, in some instances, by political motives, and, in others, by personal spite. With regard to Mr. Charles Romeril, this man was formerly the keeper of the powder magazine, where the merchants' powder was deposited, at the Rocher Fendu, on the South Hill. A fire broke out on Sunday morning in Sand Street. It was got under with great difficulty. There was a large concourse of people; and, at one time, I discovered that several barrels of powder had been deposited in a small store adjoining the house on fire. At great risk this powder was withdrawn. It it had exploded, it might have destroyed a great part of the town. I found that Mr. Charles Romeril had deposited the powder in that store. I was obliged to insist upon having the key of the powder magazine; and he was displaced shortly after by the Parish Assembly. Since that, he has frequently insulted the Police.

1973. You trace his hostility to the Police to your official interference?—Yes; ever since that, Mr. Romeril has had a spite against the Police; and, in the paper which he edits, he has often insulted the Police.

1974. You consider him as an antagonist altogether, do you?—The efficiency of the Police is more as a moral force than a physical one.

1975. In its present state?—Yes; and the insults which have been heaped upon the Police by newspapers have materially diminished the efficiency of the Police.

1976. You think they have diminished its efficiency by creating an unpleasant feeling on the part of many people against it?—Yes.

1977. Do you consider this hostility of some of the newspapers against the Police as arising from political feeling?—Partly from political feeling, and partly also from personal spite. Very often, in this island, if a public functionary does his duty, and in doing so displeases any one, immediately those persons become political opponents, and at the same time do all in their power to attack such a functionary.

1978. You say it creates a political feeling?—Yes.

1979. In what way does the resentment against the conduct of a Police functionary become political?—Very likely the Police would be immediately attacked, as never acting but under political influence, or as being biassed by political influence.

1980. What the Commissioners want to trace is the connection between a dislike to a particular Police officer, or to the Police in general, and political feeling. Is there a Police and an Anti-police party?—There is not exactly a Police and an Anti-police party; but, as every citizen takes more or less part in the political affairs of the island, and personal quarrels generally turn or influence the conduct of those who are parties to them, very often those people change sides merely on account of personal quarrels.

1981. What I want to understand is. why a person, who has an affray with a Police officer, can be sure that, in turning it into a political quarrel, he is not injuring his own party as well as the opposite party.—It is generally the case.

1982. You think parties cannot be divided into a Police and an Anti-police party?—I can mention a case to the point. I voted against a Director to the Hospital, Mr. Sullivan. Immediately after, the Messrs. Sullivan, his sons, and himself, who had voted for me in the previous elections, turned round and became very active Laurel men; and during the last two years, those persons having got the "Constitutionel," reckoned to be the principal organ of the Laurel party, I have been ever since grossly insulted in that newspaper. On that occasion, I acted of course in my legislative capacity, as a member of the States.

1983. You state the efficiency of the Police to be as much moral as physical?—Yes.

1984. You think that their moral efficiency is injured by the fact that a functionary, who has done his duty, is disliked, and that dislike becomes political?—Yes, very often.

1985. And that turns them into Laurel or Rose men, as the case may be?—Yes.

1986. And you trace it up to the fact of the Police being recognized, rightly or wrongly, as being of one party or the other?—The members of the Police take part with one party or the other.

1987. Together, generally, I presume?—Generally together.

1988. And the whole system, you think, injures the moral efficiency of the Police?—Of course, if the Police is insulted every Saturday by the papers.

1989. I understand you to attribute the impediment offered to the efficiency of the Police to the fact, that the dislike to them is apt to degenerate into a party feeling?—In many cases it is so.

1990. I understand you to say that an officer of the Police, who does his duty irrespectively of party, is liable to have those who have supported him turn against him; or liable to attacks in the newspapers from the other party?—Yes.

1991. Does not that in fact tend to prevent members of the Police acting as perfectly free agents in the discharge of their duty?—Within my knowledge, whenever they are called upon to act in their public capacity, I have not known that they have allowed themselves to be swayed by party motives.

1992. Would not attacks of this kind intimidate a timid man?—As to intimidating, the attacks generally appear in the newspapers.

1993. A person does not generally like to have himself abused in a newspaper?—The Police officers, in consequence of insults, to which the Police have been subjected for some time, would not very likely wish to act alone, as they did formerly; they would be afraid of being ill treated.

1994. So that in fact the office of the constable or centenier, if the person does his duty, is a very disagreeable one at present?—It is.

1995. Is it liable, among other charges from persons who have taken offence at them, to be charged with political bias?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.
14 September, 1846.

1996. You say that the Police to a great extent act in parties together; I presume that the side which may be prevalent at one time is not always prevalent?—Not always,

1997. Has the same party feeling existed in the case of the prevalence of one party as in the case of the prevalence of the other party? Is the party feeling as strong in the case of a prevalent Laurel party as in the case of a prevalent Rose party?—Very probably.

1998. Have the parties been differently balanced within your memory in the town of St. Hélier's?—I suppose that the majority in the Parish Assembly has generally been on the same side in the town for the last thirty years.

1999. Have you turned your attention at all, generally, to the question whether any modification of the present system could relieve the Police from the risk of having their conduct attributed to political party feeling?—It is very likely that, if the law on the rating of property were altered, and a better system of rating introduced, the members of the Police, who are members of the Parish Assemblies, would not be so often attacked upon political grounds.

2000. I understand you to speak confidently to this fact, that the Police in the town of St. Hélier's are not influenced in their conduct as police officers by party feeling.—I do not think they are.

2001. You do not think that they use their power, as mere functionaries of the Police, to promote party objects?—I know of no case in which they have done so, when they were called upon to act in their public capacity.

2002. You mean in their public capacity as policemen?—Yes.

2003. Then, if the parties in the Parochial Assemblies now connected with the Police were not the persons who actually acted as Police, they would in fact lose no power in the Assembly?—With regard to police officers, I do not think they would, supposing they were to be still in the Parish Assembly.

2004. I understand you to say that their power as policemen is never used for party purposes?—I do not think it is. The centeniers and constables, from the place which they hold, may have a certain influence in the elections; but, with regard to the police officers, if they have an influence in the elections out of the Parish Assembly, it is not through the office which they occupy.

2005. We want to learn your opinion upon this; whether their political power, as apart from their Police power, would be weakened by the loss of the Police part of their functions?—Some of the police officers have no right to vote in the Parish Assembly, except as members of the Police.

2006. You take a distinction between the centenier and constable, and the vingtenier and the officiers de connétable. The vingteniers and the officiers de connétable, you say, would lose their influence, if they were disconnected from the Police?—Yes, because they would have no vote in the Parish Assembly.

2007. But, so far as the political functions of the Police generally are important, they are quite independent of any connection which exists with, or the disconnection which might be made from, the duty of preserving the peace?—Except in the Parish Assemblies, I do not consider that the police officers' office is so important as to give them any influence out of the Parish Assembly. If they refuse to do their duty, the constable, or centenier, or the Crown Officers, may be appealed to.

2008. At present, the Commissioners are trying to ascertain whether the value of this system of election would be impaired by detaching the duty of preserving the peace, which seems to be a laborious one, from those functionaries, keeping up the functionaries, but putting the power of preserving the peace in other hands?—With respect to the persons with whom the Police are brought in contact in their public capacity, it is very seldom that those persons take any part whatever in the elections.

2009. Supposing, for the sake of argument, you were to choose a dozen persons who had never mixed with party politics at all, and put them to preserve the peace, not connecting them with the Parish Assembly; would the political efficiency of the persons now constituting the Police be in any way injured by their losing the duty, or being relieved from the duty, of keeping the peace?—I do not suppose it would. If other persons are to preserve the peace, the office ceases to exist.

2010. Do you think any good is done by attaching to those persons, who are, to a certain extent, the representatives of the people in the Parish Assembly, the duty of preserving the peace?—There is a great pecuniary advantage to the island, that the Police is not a paid Police. The only members of the Police who receive any fees are the vingteniers. They receive the poor-rates in their different parishes, but have only a commission of ten per cent. on fines, incurred generally by persons who do not do the statute labour on the roads. In St. Hélier's the fees or commission of the vingteniers in 1844 amounted altogether to 777 livres, or about 35*l*.

2011. Among how many?—Among six vingteniers.

2012. That is between five and six pounds a-piece?—There is one who receives much more than the others; one receives only five pounds.

2013. The officiers de connétable get nothing?—No; the vingteniers are the only paid members of the Police. In the whole of the country parishes, I do not suppose the commission of the vingteniers amounts to half the sum that I have named.

2014. Do you happen to know, of your own knowledge, what is the ordinary subscription, when gentlemen subscribe to keep a private watch?

2015. Mr. Evans. It is generally three shillings a quarter, or twelve shillings a year.

2016. Mr. Le Sueur. It follows, from what I have said, that the Police of the whole island does not cost more than fifty pounds a year. At the same time, the vingteniers also collect the poor or parochial rates, which, in the town of St. Hélier's, may average about three thousand pounds a year.

2017. Have the vingteniers any commission upon the parochial rates?—They have no commission whatever.

2018. That is collected at no expense?—At no expense whatever. The taxes in this island are so light that the island is generally looked upon as being free from taxes; and on that account, I believe, a great many English gentlemen are induced to flock to this Island. If we were to have a paid Police, the parish rates of St. Hélier's would have to be increased by one half at least, as I have ascertained that in Southampton, the population of which is about the same as that of St. Hélier's, the expenses of the Watch Committee exceed yearly 1700*l*. If the paid Police system were also introduced into the country parishes, of course the country rates would have to be considerably increased; and, I suppose, in some parishes, doubled. Our municipal system has been very much attacked; but I really think that the country owes a great part of its prosperity to that very system by which, for an Island containing about 50,000 inhabitants, the public peace is preserved, and the poor are relieved, at an expense, as far as regards the emoluments of the municipal authorities and the Police, of 50*l*. a year for the whole Island. The taxes that are levied in this island, whether they are local parish taxes or duties imposed by the States, are entirely applied to the relief of the poor or to public improvements. A very small portion, or a very trifling portion only, goes to public functionaries for their salaries; so that, with limited revenues, the Island has been enabled to execute all public works. The roads that have been made within the last thirty years are numerous. They have been very expensive in constructing. They are, I suppose, generally kept in good order; and we have never seen a toll-gate on any part of the Island.

2019. Some statute labour is applied to the maintaining of the roads?—There is some statute labour of course. If our municipal system is altered, and all our functionaries have to be paid, the money which is now employed in public improvements will be absorbed, or greatly so, by their salaries, or the taxes will have to be increased, and the lightness of taxation, which is the principal cause of the prosperity of this Island, will be destroyed.

2020. By destruction of the lightness of taxation, you mean it will not be so light as it is now?—The lightness of taxation now is especially the cause of the prosperity of the Island.

2021. The cause of the prosperity will be destroyed, you think, if the taxation is rendered less light?—The prosperity of the Island will be impaired if the taxation is rendered less light.

2022. When you speak of the prosperity of the Island being destroyed by removing the lightness of taxation, you speak merely of pecuniary prosperity?—By prosperity, of course, is generally meant the material prosperity of the island.

2023. Supposing it could be established that the security of property were made greater by incurring a somewhat greater expense, and the comfort of the inhabitants, and especially of the gentlemen who are called gratuitously to perform a very laborious duty, were increased, is not that prosperity of another sort?—As to the security of property, I think it is perfectly secure in the Island. The robberies committed are not numerous; and they are generally of articles of very small value. With regard to the security of property, I think that the Police, as now constituted, is quite sufficient, although improvements might be made in our laws, which would increase its efficiency without destroying the system. With regard to the preservation of order, at night, in the town of St. Hélier's, a night watch of course would be useful; but I do not think that it is required, as far as the security of property alone is concerned.

2024. It would be rather with a view to the comfort of the inhabitants?—Yes; it would be rather with a view to the comfort and quietness of the inhabitants than to the security of their property. It is very possible that, if we had had a Police Magistrate for the last twelve years, before whom persons disturbing the public peace at night might have been immediately brought by the Police, and also if we had had a more stringent law on tavern keepers, a night watch even would not have been required for the quietness of the inhabitants at night.

2025. The Police, the Commissioners understand, do not patrol at night?—They are to visit the public houses: at least they will do so; but, for some time, the law has been so very insufficient and so very uncertain in its provisions, not requiring a tavern keeper to close his house at stated hours during the night; and then, of course, the public peace is much more often interrupted than it would have been if we had had a good law on tavern keepers and also a Police Magistrate who would have had cognizance of minor offences.

2026. With respect to your remarks on the Police, Mr. Chevalier stated that he had a great deal to do; that he was up sometimes seven times in the night, and very often four or five times. Do not you, being a gentleman in very large practice here, find it a very severe call upon your time in the day time?—With me certainly it is.

2027. From Mr. Chevalier's evidence, it would appear that the difficulty in the way of relieving the Police officers of their political functions would be but small. He expresses himself perfectly willing to perform the onerous duties which are now devolved upon him?—The difficulty would be to find the money.

2028. Mr. Chevalier, who is spoken of as a very active officer, expresses his willingness to act gratuitously. How would that be diminished by disconnecting the Police officers from all political functions? Why would Mr. Chevalier be less willing to be the active policeman that he is, if the constable or centenier had no political offices to perform?—I have said that the office of constable gave a certain political influence even out of the parish assemblies.

2029. You think, if that disappeared, it would diminish the readiness to serve on the Police? Is the only remuneration looked to, in serving on the Police, the political influence the individual gets by it?—It is a consideration; but the office of centenier is looked upon as an honourable office.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.

14 September, 1846.

2030. Which you think it would not be, at least not so honourable, if it were disjoined from its political functions?—Of course it would not.

2031. The Commissioners presume that it is a great advantage to have a gentleman having your knowledge of the law at the head of the Police?—I presume my services must have been agreeable, both to the Police and to the inhabitants, having been nearly unanimously elected on several occasions.

2032. In any parish the having at the head of the office a gentleman who is familiar with the law is found to be an advantage?—I suppose so.

2033. If a gentleman were there who was peculiarly familiar with the Police law, that, as far as that particular consideration goes, would not be a less advantage?—I presume not.

2034. I think I understood you to say that the office of constable and the office of centenier, which are the head offices in the Police, though not remunerated in money, are in point of fact remunerated by political influence and consideration, and so become an object of ambition and distinction?—Yes.

2035. The constable is a member of the States ex officio, is not he?—He is.

2036. Does the office of centenier also lead, in ordinary course, to becoming constable?—In many cases, especially in the country parishes.

2037. So that it becomes an object of ambition on that account?—Yes.

2038. Besides the constable being a member of the States, and besides the chance which the centenier has of becoming a constable, and so a member of the States, is there any other political influence which he has?—The influence of his station, of course: the position of centenier is looked upon as honourable.

2039. I gathered, from an earlier answer of your's, that the constable and centenier have a direct political influence in the Parish Assemblies as at present constituted?—Yes; but there are many functionaries here who are paid, and who also exert great influence in the Parish Assemblies. The Crown officers are public functionaries who are paid.

2040. They are ex officio members of the Parish Assemblies?—Yes.

2041. Does not the influence of the constable and centeniers in the Parish Assemblies arise from the inferior Police always voting with them on parochial questions?—In some parishes it may; but in several others the members of the Police do not always vote on the same side, or with the same party.

2042. Are not the centeniers and officiers de connétable elected by the Parish Assemblies?—Yes; and on that account, of course, they generally belong to the party which is predominant in the local Assembly.

2043. Does not the party which is predominant in the local Assembly also make the rate?—It does: and the law is such as of course to allow a great deal of arbitrary discretion.

2044. Do not the majority of the Parochial Assembly also rectify the rate?—Yes; but there is an appeal from the decision of the Parish Assembly to the Court; and, when a party who complains that he is too much rated, or that he has not been admitted to the rate, has appeared before the Parish Assembly, the expenses of the appeal to the Court fall on the parish.

2045. In the event of his complaining that he is too highly rated, is not he obliged to swear to the amount of his property, and, upon his so swearing, is not he rated to half that amount?—Yes, if he complains in Court.

2046. Am I correct in stating that the ordinary mode of rating pursued throughout the parishes in Jersey is not to rate a person at half the whole amount of his property?—It is not. The Parish Assemblies have no means whatever to ascertain what may be the property of the individual; therefore persons are generally rated according to their apparent means. The real property belonging to rate-payers can of course be ascertained, but only after a laborious search in the public Register Office of Contracts.

2047. That would be an imperfect means, probably?—It is impossible to ascertain what is his personal property, or what are the debts owing from him, unless they are registered.

2048. Does not the fact, that the person, who complains of being over rated, is obliged to come before the Cour Royale, and swear to the amount of his property, and then be rated to half that amount, materially interfere with the efficacy of that appeal?—It must interfere with it; but in many cases those persons who have appealed have had no property whatever.

2050. That is an instance of a third party complaining against others being inserted in the rate list?—Yes; but since the last law I do not know any case where third parties have been allowed to complain to the Court.

2051. The date of the last law is 1833, is it not?—Yes.

2052. I have looked over the Act of 1833; and I do not see any provisions in the Act which would give a remedy against a person improperly inserted.—I do not think there is.

2053. Or improperly omitted?—No.

2054. Of course any question of this sort would come before the Cour Royale?—Yes.

2055. Would it be heard before the smaller number, or by the full Court?—It would be tried first by the inferior number, with an appeal to the full Court.

2056. Are not the Jurats of that Court elected by the people who are on the rate which has been made by those very Parochial Assemblies?—They are; but, of course, not by the very same persons who make the complaint before them.

2057. They are elected in the same manner?—Yes.

2058. Am I right in supposing that at the present moment the party which is predominant in the States is the Rose party?—The majority, I suppose, is doubtful. I do not suppose any question has come before the States lately, from which one could exactly know how that was.

2059. In the Parochial Assemblies, am I right in supposing that the Rose party is predominant?—In town the Rose party is predominant. I cannot speak positively as to the other parishes; but I believe that it is not predominant in St. Ouen's, Grouville, St. Clement's and Trinity.

2060. Do you agree that there is one parish in which it is not much of a party question?—In St. Brélade's, I suppose, there is not so much political feeling as in any one of the others.

2061. Without taking the whole of the States, are you sufficiently acquainted with the politics of the Jurats, acting in the States, to know what party has the majority among them?—The liberal or Rose party.

2062. How would it be with the constables?—The Rose party also has a majority among the constables.

2063. It is your opinion, is not it, that the important political influence of the constables and the centeniers is in the Parochial Assemblies?—Yes; and also at the public elections.

2065. Is not it ordinarily the case that the majority of the parish goes with the majority of the Parochial Assembly?—There are parishes in which it has not been the case.

2066. In which the majority of rate-payers do not go with the majority of the Parish Assembly?—No.

2067. But ordinarily it is so?—It is in many cases.

2068. More frequently than not?—Yes; more frequently than not.

2069. Would not the very functions of the Parochial Assembly tend to produce that effect?—Yes, since they make out the rate list.

2070. I observe you gave this answer to the Commissioners. You say it is likely, if the law on the rating of property were altered, and a better system introduced, the members of the Police who are members of the Parish Assembly would not be so often attacked on political grounds. Am I right in supposing that it is their interference in the Parish Assembly which gives a political character to the Police? The having the discretion thrown upon them?—That is one of the reasons.

2071. Are you sufficiently old to remember the last Act which was made for the rating of Parochial Assemblies? That was in the year 1833. Were you in the habit, at that time, of taking part in public affairs?—I was quite conversant with what was going on in the Island.

2072. Are you able to say what party in the States at that time had the majority?—That was passed by the Laurel party.

2073. The preamble of that Act is:—

"Les Etats, convaincus que les décisions, en sens divers, rendues par les différents Magistrats qui ont été appelés à prononcer sur les qualités requises pour avoir droit de voix dans les Elections de Juré Justicier, de connétable et de centenier, ne peuvent résulter que de l'insuffisance et de l'obscurité de la loi contenue dans le code de 1771; et considérant que souvent ceux qui formaient la majorité dans les Assemblées de Paroisse, abusant du pouvoir que la loi leur a confié, ont, à la veille d'une Election, dans la vue de favoriser leur candidat, obtenu une rectification du Rât Paroissial, et y ont fait inscrire des personnes qui ne possédaient aucune propriété, et en ont fait retrancher qui avaient les moyens de contribuer aux taxes publiques, et que ces abus de pouvoir ont donné naissance à une foule de procès, et servent d'autant plus à alimenter l'esprit de parti et à soulever des passions haineuses qu'ils restent le plus souvent impunis par le défaut de la Législation actuelle; que la plupart des Assemblées de Paroisse ne répartissent point les taxes publiques en proportion de la fortune des contribuables, et ne suivent, pour ainsi dire, d'autre régle que leurs caprices."

Those appear to have been the mischiefs which this Act was intended to remedy. Is it your opinion that those mischiefs still exist, notwithstanding the Act?—Parish Assemblies have no means to ascertain what may be the property of individuals, so that they are obliged to rate them according to their apparent means.

2074. Has the operation of this Act had the effect of curing the imperfections and mischiefs which are mentioned in the preamble?—Some of the evils have been remedied.

2075. Which do you think have been remedied?—The Parish Assemblies cannot, as they did formerly, make a new rate immediately before an election takes place.

2076. Is it the case now that the rate lasts the whole year?—Yes; it is made in January, and lasts the whole year. With regard to the allegation, "et y on fait inscrire des personnes qui ne possédaient aucune propriété," very likely that abuse has not been diminished at all.

2078. A remedy is provided for that: but I gather from you that that remedy is very inefficient.—Very inefficient; and, with regard to party spirit, I do not suppose it is diminished in any way since 1833.

2079. Then that Act has not entirely produced its effect?—No.

2080. You say, if the law as to the rating of property were altered and a better system introduced, that would be an improvement. Have you any better system to suggest?—Not at present. A system is now under the consideration of a Committee of the States.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.
14 September, 1846.

2081. Has it been so long, or only very lately?—Lately.

2082. Could you tell me the names of the gentlemen who act upon that Committee?—There are Messrs. Bisson, Picot, and Le Gallais, the Rector of St. Hélier's, I think (I am not positive as to the clergy who belong to the Committee), and the constables of St. Saviour's, St. Brélade's, and St. Hélier's.

2083. Perhaps it is a question which, being purely a political question, the clergy would not be likely materially to interfere in. Am I right in supposing that those gentlemen usually avoid political contests of any sort?—There is hardly a person in the Island who is free from party: very few.

2084. I gather from your answer that any change to be introduced, which is to prevent the Police from being attacked on political grounds, must be a change which must prevent the inferior Police being members of the Parish Assembly?—I do not see that that follows.

2085. Your former answer did not intend to exclude the vingtenier and the officiers de connétable from being members of the Parochial Bodies?—No: but, if persons are to be rated at all, better means must be devised to ascertain what is the amount of their property.

2086. Would not the same political objection exist with regard to the Police if they continued members of the Parochial Assemblies, as policemen, without the necessity of being rated at all? I understand that the centenier and the officiers de connétable are members of the Parochial Assembly without the necessity of being rated to the same amount that the Principaux are. If any change of rating were to take place, continuing those gentlemen who are members of the Police as members of the Parochial Assembly because they were officers of the Police, would not the political feeling against them, whether right or wrong, still continue?—I think that party spirit would be very much reduced over all the Island by merely altering the rating.

2087. Without excluding the vingtenier and the officiers de connétable from the Parish Assembly?—Yes.

2089. If the political power of the constable were taken away, would the office be any longer an object of ambition?—Of course not, if the constable were not a member of the States.

2091. Would not the abuse then be in hands which had nothing to do with the functions of the Police?—They would have nothing to do with the functions of the Police, but the same abuses would exist.

2093. You say abuses would still exist, whatever alterations were made as to the vingteniers and officiers de connétable, unless you remedied the present system of taxation. Would not one abuse cease to exist, namely, the imputation of political feelings to the vingtenier or officier de connétable?—At the same time the office would cease; for I suppose, if they were not members of the Parish Assembly, there would be no honour or importance attached to the office, and they would not take such onerous duties upon themselves.

2094. Then the mere love of country, which Mr. Chevalier spoke of, would not be quite sufficient in other cases than his?—In this question, I think the love of country has also great influence; but, if persons are prevented from taking any part in the affairs of their country, they are very much more indifferent as to its prosperity.

2095. The public feeling which finds vent in the character of a legislator would not be diminished by the legislator being disconnected from the Police, would it?—Not with regard to the legislator, perhaps.

2096. Are there any other points into which you wish to enter?—I would merely add, at present, that, if unpaid functionaries were prevented from exercising a certain influence in the affairs of the country, that share would of course pass over to the paid functionaries.

2027. Why so?—If the paid functionaries were allowed to take an active part in the elections, and in the general affairs of the island, as they now do.

2098. By paid functionaries, do you speak of the paid functionaries which would remain, or which would be substituted?—Which would remain and which would be substituted, both.

2099. What number of public functionaries are there who, by virtue of their office, are members of the Parish Assembly?—The Bailiff, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the Vicomte, and the Greffier. With regard to the paid functionaries, I would merely observe that, a short time before the last rectification of the rate of St. Hélier's, the Attorney General presided at a meeting, or at least so it appeared in the public papers (and I suppose the fact is correct), to upset, if possible, the actual majority in the Parish Assembly. Of course, the ostensible object was to insure an equitable division of the whole assessment of the rate; but I am confident that, if Mr. Le Breton's party had then had a majority, they would not have acted with more fairness towards the rate-payers.

2100. What is the inference you draw as to the working of the system from that circumstance?—That, if unpaid functionaries were prevented from taking any part in the public affairs of the island, the same rule ought to be extended with much more reason to the paid functionaries.

2101. What I want to understand is this. Those vingteniers and officiers du connétable are members of the Parish Assembly, being placed in that office by election. If it is important that there should be unpaid persons so placed in office by election, is there any difficulty in the electors placing unpaid persons in the parochial office, without those persons being necessarily under the burthen, or having the power, of assisting in preserving the peace? Might not the principle be as well kept up without connecting the persons with those duties which are so onerous?—They are onerous; but they are a great saving to the country.

2102. In what way is what you are now contending for connected with the loading or honouring, as the case may be, those gentlemen with the duty of keeping the peace?—They are elected to keep the peace; and, of course, if their powers are withdrawn, there would be but little honour connected with it.

2103. Have you any further evidence to give to the Commissioners?—I have some details to give to the Commissioners, in reply to the very heavy charges which were brought against the Police of St. Hélier's, especially with regard to the rating.

2104. Will you show the Commissioners the form of the rate?—This is the rate-book of St. Hélier's, (producing the same). It consists of the number of rate-payers arranged according to their vingtaines. It is called "rât paroissial de St. Hélier." The rate payers are taxed according to the number of quarters; it contains, at the end, a recapitulation; and the rate runs in this way:—

Le rât inscrit sur les pages précédentes, pour servir aux taxes publiques, au maintien des pauvres, et autres dépenses paroissiales, a été rectifié les 28, 29 et 30 Janvier, 1846. L'Assemblée a, le 24 Février suivant, entendu les réclamations de ceux qui se croyaient surchargés, et a ajouté sur la liste du rât ceux dont les réclamations étaient fondées, conformément à la loi; et, le 8 Avril 1846, le dit rât a été approuvé et ratifié a l'unanimité, se montant à vingt-deux-mille cinq-cent cinquante-sept quartiers. L'Assemblée a, le 1 Mai 1846, taxé le dit rât à la somme de trois chelins Anglais par quartier, et a chargé le connétable de faire lever le dit rât sans délai, et d'adopter à cet effet toutes les mesures nécessaires: la dite somme comprenant le rât des chemins de douze sous.

P. Le Sueur, Constable.

Mr. Philippe Godfray said that the Police of St. Hélier's have the elections in their own hands. I have here an abstract of what was done at the Parish Assemblies last January. In the first place, with respect to those who did not vote in the last election for Jurat, there were 34 who did not vote.

2105. When was the last election?—That was the election in 1845, for Jurat. Mr. Marett and Mr. Arthur were the candidates.

2106. You are speaking of the rate-payers who did not vote at that election?—Yes. This is merely the number of those who did not vote. Of the neutrals, there were 34 persons reduced from 604 quarters to 354 quarters.

2107. They were parties who did not take any part in the election?—Yes. There were 9 raised from 76 quarters to 150 quarters; there were 33 persons who had voted for Mr. Arthur who were reduced from 365 quarters to 245 quarters. So that, if any favour was shown to any of the Rose party, it was only by a reduction of 100 quarters on the whole rate.

2108. There were 33 persons paying collectively 365 quarters?—Yes. The total sum was reduced from 365 to 245 quarters; 72 were raised from 572 quarters to 1396 quarters.

2109. Those 105 were all voters for the Rose party?—Yes. With respect to the Laurelites, there were 11 persons whose rate was reduced from 408 to 308 quarters, and 23 persons whose rate was raised from 299 to 539 quarters. With respect to the Rose party, the number of quarters added to their previous rate was 824, and the quarters reduced 120, leaving an increase of 704 quarters on their rate. With respect to the Laurel party, the quarters added to the previous rate were 240 quarters, reduced 100; their rate, therefore, being increased altogether by 140 quarters. With respect to the quarters added to the Rose men on the previous rate, they were 704, and of the Laurelites, 140, making a difference of 564 quarters.

2110. Upon those figures, I understand that the 72 Rose men were raised in their rates from 572 quarters to 1396 quarters?—Yes.

2111. Would not that have the effect of increasing the number of Principaux very much in the Rose party?—It had that very effect: but the increase did not take place entirely on the persons; at least it did not take place entirely with regard to the right of voting as Principaux.

2112. Have you any calculation to show how many Principaux are added to the Rose party. It would be about 11 quarters and a fraction per head, if distributed equally among the whole of them, would not it?—I will have that statement made out. With respect to the Police, persons who were members of the Parish Assembly, their rate altogether was increased about 26 per cent. There is a list of the different members of the Police, and the extent to which their rates were altered.

| | Total . . . | 359 | 453 | About 26 per cent. |

2114. Mr. Le Sueur. The effect is that, upon the rate paid by the Police, there was an increase from 359 quarters to 453 quarters.

2115. Did any of those gentlemen become Principaux by the change?—There were four men, that were raised from 10 to 20, who have ceased to belong to the Police.

2116. That was their year of going out of office?—They might have been re-elected.

2117. When was the period of Mr. Le Feuvre's service up?—I do not recollect as to Mr. Le Feuvre. Mr. Marett has been since re-elected.

2118. Then there were four going out; but two of them have been re-elected?—Mr. Le Feuvre was not going out. With regard to the number of Principaux on the rate list for 1846, the number of rate-payers is 1922, paying 22,557 quarters. Their average rate is therefore 11 quarters and a fraction. There are 376 Principaux, paying a rate of 15,153 quarters.

2119. Those are part of the 1922, are they?—Yes. The number of Principaux is 376, and the number of the Police who are not Principaux is 28.

2121. How many are or have been policemen in the whole Parochial Assembly?—There are a great number of gentlemen who have been connected with the Police, whom I do not know. There is no list kept. There are three or four gentlemen who, having filled the office of centenier, have now the right to vote in the Parish Assemblies, though they are not Principaux. I have here another statement of the total number of persons rated. It is 1922; and their rate amounts to 22,557 quarters. Deduct the Principaux, 376, whose rates is 15,153 quarters, and there remain 1546 persons paying 7404 quarters. From those, deducting the 28 members of the Police who are not Principaux, paying 163 quarters rate, there will remain 1518 persons, neither Principaux nor police officers, who pay 7241 quarters. The average rate of those persons is $4\frac{3}{4}$ quarters; while 28 members of the Police who are not Principaux, being rated at 163 quarters, pay an average of $5\frac{3}{4}$ quarters. That is to show that the members of the Police who are not Principaux pay more than the average number of the quarters paid by others.

2122. Have you taken the trouble to look among those 1518 who pay an average of $4\frac{3}{4}$ quarters, to see how many of those are a very little way above two?—No; it can be found by reference to the book.

2123. It appears that the details of the parish of St. Hélier's show that all those people who are not rated as Principaux are rated very low indeed.—There is a large interval between them.

2124. One would expect to find the average rising regularly up to 20.—I suppose there are not any persons rated between 15 and 20 quarters, or very few. I think in the parish of St. Saviour's almost all the Principaux are rated at 15 quarters.

2125. It would take a very small number of people rated at 15 quarters to make all the rest of the voters just have the legal rate of 2 quarters?—It would; the richer class is not the more numerous.

2126. There appears to be no class except the very rich, and the very poor?—There are a certain number at 15, and some at 10, and at 12: but I do not suppose that there are any between 15 and 20, because persons paying above 15 would prefer to be Principaux. I have also thought proper to make out a list of the professions followed by the police officers, so that the Commissioners may see whether such immense influence, as has been attributed to them, can in reality belong to those persons.

Average, 11 Quarters and a fraction; Average about 31½ Quarters.*

2128. Mr. Le Sueur. I do not know whether it would come within the limits of your Commission to enquire on what side the Police generally vote, and to enquire who are the opposite party, and whether the opposite is not the party of the paid functionaries. I can bring evidence as to the rate of the parish of St. Lawrence, where the Solicitor General is a member of the Parish Assembly, and I suppose a leader in the party. There have been gross instances of injustice, which can be brought forward. There they have disfranchised the constable of the parish.

2129. Is there a Police party there?—The Police, I suppose, vote generally, against the constable: and one of the leaders, I suppose, is the Solicitor General.

* Possibly an error for 21½; $\frac{401+879}{36}$ being between 21·6 and 21·7.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.
14 September, 1846.

2130. Mr. Romeril. Mr. Le Sueur says that I was put out of my office. The office was only worth 5*l.*; and it gave me a great deal of trouble.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.

J. W. Dupré Esq. further examined.

2131. The Commissioners were asking Sir John De Veulle, what the punishments were which can be inflicted by summary jurisdiction. It appears, from what he told us, that they are not in any distinct class, but are to be collected from different ordinances?—We have, properly speaking, no summary jurisdiction. All offences come before the Royal Court, and undergo the process which is followed there. There are certain offences judged of by the Court without a jury; and it is those cases which have been alluded to, as coming within the summary jurisdiction of the Court.

2132. In those cases which are judged of by the Court without a jury, are they, in the first instance, judged by the smaller number of the Court?—Always, with an appeal to the full Court if the fine exceed 5*l.*

2133. In proceedings in which the enditement is not called, can any other punishment be inflicted, except fine, or imprisonment for non-payment of the fine?—None; sometimes imprisonment without a fine, in cases of assault and cases of that description.

2134. Then it would be imprisonment, or fine, or imprisonment for non-payment of the fine?—Yes.

2135. I take it for granted, where a party is unable or unwilling to pay the fine, the Court has the power to levy upon the goods of the party; or, if he has no goods available, to imprison him?—Not in every case. In some penal regulations, the Court has the power to substitute imprisonment for a fine, when the party condemned has not the means of paying it or refuses to pay it. In other cases, where the law only imposes a fine, without substituting any imprisonment, in case of non-payment the party condemned could only be attached as for the payment of a debt.

2136. In the event of the debtor not having effects, does not that lead to imprisonment?—When the fine is levied upon him, if he cannot pay, then an acte de prison would be obtained against him at the suit of the Attorney General. The officer of the Court would then attach his person, and take him to prison to compel the payment of the fine.

2137. Has the person so sent to prison any means of getting out except by payment of a fine?—He would have no other means, except by making what we term a cession, that is, taking the benefit of his insolvency.

2138. A cessio bonorum?—Yes.

2139. After what time might that be done?—There is no limit of time; it would depend altogether upon the circumstances of the case. The Court would use its discretion.

2140. By saying that the Court would use its discretion, do you mean its discretion as to after what length of imprisonment a party should be permitted to be let out by a cessio bonorum?—Yes.

2141. After the penalty for non-payment has become a debt, is there anything to stop his discharging that debt, like any other, by a cessio bonorum, instanter?—No. A case of cessio bonorum is only admitted upon proof that the party has no property to discharge the debt. The Court might remand him.

2142. Then it is not quite in the nature of a debt?—The Court exercises its discretion in the case of a common debt, if there is any suspicion of fraud.

2143. They would exercise the same discretion here, as in a civil case where there was a suspicion of fraudulent practices?—Yes.

2144. Am I right in supposing that, where the charge subjects a party to the punishment of fine or imprisonment, the case is tried before the inferior number, without the intervention of an enditement?—Not in every case; it depends upon the nature of the case.

2145. An accessory after the fact, for instance, is subject to fine and imprisonment by one of your laws?—Yes. I think an accessory after the fact would be tried by a jury.

2146. What the Commissioners wish to understand is what the offences are, or what is the limit within which the jurisdiction of the Court, when exercised by the inferior number without the intervention of the enditement, extends?—It extends to cases under penal regulations made by the States.

2147. Breaches of statutes made by the States?—Yes.

2148. Is it also confined to offences arising from a breach of statutes made by the States?—Yes; and to cases of assault and battery, and also to cases arising under certain Acts of Parliament registered here, for the punishing of common rogues and vagabonds, for instance.

2149. That is, under Acts of the British Parliament?—Yes.

2150. As far as I recollect the Vagrant Acts and other Acts of the same kind, they direct the party offending to be taken before one or more Justices of the Peace?—We have not the English Vagrant Act here. The Revenue Acts, for example, the Smuggling Acts.

2151. Is not it the case, with regard to those Acts also, that they direct the party to be taken before the Board of Customs, or before a Justice of the Peace?—In some cases they do; in other cases they merely mention that they should be tried by the Courts of the Island.

2152. They mention Jersey expressly?—Yes; they mention Jersey expressly.

2153. But sometimes they give you no remedy, except before a Justice of the Peace?—Yes; but the Court perform that function.

2154. The Court interprets that to apply to the lesser number here?—Yes.

2155. Is a common assault punishable by imprisonment, or by fine and imprisonment?—By fine and imprisonment.

2156. I think I understood you to say that, where the fine was above 5*l.*, the party had a right to appeal to the greater number?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur. 14 September, 1846.

2157. Where the punishment is not fine, but imprisonment, have they also such power?—I have never known a case of appeal for imprisonment only.

2158. In some cases, there is both fine and imprisonment, is not there?—Rarely, except in cases under Acts of Parliament.

2159. In cases where there were both, would the smaller number try those cases without the enditement?—Yes.

2162. Could a party have the benefit of the enditement, if the beating, however violent, did not amount to a wound?—I should think not, unless the bodily harm done was grievous, though there was no wound.

2163. The wounding would not be a necessary test?— No.

2166. I gather from you that it was only where there was a fine amounting to above 5*l.* that an appeal would lie?—That is all.

2167. If this would not be a case which involved a fine of above 5*l.*, an appeal would not lie on this question?—No: in most cases, the Court would not refuse the enditement, when it was asked by the party accused.

2168. You say the Court would not refuse the enditement if asked by the prisoner?—In very few cases. Unless they were very slight cases indeed, they would grant it.

2169. Of course, a person accused before the inferior number would have a right to be attended by his counsel?—He would.

2170. Suppose a person to be charged with a battery upon another person, a severe beating, and by the party complaining it was not alleged that he intended to do the complainant grievous bodily harm; would it be open to the counsel for the accused to say, this is a case of grievous bodily harm, and ought to be withdrawn from your consideration, and submitted to an enditement?—I should think not, if, on the constable's Report, it was not alleged that there was injury done to the party complaining.

2171. Injury amounting to grievous bodily harm?—Injury amounting to grievous bodily harm.

Adjourned to to-morrow at half-past 10 o'clock.

Tuesday, 15th September, 1846.

J. W. Dupré, Esq. 15 September, 1846.

J. W. Dupré, Esq. (Avocat de la Reine), further examined.

2172. What is the mode in which the cases alluded to in your evidence yesterday are brought before the Court? Is the party brought up in custody, or what is the mode in which the cases decided by the Court without the enditement are brought before the Court?—Sometimes the constable will present a Report without a previous arrest of the party charged. In that case the Court either order the party to be summoned by its officer, or else order the officer to take the party into custody.

2173. What is the technical term for the first of those two modes?—"Signifier de comparâitre en justice."

2174. When they order the officer to arrest, what is it called?—"Saisir de fait, et présenter en justice."

2175. Does the constable exercise his discretion whether he will proceed by arresting the parties, or whether he will apply to the Court for an order to summon or to seize them in the way you have stated?—Generally so. In some cases, the constable will apply to the Attorney General for his advice.

2177. Do the Bar always attend at these summary proceedings?—They always attend every Court. I do not mean that every counsel will be there; but some member of the Bar will be there.

2178. Am I right in understanding you that, in all cases of proceeding before this small number, a counsel is assigned to the accused if he require it?—Yes.

JERSEY.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.
15 September, 1846.

2179. What is the next step in the proceeding?—If the party deny the fact with which he is charged, the Court order the evidence to be summoned on a future day. "Il est ordonné que ceux qui ont connaissance des faits contenus dans le dit Rapport seront convenus." If the party puts in a special defence, there is added to the order of the Court, "et de la prétention du défendeur."

2180. That would include the witnesses on both sides?—Yes; but the party charged, though he merely put in a plea of Not guilty, and then deny the facts, may also call witnesses, as well as the prosecuting party.

2181. The latter part of the order, "et de la prétention du défendeur," applies to cases where the offence is not simply denied, but some excuse is set up for it?—Yes.

2182. If the order be "Il est ordonné que ceux qui ont connaissance des faits seront convenus," would the party have the right under that order to shew that the fact committed by him was committed under circumstances which would not incur a penalty?—I think he would.

2183. So that the power of giving evidence which the accused would have is the same, whether there is a special defence set up or not?—Yes.

2184. Is a day fixed at the same time for the appearance of witnesses?—Not generally. There may be some instances in which it is fixed; but they are rare.

2185. When not fixed, does it take place at any particular day? At the next Court day, or at any particular time?—It depends upon the Attorney General to bring forward the case.

2186. Has the party any means of compelling the Attorney General to bring on the case if it is not brought on at the next or at the next but one Court day, or at any other subsequent interval?—No, unless by application to the Court, if the case should be too long delayed and he wished to have it settled.

2187. In such a case, would the Court, exercising its discretion, order the Attorney General to proceed with the case or to abandon it?—I should think so, though I have seen no instance.

2188. The Court having ordered the attendance of those parties acquainted with the facts, how are those witnesses summoned?—They are summoned by the Vicomte, or one of the dénonciateurs, at the suit of the Attorney General.

2189. What is the meaning of "at the suit of the Attorney General?" Does the Attorney General give a list of the witnesses to the Vicomte?—Yes; and in the summons it is always put "à l'instance du Procureur Général," or, rather, "de témoigner dans l'action que fait le Procureur Général à A. B."

2190. That is the precept?—Yes.

2192. By "suit" you mean "à l'instance?"—Yes.

2193. The Attorney General, therefore, at the commencement of the proceedings, is made acquainted with the witnesses whom the defendant intends to call?—Yes.

2194. Is it obligatory upon the Procureur Général to call all the witnesses named by the defendant?—Yes, certainly.

2195. He cannot exercise any discretion as to whether he will summon them or not?—No. I wish to add, referring to a part of the evidence I have given, that it is usual for the Bailiff to fix the days for hearing cases of that description.

2196. Cases which do not proceed to an enditement?—Yes; and the Procureur Général then brings on the cases which he may have in hand. The following are the two forms used for the summons of witnesses. The first is the form used in summonses sent to witnesses at the suit of the Attorney General when their evidence is to be put in writing; and the second is the form used when the witnesses are to be heard vivâ voce.

The same are delivered in and are as follows.

Mr.

Je vous signifie de comparâitre en Cour, Samedi, le jour de , 1846, instance du Procureur Général de la Reine, pour informer vers , suivant à l'acte.

---

Mr.

Je vous signifie de comparâitre en Cour, Samedi, le jour de , 1846, instance du Procureur Général de la Reine, pour témoigner vers , suivant à l'acte.

(Signé) J. Le Couteur, Vicomte.

2197. At the hearing, can any other witnesses be heard except those who are inserted in the summons which the Attorney General gives to the Vicomte?—No.

2198. In case it should happen that all the witnesses summoned should not be present, what effect has that upon the proceedings?—Those witnesses who are absent are declared to be "amercis de prison brisée:" they are then liable to be seized, and to a fine of about four shillings to the Queen, and to the costs incurred by their contempt.

2199. Can a cause proceed in their absence?—If the Attorney General and the party consent; not otherwise.

2200. Would the absence of a single witness be sufficient to stop the cause without consent?—It would.

2201. Is there no protection against a party wilfully staying away, except that which you have mentioned?—It appears from your statement that the effect of a single witness staying away would be to delay the cause continually?—It happens very frequently that they are so delayed.

2202. The Crown, by contrivance, might continue the prosecution as long as it liked; or the defendant, by his witnesses not coming, in the same way, might continue the proceedings without end, might not he?—Not without end.

2203. What is the term to it?—If a witness were called who was absent from the island, sufficient time would be given to either party to bring the witness forward. If that time elapsed, the case would be proceeded with, notwithstanding the absence of the witness.

2204. If the witness were in the island, should you trust to the vigilance of your officers to take him and to bring him into court to depose?—Undoubtedly.

2205. But this is the only limit to the continual delay of the cause?—The only limit.

2206. The witness being supposed now to be in Court, what is the course of proceeding?—The billet is called. There is also an Act of the Court, made upon the Report of the constable when they order evidence to be called.

2207. Of course this is a criminal proceeding. Is billet the term applied to criminal proceedings?—We apply the term billet to all cases, because there would be a billet before the Court when the action is called.

2208. Your word "action" also applies to criminal proceedings?—I consider "action" to be applied to the warning or summons which is sent. In summary proceedings it is not termed an accusation.

2209. A civil cause is called an action with us. It means a civil suit.—With us it may be used in both cases. It may be used as the summons; or it may be used as the proceeding itself.

2210. In the summons which is De témoigner dans l'action, action means the accusation in that sense, does it not?—It does, in that sense.

2211. First of all, the billet is called?—Yes; and then the list of the witnesses is called over. The parties are then asked by the Bailiff if they have any recusation to present to the Court against any of the witnesses. If they have none, the witnesses are sworn by the greffier. They are afterwards heard separately, if the parties demand it.

2213. Am I right in supposing that there is no written act of accusation?—The billet. We do not call it an act of accusation in a proceeding of this kind.

2214. The billet is the charge in fact?—The charge is the Report; but the billet is a document which is put in by the Attorney General, upon which the judgment of the Court is recorded. The following is the form of the billet.

"A. B. contre le Procureur Général de la Reine; l'actionnant devant ordonner par justice sur le Rapport du connétable de la paroisse de , présenté en justice, l'an 184 , le jour de , exposant que" (Here the facts set forth in the Report are inserted):

"le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au dit Rapport et en l'acte du dit jour 184 . Et ouir dépôt de témoins suivant l'acte de la cour à ce sujet."

B. C.
D. E.
F. G. } à la cause à témoigner, et ouir record d'officier."
H. I.

2214. In this case, are the witnesses examined vivâ voce; or is their evidence taken down in writing, in the same manner as it is before the smaller number, when the case is to be submitted to an enditement?—Vivâ voce.

2215. The Commissioners are informed that sometimes four witnesses are examined at once, when their evidence is taken down in writing. Of course, in this case, you do not examine more than one at a time?—No.

2216. Does not the Attorney General make a statement, previously to the case being gone into, of what he intends to prove against the party?—No.

2217. Does the trial of the case, in fact, commence by the calling of the witnesses?—Yes; first the billet, and then the witnesses.

2218. The investigation commences by the hearing of the witnesses?—Yes.

2219. When all the witnesses are heard, then the counsel for the defendant addresses the Court, and then the Attorney General?—Yes.

2220. This is the mode of summary proceeding before the smaller number?—Yes.

2221. That consists always, does not it, of the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff, and two Jurats at least?—Yes. The Bailiff, or Lieutenant Bailiff and two Jurats; there are never more than two Jurats.

2222. Do not questions of pure law sometimes arise out of proceedings of this kind?—Frequently.

2223. Are they also decided by the inferior number?—Yes.

2225. Does it frequently happen that the two Jurats differ upon the law?—Sometimes, indeed I might say frequently, it is the case.

2226. There being only two Jurats, in case of their differing the opinion of the Bailiff would of course fix the law?—It would.

2227. In point of fact, before the judgment is given by the two Jurats, do they consult the Bailiff upon the law?—Sometimes; but they are not obliged to do so: they may sometimes apply to the Bailiff for advice.

JERSEY.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.
15 September, 1846.

2228. Is it their practice to apply to the Bailiff in all cases for advice?—No.
2229. Should you say they often did so?—Not often, I should think.

---

Sir John De Veulle (Bailiff), examined.

Sir John De Veulle, Bailiff.
15 September, 1846.

2230. (To Sir John De Veulle.) Does that agreee with your opinion?—Sometimes they consult me, not always; I should perhaps say, not often.
2231. When it does take place, is the asking entirely at their own suggestion?—It is optional with the gentlemen of the Bench, whether they ask the President or not; they are not bound to follow his advice at all.
2232. Does the Bailiff himself ever volunteer a suggestion as to the law without their application?—Very seldom.
2234. In cases where they have not applied to you?—Yes.
2235 We are speaking, of course, of pure law now?—Yes.
2236. Has it often or ever happened that, after your opinion of the law has been communicated to the two Jurats who sit with you, they have nevertheless still taken their own view?—I think it has happened sometimes, but only seldom. I should say that, generally, the President of the Court would not volunteer his advice unless it were asked. Sometimes the President may not be on very friendly terms with the Jurats who sit with him; and, of course, he would be much more guarded how he tendered any advice in those cases, than if he were on friendly terms with them.
2237. You say, it rarely happens that the opinion is volunteered by the President of the Court. I infer from that expression, that in some rare instances it is volunteered?—Sometimes; but I should say generally not.
2238. Generally speaking, in those rare cases, with what spirit do you suppose such a voluntary suggestion would be received? With or without jealousy?—Without jealousy. Very frequently, I have found they would take the advice of the President; but sometimes not.
2239. Of course, what you have been saying now with regard to proceedings before the smaller number will also apply to cases before the larger number, where the Court sit as a Court of law?—Yes; except that, of course, it is much more easy for the President to communicate with the two Jurats who sit as the inferior number than with all the Jurats when the full Court is assembled, unless it be that the Court retire to consider their judgment in private, which they sometimes do; and then it would be discussed by every one in their private room.
2240. Is it not the case that, when you retire to consider a question in private, the opinion of the Bailiff is of very great weight indeed with the Jurats?—Sometimes.
2241. Would they not naturally have a very great deference for your opinion as the head of the Court?—Not always.

---

J. W. Dupré, Esq.

J. W. Dupré, Esq. (Avocat de la Reine), further examined.

2242. (To Mr. Dupré.) After the proceedings that you have stated, the Court gave their judgment?—Yes.
2243. In the case of which we are speaking is there any appeal?—Not unless the fine amounts to more than five pounds.
2244. Are those cases generally finished at one sitting, or do they take more than one sitting to dispose of them?—Generally at one.
2245. Are the proceedings the same when the party is summoned to appear as you have detailed them?—Exactly the same.
2246. What becomes of the accused in the interval between his being taken up upon the constable's Report and the hearing of the witnesses?—He would be on bail if he could put in bail, and in prison if he could not.
2247. Might it not happen that a party brought before the Court for a very small offence might be imprisoned for a considerable time before the case was finally decided?—Not for a very long time, because, where the party is in prison, the case may be heard out of term as well as during term.
2248. The Commissioners have been told that Saturday is the day usually fixed for the hearing of those cases?—It is generally for bringing up the prisoners: but Saturday is seldom appointed for the hearing.
2249. What is the day appointed for hearing generally?—There is no particular day; any day that may be convenient with regard to other public business.
2250. Would not it depend a good deal upon the leisure of the Attorney General, or his ability to attend to the case? He is to fix the day for the witnesses to appear?—The Bailiff fixes the day for such Courts to be held; and the Attorney General then brings forward those cases.
2251. On one of those days?—Yes.
2252. So that the length of time a party might be detained would depend upon the other avocations of the Attorney General?
Mr. Le Breton. Whenever a day is fixed, I never put it off on account of my own avocations.
2253. Might not the public avocations of the Attorney General interfere with his bringing on the case on a particular day?—They never, when a day is fixed, prevent me bringing on a case on that day.

2254. In practice, the case is always brought on on the day fixed by the Court?—Yes.

2255. It might be more correct, perhaps, to say that it is set down for hearing on a day fixed. If there were several cases, they might not possibly all be brought on on that day?—All the cases might not be. As many as could be disposed of during the sitting would be.

2256. (To Mr. Dupré). Is bail ever required when a party is summoned?—If a party charged is merely summoned, he is not bound to put in bail. Bail is only required where a person is attached.

2257. In cases where a party is not under arrest, the case only comes on in Term, does it?—In Term, except in some cases under the States' regulations.

2258. The regulations of local Acts?—Yes. In one of the clauses it is often regulated that such cases shall come on during the Vacation as well as during Term. In cases where the party charged forms part of the garrison he is entitled to an immediate hearing.

2259. There are two Terms, I believe?—Yes.

2260. When are they?—The first Term commences the first Saturday after the 11th of April.

2261. Has it any particular name?—Terme d'Avril. It continues to the 5th of July. The Terme de Septembre commences upon the first Saturday after the 11th of September, and finishes on the 5th of December.

2262. It cannot commence before the 12th?—No. Saturday last was the 12th; upon which day it commenced. Supposing Saturday were the 11th, it would commence on the 18th. In the case of Easter intervening in the April Term it puts off the Term for another week.

2263. In Term are any particular days fixed for the hearing of those cases?—Particular days are appointed for these causes; but there are no particular days of the week on which they always come on. The Bailiff appoints the days, at the request of the Attorney General.

2264. Is not it the case that there are other cases, besides those which take place without the intervention of the enditement? Cases above five pounds you have mentioned: are there any others?—I know no other. They are never instituted before the full Court; they only come before the full Court upon appeal. I have sometimes seen the inferior number send a case which they considered difficult at once before the full Court, without giving judgment; but that I consider an irregular proceeding. The judgment ought to be given in the first instance by the inferior number.

2265. That is to say, in all cases where they proceed without the enditement?—Yes.

2266. Are the proceedings before the full Court upon appeal conducted in precisely the same way as you have described this to be conducted before the inferior number?—Precisely in the same way, except the Report of the constable, which, of course, being already entered, is not entered de novo.

2267. Are the witnesses examined afresh?—Yes.

2268. May fresh witnesses be called?—No.

2269. Can you at all ascertain when those proceedings without the intervention of an enditement or grande enquête were first instituted? Do you suppose them to be contemporaneous with the existence of the Court, or have they grown up of late years?—I think, so far as we can see by the records, those proceedings have always existed.

2270. Have you known any instances in which prosecutions have been withheld or not persisted in on condition of the parties quitting the island?—I have frequently, for very trifling thefts, for larcenies.

2271. Where do they generally go, under those circumstances?—To their own native place.

2272. Does not it ever happen in the case of natives?—There have been cases. They go where they like.

2273. As a matter of fact, where do they like to go?—Sometimes to England, sometimes to Guernsey.

2274. They do not go to France, for want of passports, of course?—No. A few years ago, Edward Le Maitre was sent away from the island.

2275. How long ago was Edward Le Maitre's case?—I do not exactly remember.

2276. Is it as much as ten years ago?—I do not recollect.

2277. Is it considered a part of the system, or merely an irregular way of getting rid of an unpleasant person?—I think, if an unpleasant person of that kind were to ask to leave the island, he would most probably be permitted to do so.

2278. You think it still a regular and legal mode of proceeding?—I do.

2279. Though not now resorted to in the case of a native?—No.

2280. They generally go to England or Guernsey?—I should suppose so, I cannot say.

2281. Is their passage paid?—Yes.

2282. Take the case of an Englishman being sent back to Southampton under those circumstances: would he go under the custody of your officer?—No.

2283. You only put them on board a ship, and you hear no more of them?—Exactly so. I must add that, on the other side of the water, they have very frequently treated us in the same manner.

2284. Not in the case of criminals, have they?—They have sent over a great many vagrants to get rid of them, telling them Jersey was a place where they could live very well, and have good wages.

2285. Vagrants have not been sent unless on the notion that they were Jersey people, have they?—I remember a case of a man being sent from Leeds or Manchester, upon his declaration, before a Magistrate, that he was the son of a man in one of the dragoon regiments, and born while the regiment was stationed in Jersey.

2286. Do you happen to know whether the father had any settlement?—I do not know. There never was a dragoon regiment here.

JERSEY.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.
15 September, 1846.

2287. By what process did you get rid of him?—We paid his passage back.

2288. It was not an optional departure, was it?—No: he was found as a vagabond.

2289. Did he assent to it?—He was not brought before the Court. They sent us a batch of twenty five, I think, whom we were obliged to return on their hands as quickly as possible.

2290. Did they go voluntarily?—They had no means of existence; and they applied to the constable of the parish for relief; upon which the constable of the parish sent them back to their native places.

2291. Could the Governor send them back?—No.

2292. Mr. Le Sueur. There are 800 paupers sent back yearly to Southampton with their own consent.

2293. (To Mr. Le Breton). Are there any means of sending them back without their own consent?—If they are found disorderly, or without the means of subsistence, and brought before the Court, they are sent back.

2294. Is that a formal sentence of the Court?—Yes.

2295. Will you let us have one of those precedents?—I will look out for one, and furnish it.

2296. Sir John De Veulle. On reflection, I should say that, in cases of a criminal nature, the Jurats will pay more attention to the opinion of the President than in other cases, both in public and also in private.

2297. You would extend that to questions like those which arose very frequently in the trial of Marin, the questions of evidence?—Yes; they would ask the opinion of the Bailiff on such points.

---

Mr. François Godfray.
15 September, 1846.

Mr. François Godfray (Advocate), further examined.

2298. Do you wish to address any observations to the Commissioners?—There is one thing which has appeared in the evidence of the Solicitor General and of Sir John De Veulle, which is, whether the Bailiff gives his opinion to the Jurats on questions of law. I consider that it is the Bailiff's duty, on every question of law, and even of fact, which comes before the Court, to give his opinion either to the two Jurats composing the inferior number, or to the seven or more Jurats composing the superior Court; and that, if it is not done, the system cannot work, the Jurats being elected without any qualification which ensures their knowledge of the law, and the Bailiff being the only Judge in the Court, and having always been selected from amongst those who have studied the law and practised in the Jersey Court. It was the rule with preceding Lieutenant Bailiffs to give their opinions to the Jurats: and that opinion was generally followed on matters of law, except in some cases where there might exist party or personal feeling. The Jurats now on the Bench feel so much the want of obtaining opinions on points of practice and of law that they often consult, or take the opinion of, the Greffier or Clerk of the Court. I know that, of late years, no opinion is given to them by the presiding Judge: and I consider it a very great evil, tantamount in fact to the setting aside of the institution of the Royal Court. I think that in that opinion I am supported by the opinion of every practitioner in the Court.

2299. You say that they feel the want of obtaining an opinion: do they generally ask for it?—I think they feel that it is the Bailiff's duty to give it them.

2300. They abstain from asking it?—I do not enter into the question of why they abstain from asking, not knowing their motives.

2301. They do not ask it?—No; but they often ask the opinion of the Greffier or the Commis au Greffe when he sits in place of the Greffier.

2302. What is your view of the peculiar duty of the Jurats upon having obtained the opinion of the Bailiff?—I think that the Jurats are not strictly bound by the opinion of the Bailiff; but I consider, at the same time, that, not being acquainted with the laws of the island, they would pay a great deference to the opinion of a person versed in the laws.

2303. You have stated that you spoke, as you supposed, the general opinion of the Bar?—I think, if the practitioners in Court are asked their opinion on the subject, they will all agree with mine.

2304. (To Mr. Le Breton). Do you agree to that view?—I do.

2305. (To Mr. Dupré). Do you do so?—I always have done so.

2306. (To Mr. Hammond). Do you agree in the opinion so expressed?—With regard to the President of our Court, I have always considered that, as President of the Court, and like every other President of a Court of Justice, the declaration of his opinion upon any points which are brought forward must be considered as part of the duty of that President, and would, I should think, be of the utmost importance to the proper administration of justice. I do not restrict it to the mere decision upon the merits of the case, but upon all interlocutory questions, and perhaps, more especially, with regard to those which concern the forms of proceeding, respecting which it often happens that very long discussions take place before the case is entered into on the merits; and that those points would be much sooner and more satisfactorily settled if the opinion of the presiding Judge were proclaimed and known to the parties, after having been heard upon them.

2307. Among the interlocutory proceedings in this Court, points of evidence take that form?—Yes. I am speaking of causes generally: I understand Mr. Godfray to mean in all cases brought before the Court. I was extending my remarks to the whole proceedings.

2308. You explained your term of interlocutory proceedings of this Court to include proceedings which sometimes involved questions of form and practice?—Yes. There may be questions as to the mode in which the action is brought, and as to the mode in which the parties are brought before the Court, the mode of the summons, the form of the action, and a variety of similar cases which, of course, require to be disposed of before proceeding to the merits of the case.

2309. (To Mr. Francis John Le Couteur, Advocate). What do you say upon this subject?—I concur in opinion with Mr. Hammond and the officers of the Crown; but, to exonerate Sir John De Veulle, I beg to observe that Sir Thomas Le Breton very rarely expounded a case to the Jurats.

2310. Unless called upon?—Unless called on: and he never was, indeed, to my knowledge.

2311. He was Sir John De Veulle's predecessor?—Yes.

2312. (To Mr. Peter Le Sueur). Will you tell the Commissioners what your opinion is upon the point?—I cannot agree with Mr. Godfray, when he says it was a general rule that preceding Bailiffs or Lieutenant Bailiffs made it a rule to give their opinion to the Jurats. Sir Thomas Le Breton may have done so in many cases: but I do not think he made it a general rule, at least from what I have seen during the last four or five years that he was Bailiff. I agree, of course, as to the advantage of the Bailiff giving his opinion, not perhaps on matters of fact, but on questions of law, to the Jurats; and it has been certainly a practice lately in many cases to refer to the Greffier of the Court, who has several relations in the practice of the Court, and who takes a very active part in the political affairs of the island; so that, in many cases, he may be considerably biassed in favour of one or the other party.

2313. Can you state whether it ever happens that particular Jurats are more likely to consult one person and other Jurats another?—It may be the case.

2314. You are not aware of the fact?—I know that the Greffier and the Clerk of the Court have lately taken an active part in nearly all the judgments that have been given by the Court.

2315. Is the Greffier on the same side with the majority of the Jurats?—No.

2316. Will you explain, a little more fully, what you mean by his taking an active part in the judgment of the Court?—Consulting with the Judges, giving his opinion, raising objections.

2317. Volunteering it, do you mean?—Partly volunteering it.

2318. (To Mr. Marett). Will you give the Commissioners your opinion upon the subject?—When I consider the constitution of the Royal Court of Jersey, and find that it is composed of a Bailiff having for assessors twelve men elected by the people, who are not restricted in their choice to any particular class of men, it seems to me to result from its constitution that the Bailiff must be the lawyer of the Court, and has therefore not only a right, but I consider it to be his duty, to give his opinion to the Judges on all matters of law.

2319. Asked or unasked?—Yes, asked or unasked, because it is impossible for the Jurats to be generally acquainted with the law, whatever may be the extent of their general knowledge; and it appears to me that the constitution never intended that they should be lawyers. But, at the same time, I think it fair to state that, owing to the unfortunate political dissensions which prevail in this country, it may frequently happen that the Bailiff's opinion, however sound, may be rejected through animosity and personal dislike, and that therefore I am not astonished that the Bailiff should frequently refrain from offering his opinion in many cases, particularly when he is aware that those who are his assessors at the time are indisposed towards him, and would perhaps be inclined to place him in an unpleasant position if they could. I can well understand that on such occasions the delicacy of the gentleman would interfere with the duty of the Judge, though assuredly it should not.

2320. Sir John De Veulle. I am extremely sorry to be obliged to contradict what Mr. Godfray has stated. I believe I have only followed the practice of my predecessors. I do not recollect, since I have been a member of the Court, that it has been the practice for the presiding Judge to give his opinion the first, or in any case except the Jurats were divided. I can speak with confidence that, when Sir Thomas Le Breton was president, he never gave us his opinion unless he was asked it.

2321. How long were you a Jurat?—I think I was elected in 1827, and remained so till I was appointed Bailiff in 1831.

2322. (To Mr. Philip Winter Nicolle, Jurat.) Have you anything to say upon what has been stated?—I have been Jurat since Sir John De Veulle has been Bailliff, and in criminal cases, as member of the enditement, when Sir Thomas Le Breton was Bailiff: and I have never known it followed.

2323. Have you ever known Sir Thomas Le Breton volunteer his opinion?—He charged the Jury, especially the Grand Jury.

2324. The question refers to the Jurats.—I am not aware that Sir Thomas Le Breton gave his opinion, unless the Jurats were divided, unless it came to his casting vote.

2325. Supposing a point of law or of practice arises, the question now suggested is, whether the Bailiff should offer his opinion to the Jurats. Assuming one of those cases which are tried by the Court alone without the intervention of an enditement, and a question of law arising, ought the practice, in your opinion, to be that the presiding Judge should first say, "Gentlemen Jurats, the question you have to decide is so and so: this is my opinion of the law?"—I could see no impropriety in the Bailiff giving his opinion upon the subject: but of course his opinion would only prevail in the event of the Judges being equally balanced.

2326. You would not wish to be bound to follow it?—I would attach that importance to it which I thought his observations deserved. In the giving of evidence, there may be cases when a point would be mooted; but I am not aware that the course, as far as I have been present in the Court, has been different.

2327. (To Sir John De Veulle.) An objection to the evidence would be taken before the inferior number; but there would be an appeal to the full Court on a question of evidence,

JERSEY.

Mr. François Godfray.

15 September, 1846.

would not there?—The same question may be propounded again. Every question which has been mooted before the inferior Court may be mooted before the superior.

2328. So that a question of evidence might arise, and be discussed, before the inferior number, and be decided by them, and be afterwards propounded before the superior Court?—Yes: it is not often that it has happened.

2329. But that would be the law?

2330. Mr. Hammond. It would be reserved: it would not be like an appeal.

2331. (To Mr. Bertram, Jurat). How long have you been a Jurat?—Four or five years.

2332. Have you any remark to make on what you have heard?—I have myself, on various occasions, asked Sir John De Veulle his opinion upon subjects which were then before the Court; knowing that Sir John had been bred a lawyer, I have invariably taken his opinion.

2333. That is, followed his advice?—Yes.

2334. You do not, as a Jurat, remember Sir Thomas Le Breton's time?—No.

2335. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. I am requested by the Greffier, and I do also in my own name, positively and emphatically deny the correctness of Mr. Le Sueur's statement as to our volunteering our opinion to the Court. We do very frequently give our opinions to the Court, when requested to do so: and those gentlemen are very grateful for those opinions; and, I think, with very few exceptions, will confirm what I say. I confidently appeal to the Crown Officers and to the advocates of the bar, and I would do so even to Mr. Le Sueur himself, whether it is not so.

2336. Mr. Peter Le Sueur. In certain cases they do not wait till the Jurats offer their opinions. They may raise an objection to the opinion given by a Jurat, which of course may bring on an explanation.

2337. Mr. De Sainte Croix. The observation comes with a very bad grace from Mr. Le Sueur, as we have very often given our opinions upon one side as much as upon the other, even upon party questions.

2338. (To Mr. François Godfray, Advocate.) Mr. Marett, to a great extent agreeing with you, added something which did not fall from you.—I think my statement of the right and duty, and I may add the necessity, of the presiding Judge giving his opinion to the Jurats is fully borne out by all. One question has been put by the Commissioners, what was the political opinion of the Jurats. I must say there are only two Jurats who coincide with the Greffier and Commis au Greffe: one Mr. Marett, who has been ill, unable to attend for more than three years: the other is Mr. Le Gallais, who had been thirty four years practising as Deputy Vicomte, and as attorney. Mr. Marett was bred up as a lawyer; he has presided as Lieutenant Bailiff a long time under Sir Thomas Le Breton. He is well acquainted with the laws and usages of the Island, and therefore need not consult the Greffier nor Commis au Greffe on points of practice. Mr. Le Gallais is as much versed in the practice of the Court as any person practising in the Court; though, naturally, on some points there will even be a difference between practitioners. Mr. Le Gallais, therefore, would not call upon the Greffier or Commis au Greffe for their opinions; and the Greffier or Commis au Greffe are consulted by the rest of the Jurats, who, if there were a political bias, would not consult those two gentlemen, unless they thought that they would give them a fair and impartial opinion.

2339. Are not there three gentlemen of the same opinion?—Mr. Le Maistre is not of one opinion or the other. The Rose party put him there; but I would not say he was a Rose man: but, as I am called on to give an unbiassed opinion, I would not state that he belongs to one party or the other. I think the Jurats would be most grateful to the presiding Judge who would explain to them the laws or the practice: and I think that, in most cases, where that law and practice was clearly set forth by a person in whom they had confidence as a lawyer, they would generally, if not universally, follow it. I attribute the evils of our present system entirely to the Jurats having no one to guide them in questions of law or practice; and it is to me a wonder how men can be found to decide on questions of law without a knowledge of the law, if they have not a person to direct them and shew them what is the law and the practice.

2340. You do not agree with Mr. Marett, then, in his opinion that party feeling would make the performance of the duty difficult or impossible?—I think that on the Bench there is not one person who does not speak to Sir John De Veulle in private, except perhaps one.

2341. Is not it rather extraordinary that those Jurats who are so very anxious to be informed of the law never ask for information?—The Commissioners will pardon my not giving an opinion upon that question. There may be very strong reasons.

2342. The Commissioners will be obliged to any gentleman who will give them an answer to the question.—I will say frankly, as I am called on, that the Jurats have not confidence in Sir John.

2343. You do not attribute that to any political feeling?—No; I do not. I do not think political feeling exists between the Jurats and Sir John, if they had confidence in Sir John's legal opinion: otherwise it would be saying that the Jurats are willing to commit gross injustice and perjure themselves, which I do not believe.

2344. You think, in case of an opinion being given to them by the Bailiff from the Bench, as the lawyer of the Court, they would almost invariably follow it?—Yes; and they would be grateful for it.

2345. The question about to be put to you is of course confined to pure questions of law. In case they follow that opinion, what advantage is added to his opinion by its being followed by the Jurats?—Perhaps one single Judge presiding would have a great deal too much power and influence; and, the Jurats being there in the first place, the number of persons deciding the case would inspire more confidence in the inhabitants or the suitors, and at the same time avoid the oppressive or arbitrary decisions which might be given by one single person.

2346. You mean to say that in extreme cases they would find it their duty to differ, and therefore that would operate as a salutary check?—Yes: and, the law being blended more or less with the fact in almost all cases, they would decide the questions of fact.

2347. With respect to the greater number giving more confidence, to what extent would you carry that? You say twelve give more confidence than one. Would twenty four give more confidence than twelve?—I do not say that twelve give more confidence than one; but it may be other persons' opinion: because I think it might be better that persons might be judged by one more than by twelve, in some criminal cases.

2348. You think more confidence would be inspired in the minds of the suitors, though you personally think it rather a popular than a correct view?—Exactly. I must say, as that has been impugned, that I have often heard Sir Thomas Le Breton, while presiding in the Court, express his opinion to the Jurats before they delivered their opinions; and on questions of practice I have often seen him stop the counsel, saying that that point was clearly established.

2349. (To Mr. Le Breton). Do you go the length of Mr. Marett in saying that there is a risk, in case of the presiding Judge taking upon himself to interfere more decidedly in matters of law, that party or personal feeling would render the duty onerous or impracticable?—It might render it unpleasant; but I do not think it would make it onerous or impracticable.

2350. Do you believe such feeling exists in fact to an extent that would do so?—I am afraid it does; but that is only an opinion.

2351. All the gentlemen at the Bar have told us that the Jurats are generally or even necessarily selected without any distinct reference to their legal knowledge?—Quite so.

2352. The first point that would occur to one's mind would be that, as the Jurats either follow the opinion of the Bailiff or differ from it, in case of their following it they would appear to a great extent superfluous, or in case of their differing from it they would be an impediment. What is your view upon that subject? Do you think there does exist that vice in the present system?—I think that is certainly hurtful.

2353. In a legal point of view, do you think there is any compensating advantage for that?—Not except what has been mentioned by Mr. Godfray, that suitors and the public might have more confidence in the decision of many, though not so well informed, than in that of one single Judge who was better informed.

2354. An opinion in which I understand you, as well as Mr. Godfray, do not concur altogether?—I do not.

2355. (To Mr. Dupré.) Have there been more cases reversed by Her Majesty in Council where the judgment was given by the casting vote of the Bailiff than where it was the judgment of the Jurats apart from the Bailiff?—I have never examined that. I do not exactly concur with Mr. Godfray in saying that the Jurats would almost always follow the opinion of the Judges. I remember two cases, one under Sir Thomas Le Breton, and one under Sir John Dumaresq, his predecessor. Sir John Dumaresq always, in every case of importance, delivered his opinion or charge to the Jurats; and I remember once, while he was so delivering his opinion, one of the Jurats told him he did not require it. Sir John Dumaresq replied nearly in these terms: "In delivering my opinion to you, gentlemen, I perform what I consider to be my duty. When I ask you for your decision, then you will perform your's."

2356. Was not it the case that Sir John Dumaresq was a gentleman of very considerable legal attainments?—Yes; very considerable.

2357. He was a great lawyer, was not he?—He was. The case under Sir Thomas Le Breton was this. Two Jurats were on the Bench with him; and each delivered his opinion. They differed; and Sir Thomas Le Breton would concur with neither of them. He did all he could to prevail on them to come to a more reasonable opinion; but they adhered each to his own view of the case; and he was obliged to give his casting vote with one of them, although he did not concur in the opinion, in order that there should be a judgment.

2358. Do you agree in the opinion that party feeling exists on the Bench to the extent which would make the giving an opinion on the part of the presiding Judge to the Jurats onerous or unpleasant?—I should not consider, if such a duty were imposed on the presiding Judge, it would be onerous or unpleasant. Certainly, if he were at variance, either from political or personal motives, with a Jurat, he might suspect that his opinion would not have all the weight which it should have; but I do not think it can be either unpleasant or onerous to the presiding Judge to give his fair and open opinion to the Magistrates before they decide. I know, in Sir Thomas Le Breton's time, I have seen him, when assisted by two Jurats who were personally and politically hostile to him, give them his opinion on points connected with practice. I have heard Jurats in that position, relative to Sir Thomas, ask him his opinion upon such points; and in those cases his opinion was most frequently followed; but of course it would not be so in every case, nor with every Jurat on the Bench.

2359. Mr. Marett and Mr. Le Breton both seem to consider that there does exist strong bias, at all events such as would call for something like an exertion on the part of the presiding Judge in giving his opinion.—I cannot see an occasion where such feeling should exist.

2360. Do you agree with Mr. Godfray or Mr. Le Breton as to the advantages of the system of Judges who are not necessarily chosen for their legal knowledge, and not bound to follow the opinion of the Judge who is?—I think that generally, throughout the Island, the people prefer the system as it now stands: but, as to my own opinion, I think that, if twelve men are unacquainted with the law, and one is a good sound lawyer, either he will lead the twelve, if they have full confidence in him, or his sounder opinion, if they have no confidence in him, must necessarily be swamped in giving a judgment.

2361. So that, in point of fact, it would want not only a very good lawyer, but a man of considerable management and dexterity in the conduct of affairs, to arrive at the right conclusion with a court so constituted?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Mr. François Godfray.

15 September, 1846.

2362. Mr. François Godfray (Advocate). I wish to add to my opinion that I consider there are other advantages besides those which have been named.

2363. (To Mr. Hammond.) Will you state your opinion upon the subject?—I have very little to add to what I have just now stated: but, not to be misunderstood, I will, with the permission of the Commissioners, state that the question they just now put conveys the precise view I take of the duties of the Bailiff as presiding Judge.

2364. That the Bailiff should lay down the law to the Jurats?—To the parties generally. A question is mooted before him in the Court in which he presides; and upon that he states his opinion of what has passed before him. I think, if such were the case, much which has been the subject of remark would entirely disappear; that is, supposing there was hostility, political or otherwise, between the Bailiff and the Jurats, each would be responsible for his own act; and consequently the President, quite irrespectively of the Jurats, would state his opinion upon the case which was to be adjudicated upon, without tendering his opinion to the Jurats individually. A difficulty might be felt, as has been well observed by some of the gentlemen; from the position of the Bailiff and the Jurats, if he were to tender his opinion to the Jurats, or, if the Jurats were in all cases bound to ask it in the way which has been suggested, their position might prevent the one from giving and the other from asking; whereas, if the President stated his opinion without referring more to the Jurats than to the parties concerned, of course he would be responsible for that judgment stated openly, and the Jurats would be responsible for their opinions given after they had heard it; and that would do away with all that was painful in the discharge of their relative duties.

2365. The Judge would be responsible for the law, and the Jurats for going against it?—Precisely. I think, if it were confined to the Bailiff giving his opinion in private to the Jurats, it might be a disadvantage; but at all events it would not be productive of the good which the other mode would secure, because the Bailiff might give an opinion, but the Jurats would be those who would give their decisions. The Bailiff might give an opinion for which he would not be responsible; for it might never be known: whereas the other way would have the effect of doing away with all the remarks which have been made as to the position of the parties, if they are not friendly; and it would have the advantage that, if they were all friends, there would be no kind of suspicion, if both stated their opinions publicly, that there was an influence of friendship, any more than in the other case an influence of hostility. They would take the opinion of the President quite irrespectively of those around him.

2366. You would put it precisely in the way in which Mr. Dupré states Sir John Dumaresq did?—Yes. I never saw him on the Bench: but that would quite meet my view of what would be the course to be pursued in such cases.

2367. What is your opinion upon the system, with a view to the questions which have been asked of Mr. Le Breton and others? The Commissioners wish to learn the advantages or disadvantages of the system itself, of having twelve Jurats to differ from or agree with the Judge.—I would not wish to assume any more than what I consider was the intention when the Court was so constituted, that is, that those who were to perform a certain duty were equal to it. Therefore, if you assume that those who are named to perform a duty are equal to it, I do not see there is any disadvantage that there should be twelve; but, if, on the contrary, a certain number of persons are to perform a duty to which they are not competent, I would say, reduce the number as much as possible. I think all that must resolve itself into a question upon which I cannot decide.

2368. The reason that most of those gentlemen have given for insisting upon the importance of the presiding Judge delivering his opinion is, that the Jurats, by the very constitution of the Court, are not likely to be lawyers?—That makes it more important, and more imperative that he should deliver his opinion.

2369. Assuming the hypothesis that that produces the effect of the Jurats having other good qualities rather than that of experienced lawyers, do you think there is any advantage in their being joined with the presiding Judge? Does their concurrence with the presiding Judge give force to his sentence? While, if they differ with him, do not they do damage?—That is assuming that the Judge gives his opinion. It is true that Sir Thomas Le Breton did on many occasions; and then a real advantage resulted from it, and it had always great weight. Therefore, whether there were four, or six, or twelve men, would not be of much consequence. The inevitable result would be, I think, that, if he, being a sound lawyer, for the advancement of justice and the discharge of the duties of the President of the Court, gave sound opinions, though they were not followed on the first or second occasions, they must be followed afterwards. They could not but have the influence which opinions so given must necessarily produce.

2370. Your answer rather goes to show that the presence of other gentlemen would not do harm, than that it would do good?—I paid great attention to the remark which Mr. Godfray made; and I think it is worthy of much attention: that it would inspire greater confidence in the suitors of the Court, and in the inhabitants generally, that there should be the opinion of a larger number. It might be a popular rather than a legal view of the case; but I think it would have its advantage.

2371. You are assuming, on the one hand, that they follow the opinion of the lawyer who presides, and, on the other hand, that the public have the additional advantage of their opinion; are not those suppositions to a certain extent incompatible?—There may be a concurrence in the opinions of the Judges, but not necessarily a blind following. It is the opinion of the Jurat which is given; and we are to take it that it is his opinion, and not the dictation of any other person.

2372. That is to say, it is the opinion of an uneducated man, upon a point of law, either guided or not guided by the Judge. If guided by the Judge, it is not his own opinion.—

That is assuming that he is not a lawyer. If it is a judgment which appears to result from legal knowledge, it will be assumed, by the public, that it is from knowledge which pertains to the person giving that opinion.

2373. All the learned gentlemen have put the importance of the Judge's opinion on the assumption that it is the presiding Judge who is the lawyer and that the others are not.—Supposing the presiding Judge were surrounded by the most erudite lawyers, I should say it would be still his duty to deliver his own opinion as much as in the other case.

2374. What the Commissioners rather ask is, whether, whatever other advantages there may be, it is not an evil, in itself, that the Court should be so constituted that there should be twelve people who are not acquainted with the law presided over by a person who is acquainted with it, the twelve not being bound to attend to his opinion?—I decidedly consider that that is a badly constituted Court. As the question arose as to what the duties of the Bailiff were, I restricted myself to that; but, as the question is now put, as to a Court composed of a lawyer as the President and twelve assessors who are not lawyers, I should consider it is decidedly a badly constituted Court, more especially as the Commissioners are aware that the lawyer may not have to give his opinion at all in a great many cases.

2375. Is that a Court in which the public generally, knowing it to be so constituted, would have confidence?—My opinion is, that the public would not have confidence in a Court so constituted; I may add, more especially where the diversity of functions is such as are concentrated in one Court. It is the Cour Royale; it is the Cour d'Héritage for real property; it is the Cour de Cattel; and it is a Court of Equity besides: therefore it embraces all the different functions which, in other places, generally appertain to separate Courts.

2376. Do you think that the evil is likely to be diminished or increased by the circumstance that, the gentlemen having to perform other very important functions, persons must be chosen who are fit for those legislative functions? For instance, if you looked for lawyers exclusively, you might lose very good politicians?—All those functions of the Jurats out of Court are quite of a different nature.

2377. Are not the very qualifications which may make them useful members of the States of a tendency to render them incompetent to act well as Judges?—I quite consider so.

2378. The two duties, you think, are incompatible?—Quite incompatible, in my opinion.

2379. (To Mr. François John Le Couteur.) What is your opinion upon this point?—I think a great deal of the evil might be obviated if we adopted the French method, that the Jurats should always confer together, not in public, but in private. I think, also, it would tend very much to counterbalance every disadvantage if we were to adopt the French plan, that the Crown officer, the Attorney General, should not be an advocate simply, but a Magistrate; that he should sum up every case, and give his opinion upon it.

2380. (To Mr. Peter Le Sueur.) Will you favor the Commissioners with your opinion upon the point now before them?—It has been assumed, during this discussion or examination, that the Jurats alone are party men; but it is a fact well known to every one that, during centuries, the Bailiffs have taken a very active part in the political disputes of the Island, and that many of them have been strong party men, as much so, or perhaps more, than any of the Jurats elected by the people. Within the last few years, Sir John De Veulle has kept aloof from all parties. But I think that the election of the Jurats by the people has in many cases protected the Islanders against oppression, which would have been exercised by the Bailiffs. With regard to the apparent absurdity, that gentlemen brought up to the law should overrule the opinion of a presiding Judge well versed in the law, it might be observed that questions of fact are also decided by our Court, and that, although in England the Judge may give his opinion as to what ought to be the decision of the jury, or the verdict of the jury, still the jury are not bound to follow it. So that the same objection as has just been raised could also be made against the system of the English jury.

2381. You are perhaps aware that, if an English jury give a decision incompatible with the law laid down by the Judge, it may be set aside?—It may be set aside; but it is not in every case; and, in this case, there may be an appeal from the inferior to the superior Court.

2382. (To Mr. Marett.) Will you favour the Commissioners with your opinion upon the subject?—Perhaps, practically speaking, one Judge might and would administer justice well and impartially, and the more so, as all the responsibility falling upon him, he would naturally be anxious to perform his duty to the best of his ability. But, in considering the merits of the system, I think it is necessary to take into consideration whether alterations, which may appear theoretically useful, would be well received by the people for whom they are intended and inspire them with confidence. Now I am convinced, from having conversed with a great number of persons in this Island on the subject, that any change by which the administration of justice would be confined to one individual, and that an individual appointed by the Crown, would meet with universal dissatisfaction. It is to be remarked that, though the Bailiff ought to be, and is, I believe, the Judge of the law, he is not, as Mr. Le Sueur I think very justly observed, the Judge of the fact; and perhaps it may be doubtful how far a purely legal education may qualify a man from becoming a sound and impartial Judge of facts. It is indispensably necessary, I should say, that in matters of practice a lawyer well acquainted with the mode of conducting business and the minutiæ of the law should give his opinion upon such questions and decide them at once. From my observations during the time I have been in practice, which has not been, it is true, very long, I have had occasion to remark that much valuable time has been wasted in the discussion of mere preliminary points which might safely have been entrusted to the decision of a single Judge, and that Judge a lawyer. But, when it is necessary to descend into the merits of a case, perhaps there are habits, and which have been acquired during a course of legal study, of making nice distinctions in which the differences are not always to be observed; I do not consider that those qualifications are precisely what are required for administering justice between man and man, and giving to each what of right belongs to him. I think, then, that having a number of men added, men I would say of good education, for I would consider that indispensable, men of good general attainments, would probably be of great advantage in addition to the President. They may be considered in the light of a permanent jury; and I need not say that the establishment of juries has always been considered as being that which distinguishes the English system of laws with the reputation which it has obtained throughout Europe, and which has contributed more than any thing else to throw into the shade any defects which may be found to exist in it. It is a pleasing idea to a man to think that he will be judged by one whom he has himself chosen, with whom he is acquainted, and of whose merits he has had an opportunity of forming an estimate, instead of having his life, his fortune and his honour at the mercy of a person nominated by others, whose interests perhaps at all times may not coincide with those of the people at large. With some modification in the mode of electing them, I humbly conceive that the retention of the Jurats in our Royal Court would be an advantage, and more, what Mr. Le Geyt calls it, an inestimable privilege. My remarks are made on the supposition that the Bailiff is always a lawyer.

2383. One part of your remarks supposes that the fact is inextricably mixed up with the law?—Yes. Where the question is purely one of law or practice, it might safely be left, I think, to the decision of the President alone.

2384. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) You said "I attribute the evils of our present system entirely to the Jurats having no one to guide them." What are the evils of the present system according to your opinion?—The evils of the present system must be clear to every body. If a man is sworn as a Jurat to administer the laws of the country, and he is ignorant of those laws, and has therefore to give a decision in darkness, the chances are equal that he will give a wrong or a right decision. The evil is, therefore, manifest: and, when the Jurat comes on the Bench without knowing a particle of the practice of the Court, and is not guided by the presiding Judge, chance must necessarily preside or rule in the Court till he has acquired a little knowledge of the practice. But, as what one Jurat considers to be the practice is not binding upon the others, the practice of the Court must always vary; and it does so. I consider, moreover, that the Jurats placed in that position are unfairly treated, and that it must tend materially to deprive them of their moral influence and of the confidence that the public could place in them, the confidence which I consider one of the essential ingredients of justice. There are some other observations to be made on behalf of the system of Jurats: but I must premise by exactly stating to the Commissioners my position; because, in all cases, the position in which a person stands may affect or bias his opinion even unknown to himself. In 1833, I proposed a change in the institutions of the island. I proposed, with the concurrence of the majority of the States, to do away with the twelve Jurats, and replace them by two Judges elected by the people, but that those two Judges must be qualified as having been lawyers of long practice. That was a principal feature of the change.

2385. You were a member of the States at the time, were you?—I was then, and I am now, though not a member for the same parish. A Committee was named, which was supposed in a great part to be favourable to my views of the question: but such was its unpopularity that I could not afterwards obtain one single member of the Committee or of the States to join in my opinion; so great was the prejudice against paid Judges.

2386. Two of them were to be elected?—Yes. I proposed that they were to be elected by the people. The question in the present state of affairs is not, perhaps, what would be theoretically good, but what would be practicable. My personal opinion the Commissioners are acquainted with. I must observe that justice, in its general sense, is not merely a decision given between one party and the other, but it is the opinion of the suitors that they have received justice, and that therefore their differences ought to be at an end. The advantages of the twelve Judges, if they were presided over by a person able and willing to perform his duty, would perhaps satisfy more the people at large: and, on all questions, or nearly all, facts and law being blended, some persons might conceive that twelve were better than one; that is, those who favour the institution of juries in civil cases. I, for one, would be decidedly against a jury in civil cases. There are in England examples of twelve men being presided over by a Judge with the power to over-rule his opinion as to law and fact: that is, in the case of the trial of libels.

2387. Do you see any other advantage in the present system?—If there were only one Judge, if that Judge was in any way perverse, there would be no kind of redress.

2388. Perhaps, also, the Jurats may be a little check upon the Judge?—Their being obliged to join with him may have some influence over his decisions: but I consider that the Judge who was intimidated by the presence of any body would be unfit to be a Judge.

2389. Your argument as to the unpopularity of the supposed plan would be confirmed by the fact that your scheme, though it retained some elements of the power of election, was itself unpopular?—I must say that a great many who were then opposed to the plan would now be more inclined to it; but it is my firm opinion that, if the majority were consulted, they would be against it. There is another subject which I have to allude to. Mr. Solicitor General has said that some natives have been sent out of the island for small thefts. The case of Le Maitre has been mentioned: but that was not a case of theft. He was required to find bail for his good conduct; and, not being able to do so, he was allowed to leave the island.

2390. Mr. Le Sueur. Upon that case, there had been a complaint made to the Government; and it was sent to the States for their answer. The answer given by the States was thought satisfactory by the Government.

2391. Sir John De Veulle. It was sent to me; and I referred it to the constable of St. Hélier's, who proved that there was no foundation for the complaint.

2392. (To Mr. François Godfray, Advocate). Will you tell the Commissioners how often the two Jurats sit, and the seven?—It depends entirely upon the Bailiff: he has the appointment of the days upon which they are to sit.

2393. In the case of both the larger and the smaller number?—Yes: both the large and the small number. Generally speaking, throughout the whole term, there is what is called Cour de Samedi.

2394. On the Saturday there is almost always a Court, is not there?—For bringing up prisoners, but not for the hearing of the evidence, nor for the trial.

2395. Not for the Grande Enquête?—Sometimes, but very seldom. Saturday is usually devoted to general business.

2396. In point of fact, if a person is in custody, how long is it before he sees his Judges?—He ought to see them the first Court day.

2397. How long is that, generally?—A couple of days generally; sometimes more, sometimes less. Sometimes he is brought up the very day that he is arrested.

2398. On the average, perhaps, it is two days?—Yes; I should say a couple of days.

2399. Does it ever occur that a Court of the greater number cannot be obtained from the accidental absence of the Jurats?—Very often.

2400. Then, I presume, the consequence is the adjournment of all business which cannot be done by the three?—If it is on criminal matter, it is usual for the Court, though not perhaps strictly legal, at the request of the prisoner, to go on with the trial with less than seven Jurats. It is never done except at his request.

2401. Which request implies, of course, the consent of his advocate: he does not do it without advice, does he?—It may have happened that a person may have said "I wish to be tried," though his counsel may have advised him to wait.

2402. How is the Lieutenant Bailiff appointed?—The Bailiff appoints the Lieutenant Bailiff; he may choose him from the Bench, or not from the Bench.

2403. Does it ever happen that they are not from the Bench?—For four hundred years the Bailiffs resided in England. It was a mere sinecure in their hands; and they appointed a Lieutenant Bailiff.

2404. Mr. Marett. Mr. Philip Le Geyt, the nephew of the writer, about 1720, or thereabouts, was nominated Lieutenant Bailiff, though he had not been a Jurat.

2405. Mr. François Godfray, (Advocate). In 1790, or thereabouts, it was decided that the Bailiff had a right to appoint a Lieutenant Bailiff without his being a Jurat. The Bailiff urged very strongly, in favour of his appointment, a letter which he had received from the majority of the Court who opposed such a nomination: that there was not on the Bench a fit person to occupy the office of Lieutenant Bailiff; but that, if he engaged to appoint Mr. Dumaresq, one of the Advocates of the Court, afterwards Sir John Dumaresq, the Lieutenant Bailiff, one of them would resign to make room for him that he might be so appointed.

2406. That he might be appointed consistently with the custom?—With what they considered as the law and the custom. That letter naturally must have had great weight upon the decision.

2407. Who decided it?—The Privy Council. When the Bailiff has appointed a Lieutenant, he may remove him at pleasure.

2408. Can the Lieutenant Bailiff preside over the greater number as well as the smaller?—He can perform all the duties of the Bailiff, and preside also in the States.

2409. Though the Bailiff is in the Island?—Yes, though the Bailiff is in the Island; it is so established by custom.

2410. Mr. Marett. I may be allowed to add, perhaps, that Mr. Le Geyt, in his work on the jurisdiction of the Royal Court, states that he has known an instance where the Lieutenant Bailiff went to a house in the country to pass a contract while the Bailiff was presiding at the Court.

2411. Mr. Francis Godfray (Advocate). I think that would be a stretch of authority on the part of the Bailiff and the Lieutenant Bailiff; and I think the quotation of Mr. Le Geyt, as an authority, shews perhaps that it is very difficult to find an instance of it. When a second Lieutenant Bailiff has been appointed, it is always stated that he is to attend in the absence from the island, or in case of illness, of the first Lieutenant Bailiff; and I consider that both could not act together.

2412. Are those gentlemen sworn in?—They are sworn in as Lieutenant Bailiffs.

2413. Is there any limit or qualification necessary to the admission of the écrivains, who reduce the evidence to writing?—The Bailiff has the appointment of them; they are of modern creation; formerly they did not exist; then four were created. The number was increased, I think, to six, and now they are very numerous indeed; for I think that Sir John De Veulle has appointed so many that there must be at least thirty; and they are increasing every day. There is no qualification required but the will of the Bailiff.

2418. Who performed those duties prior to the écrivains doing it?—The Greffier of the Royal Court was bound to do it; and I think sometimes he was assisted by the Advocates. When Sir John De Veulle's father, who was clerk of the court, applied in 1790 to have his fees increased, he positively states (and that petition was drawn with the concurrence of the Bailiff and the Crown officers) that it is his duty to take down the evidence in all criminal matters. I did not know Mr. De Veulle personally; but I have always understood that he knew perfectly the rights and duties of his office.

2419. I think I understood that the écrivains pass contracts also?—Yes.

2420. Prior to their institution, who passed the contracts?—The advocates, who still continue to pass them concurrently with the écrivains.

JERSEY.

Mr. François Godfray.

15 September, 1846.

2421. Is there any formal admission of those écrivains?—Sir John De Veulle tells an individual "You are an écrivain;" and then he is: he is an écrivain, and no one knows it.

2422. Is it not done publickly?—No.

2423. Sir John De Veulle. It was stated, the other day, that the number of écrivains were limited before I came into office. I ascertained it was not so, that they were unlimited both under Sir John Dumaresq and under Sir Thomas Le Breton.

2424. Do you happen to know what the number was in fact?—I have not the documents with me; but I can show them to the Commissioners on another occasion. I think there were fifteen just before Sir John Dumaresq was appointed, and nineteen just before I was appointed. I never appoint them without requiring a certificate from the solicitor, in whose office they have served, that they are fit for the duties.

2425. The business of the Court has very materially increased during the time you have been Bailiff, has not it?—I should say that the number of contracts has of late increased: and in fact, I have been induced to increase the number because it was represented to me that complaints had been made by the écrivains that persons who were not écrivains used to prepare contracts and pass them under price, which was an evil. That led me to increase the number of écrivains. I offered to the écrivains, if they could agree to regulations, among themselves, to prevent persons not écrivains passing contracts, I would assist them to the utmost of my power. Mr. Godfray has said that it was a stretch of authority on the part of the Lieutenant Bailiff to go and pass contracts and do duty while the Bailiff is in the island. I believe I have never asked the Lieutenant Bailiff to preside for me in Court or in the States except when I was ill or absent from the island, or in a case in which I was personally concerned. With regard to contracts, I have a great deal of business; I am obliged to sit all day in Court; and it would frequently be impossible for me to go to distant parts of the island to pass contracts for people who are ill. Then I have asked the Lieutenant Bailiff to go. It would be impossible for me in Term time to go to distant parts of the island to pass them very frequently. I am not aware that any inconvenience has resulted from that fact. If I cannot go, the solicitor would say it was very important, and I should leave it to the Lieutenant Bailiff to pass them when it suited his convenience.

2426. Mr. François Godfray. (Advocate). I do not know that contracts have been passed by the Lieutenant Bailiff or Sir John De Veulle when he was sitting in Court: my opinion is given in general terms. A contract is an Act of the Royal Court, the parties stating that they appear devant justice to pass that contract. The Commissioners have asked whether the business of the Court has increased of late years. It has diminished more than one half.

2427. Not the business of the Criminal Court?—No; of the Civil Court. Mr. Marett says it is a great advantage for a person to be judged by a person whom he has elected; but, as in an election there is always a majority and a minority, it may be very disagreeable for a person to be judged by a person whom he has not elected.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur further examined.

2428. Will you explain how the evidence taken by the écrivain is taken down? What is the step which makes it a record of the Court?—As soon as the witness has signed the depositions, it is handed over to the Greffier of the Court, and is kept in his custody.

2429. It is in the custody of the Greffier?—Yes.

2430. It then forms a document?—Yes.

2431. It is not signed by the Greffier, I believe?—No; but the Act of the Court records the names of the witnesses who have been heard.

2432. Is there any interval, after the taking of the prisoner, at the end of which it is necessary to produce the information?—If the suit is not proceeded with within a year and a day, the prosecution drops.

2434. Mr. F. Godfray, (Advocate). No; I was decidedly refused, the Bailiff saying he would not appoint a day unless the Attorney General asked one, and the Attorney General saying he was ordered by the Lieutenant Governor not to ask one. I was prosecuted at the request of the Lieutenant Governor.

2435. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) In that case it would drop in a year and a day?—Yes.

2436. The power of acceleration strictly rests entirely with the Procureur Général?—Yes.

2437. Unless the Solicitor General's views were correct, that the Court have the power to compel him?—I think the Court ought, and that it would have the power, to do so, if it was willing to exercise that power. When two parties are before the Court, the Attorney General and the defendant, I consider that both parties are bound to submit to the decision of the Court.

2438. You could hardly tell us within what limits a criminal prosecution ranges?—Yes: when a person is in gaol, by reference to the prison books, I think it may be ascertained. I think that the trial is generally over in two or three months. The average perhaps does not exceed two months.

2439. Has the enditement any power of retrenching or cutting away any of the evidence taken before it?—No; the evidence is put into their hands; and they return it to Court in the same state.

2440. Can any document cease to be a document in Court by any act of the enditement?—No. At the same time I must say that the Vicomte, or Deputy Vicomte, or one of the dénunciateurs, always retires with the enditement, and with the grand enquête, which I think is a very bad practice.

2441. He remains with them, does he?—He remains with them. On one occasion, I think, the enditement decided to lock the Vicomte, or the Deputy Vicomte, out.

2442. If the men of the enditement were to do such a thing as to tear up or destroy any of the Information, of course they would not be acting according to law?—It would be an illegal act; and I do not suppose that the possibility of such a thing being done has ever entered the mind of any of the authorities here.

2443. Was not there a report that it was done in the case of Nicolle?—The most absurd reports have been in circulation as to that particular trial.

2444. Was there such a report?—Perhaps not of their having destroyed, but of their having put away, not attaching any weight to it, one of the depositions. It was afterwards represented that they had torn it.

2445. The Viscount. I was in charge of the papers on both occasions. I can positively assert that nothing of the kind took place.

2446. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Was every paper that was read to the enditement read before the grande enquête?—Yes.

2447. We observe that the gentlemen who favour us with their answers in writing do not strictly agree as to the effect of an abandonment of a prosecution by the Procureur Général. The greater number say it is distinctly an acquittal. Sir John de Veulle simply says, there is no instance of a prosecution afterwards.—Supposing a person had been put on his trial, and the Attorney General had abandoned his prosecution, and afterwards some very important evidence was discovered, I do not see any impossibility in its being brought before the Court again. I allude to cases that will very seldom occur. I think, in my recollection, there were two cases which were to go before a jury, but the evidence was insufficient, and the Attorney General abandoned the prosecution.

2448. At what stage?—When the depositions of the witnesses were taken down in writing, the Attorney General said it was clear that the evidence would be insufficient; and, on his recommendation, the Court liberated the prisoner. In such a case, if important evidence was discovered afterwards, I think the accusation might perhaps be brought again before the Court on a fresh Report from the constable or the Police, stating the discovery of such evidence: but such a case has not occurred to my knowledge, and is not likely to occur. In those cases which I have stated, the act of the Court says only libéré.

2449. Can the Procureur Général abandon a prosecution unless there is an absolute act of the Court?—The prosecution may drop by not being brought before the Court, within a year and a day.

2450. It cannot be put an end to by the Procureur Général within that time, unless there is an act of the Court, can it?—I should think not.

2451. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). When the Attorney General abandons a prosecution, the Court make an act in the same terms, that the prisoner is libéré de l'accusation, and he is put out of prison.

2452. I suppose, when a verdict plutôt innocent que coupable is taken, it is followed by a judgment of acquittal?—Yes.

2453. (To Mr. De Ste. Croix.) What is the langauge of the Court in such cases?—"Partant, conformément aux conclusions du dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine, la Cour l'a déchargé de l'accusation, et libéré de prison," or "de son cautionment," as the case may be.

2454. Is there any difference in the judgment in the case of an abandonment?—I have known very few cases of abandonment of a prosecution established by an Act of the Court. Sometimes the Procureur Général states that he has no proof sufficient to establish crime: the prisoner is then liberated. Here is the form of the Act in such a case. "Edmond De Than, convenu à l'instance du Procureur Général de la Reine, pour ouir dépôt d'informateurs sur l'accusation qui lui est faite en conséquence du Rapport du connétable de la paroisse de St. Hélier; le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au dit Rapport, et en l'Acte de la Cour daté l'an 1846, le 2e jour de Mai. Mr. John Vaubrook, Mr. François Godfray, Mr. Thomas Godfray, Mr. Jean Nicolas Le Bailly, Mr. George Remy, Pierre Le Sueur, Ecr., Mr. George Allwright Fry, à la cause à informer, et ouir record d'officier. Après que les dits témoins ont été entendus par serment, le dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine a représenté à la Cour que, faute de preuves suffisantes, il est dans l'impossibilité d'établir l'accusation. Partant, conformément aux conclusions du dit Sieur Procureur Général de la Reine, la Cour l'a déchargé de l'accusation, et libéré de prison."

2455. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Is not the accusation of the Procureur Général drawn up before there has been any deposition on oath at all?—Yes; it is drawn up on the report of the constable.

2456. The Commissioners have also been told, in the written answers, that a charge, when made, cannot be altered?—I know of one case where a prisoner had been sent back by the Court; but I think they were still in Court when the Attorney General perceived that he had made a mistake in the accusation; and they were again brought forward, and the accusation was corrected.

2457. The Court allowed the amendment?—Yes.

2458. Was that a mistake that arose from an informality on the face of the accusation, or

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.
15 September, 1846.

was it an inconsistency of the sworn evidence with the accusation?—It was a mistake in drawing the accusation.

2459. It was discovered before the evidence was given?—Yes; after the evidence is given, or when a witness has been heard, the accusation is never varied or amended.

2460. The Commissioners have had from Mr. Dupré to day an account of the mode in which the witnesses are summoned where the prosecution is carried on without the intervention of an enditement. Will you tell us the mode of proceeding to obtain the attendance of witnesses when the proceeding is by enditement? He told us that the mode was, that the Attorney General delivered to the Vicomte a list of the witnesses to be called on behalf of the prosecution, and also a list of the witnesses which the prisoner proposed to call; that then the witnesses included in that list would be called; and that all must be present at the time of the hearing. Will you tell us the mode of proceeding with regard to summoning witnesses when the case goes to an enditement?—As soon as the prisoner has pleaded Not guilty, the Attorney General is entitled to summon the witnesses who are called informateurs. The Court allows the Attorney General to call witnesses.

2461. Are they called at that sitting of the Court, or at a subsequent sitting of the Court?—At a subsequent sitting of the Court. They are summoned by the Vicomte, or one of the denunciators, at the request of the Attorney General. The witnesses for the prisoner are summoned at the request of the Attorney General, on a list being given to him or to the Crown Solicitor.

2462. Before the Attorney General summons any witnesses, is it necessary that he should send the list of all the witnesses he means to call?—No; he may summon them one by one. The same right also belongs to the prisoner.

2463. When he has permission to inform, I understand you that the witnesses are called at some subsequent day. Does the day at which the witnesses are called depend upon the Attorney General to fix it?—The Bailiff appoints a day, at the request of the Attorney General.

2464. In the event of the Court not being able to take all the informations on that day, what takes place?—The Court allows the Procureur Général to inform further, when either the same witnesses can be called again, or other witnesses.

2465. Does that continue from Court day to Court day, till the evidence of the Procureur Général is exhausted?—Yes; and also the evidence that the prisoner may have to bring forward.

2466. Is the list of the witnesses which the prisoner intends to bring forward first submitted to the Attorney General before they are summoned?—The summons mentions that the witnesses are summoned at the request of the Attorney General; but it is a matter of course that the Attorney General will summon or cause to be summoned any witnesses who may be required by the prisoner.

2467. Does the Attorney General know what witnesses the prisoner's counsel intends to summon before they are summoned?—Yes.

2468. Is the same course pursued as to those witnesses which has been pursued with regard to the witnesses for the prosecution?—Precisely.

2469. After the prisoner has called all the evidence which he intends to produce, has the Attorney General the power of calling fresh witnesses?—Until the case is before the jury, he has that power.

2470. Does that extend to calling fresh evidence to supply some defect which there may be in the proof, as well as evidence to contradict the evidence for the defendant?—Yes.

2471. In that case, I take it for granted that the counsel for the prisoner would have an opportunity of cross examining those fresh witnesses?—Yes; and, if he thinks proper to call other witnesses to contradict their evidence, he may do so.

2472. There is no time at which either party cannot call fresh evidence?—There is not; but, of course, the Attorney General and the counsel generally agree when the evidence is complete.

2473. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). There is an observation I should wish to make as to summoning the witnesses. Mr. Solicitor General, who generally acts for the Crown and not for the prisoner, stated that the witnesses are always summoned at the suit of the Attorney General. A party who is prosecuted, when the case is not to go before a jury, may have his own witnesses summoned; and the Attorney General does not know the names of the witnesses before they would be in Court.

2474. Mr. Dupré. I know that has been done of late; but that is not the practice of the Court.

2475. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). There was another observation as to witnesses. Where the prosecution goes before a jury, the accused does not give the names of his witnesses before the Attorney General has called and heard the witnesses for the prosecution; that is his right.

2476. The Commissioners have been told that there is no final swearing of witnesses for the prosecution till the parties agree that they have done?—It would be considered very unfair for the Attorney General to call witnesses to material facts after hearing the evidence of the accused party.

2477. In cases in which the facts deposed to by the defendant's witnesses are new, the Attorney General has the right, and exercises it, to call fresh witnesses?—Yes.

2478. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Can the Procureur Général object to a witness being called, on the ground of his irrelevancy, before he is sworn?—No, except on the gronnd that he is a relation of the party. The prisoner is not obliged to inform the Attorney General that he calls a particular witness to prove such a fact: therefore, as to relevancy, the Attorney General can know nothing of it.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.
15 September, 1846.

2479. As to personal incompetency, he must be called, we understand, but may be objected to before he is sworn?—Yes.

2480. The Commissioners wish to know how far the strict legality of the evidence which has been received and taken down, and is in custody of the greffier, can be discussed and disputed after the enditement is summoned and sitting in the Court?—There is no way of objection to it, except by doing so before the inferior number, and afterwards bringing it before the superior number.

2481. Mr. Marett. With reference to what was said as to the Lieutenant Bailly, I would add that the power of the Lieutenant Bailly ceases with the death of the Bailly who appointed him, and that, during the interval between the death of the former Bailly and the nomination of his successor, a delegate is appointed by the States.

Robert Pipon, Marett, Esq., further examined.

2482. At what age should you consider a person would be held responsible to the criminal law?—I am not aware of any law which restricts the responsibility of an accused person to any particular age: but I believe that the invariable practice has been, not to punish individuals who were of the age of seven or below that age. At least I have never known an instance. I have frequently seen children of twelve and thirteen, even eleven years old, punished for larceny.

2483. Mr. Hammond, in his answer, does not advert to the definite age of seven as having, in practice or by specific law, been the age adopted at which a person would be held responsible to the law.—Generally speaking, in those doubtful cases, we would follow the maxims of the English law.

2484. Whence do you get the age of seven?—It would be hard to say why so much importance is attached to the number seven: but in many cases it appears to be considered that a child is then out of infancy. If, for instance, a person is condemned to maintain an illegitimate child, generally the provision is limited to the age of seven. It appears that it has generally been considered, that at that age a child obtains a certain amount of reason enabling him to think and act for himself.

2485. Mr. François Godfray (Greffier). I have seen some of the old authors that mention seven: but I have seen, in Terrien, that they cannot be prosecuted till they reach nearly the age of puberty; and I infer, from that, that ten would be about the age. I do not know a case of a child being prosecuted till he has attained the age of ten years.

2486. (To Mr. Marett.) The Commissioners, therefore, may take it generally that there is no very well defined rule upon the subject?—I do not think there is.

2487. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Will you favour the Commissioners with your opinion upon the point, as to the age at which a person becomes responsible to the criminal law?—There is no positive law upon the subject.

2488. You agree with what has been said by Mr. Marett, that there is no established positive law upon the subject?—There is not.

2489. Mr. Dupré. In point of practice, I have seen very young criminals brought before the Court for petty offences: but, whether of the age of seven, eight or nine, they generally, or in fact always, I think, were delivered to their parents with an injunction from the Court to take care of them. I have never known an instance of a child having been regularly tried for a crime under the age of eleven years.

2491. You say, if a person is found to be insane upon his trial. Is the fact of insanity tried before the man is put upon his trial for the crime, or is the question of insanity mixed up with the question whether he is Guilty or Not guilty of the crime?—The Commissioners are aware that there is no previous examination before a person is put upon trial. There is a Report from the constable; and the Procureur Général founds an accusation upon the Report. The Informateurs are called; and the Jury must judge whether the person is insane or not.

2492. The process is this, I think: that, upon the act of accusation being laid before the Court by the Attorney General, the prisoner pleads. Would it be competent for his counsel to plead that he was insane at the time the act was committed?—Yes.

2493. Instead of "Non coupable" or "Coupable"?—Yes: perhaps it would be matter of doubtful prudence to plead "Coupable," and then "Insanity;" but he would have the privilege of doing so, no doubt.

2494. Supposing a plea were to be put in of insanity, as an answer to the accusation; how would that be tried? Would it be tried by the Court?—I think it ought to be sent before the Jury, because the informateurs or evidence of some kind must naturally be heard to establish the fact of the insanity. Under those circumstances, I consider that the enditement would be the only body having a right to examine into the question. That is where the accusation is of such a nature as to be brought before the enditement; for in petty cases, in cases of petty larceny, the Court would be quite competent, no doubt, to decide upon the matter. Occasionally, such delinquencies are tried before the Court, where the prisoner or his advocate consents to it. A very trivial case is sometimes tried before the Court, and decided by the Court; but it must be remarked that the consent of the prisoner is required.

JERSEY.

Robert Pipon Marett, Esq.

17 September, 1846.

2495. The question which I am addressing to you can only suppose a trial by the enditement.—I consider that, in all cases where the accusation is of such a nature as to be referable to the enditement, the enditement alone is competent to judge of the fact of the insanity.

2496. On a plea of insanity being put in?—Yes.

2497. Do you, in your experience, know of any case of the kind occurring?—No; not where a plea has been specially put in. A case lately occurred in which insanity was attempted to be proved; and the question was pleaded before the enditement.

2498. (To Mr. Dupré.) Are you acquainted, in your experience, with any plea of insanity ever being put in, and the issue being raised of "Sane," or "Not sane," only?—I do not know a case of it.

2499. (To Mr. Marett.) In the Coustumier there are some regulations upon the subject, are there not?—Yes; but it is merely stated that, if a person is found to be insane, his friends or relations are to take care to put him in prison and maintain him, and so forth.

2500. The gentlemen, who have answered this question, make a distinction between minor and greater offences. The substance of the answer returned by the Bailiff and Jurats is, that, for a minor offence, the Court would order the lunatic to be placed under the care of curators. If acquitted of a capital crime on the ground of insanity, they say, the Court would refer the proceeding to Her Majesty, and remand the prisoner, till the pleasure of the Crown were known. They do not state, in either case, how the fact of insanity is to be arrived at.—I believe I have stated what would be the practice, judging by analogy. The few cases that do exist do not bear precisely upon that point.

2501. Supposing this were the state of facts. A man is charged with a crime, which would be tried by the enditement. The course his advocate takes is to say, the prisoner is insane at this time, and ought not to be tried, because he is so. What would be the course of proceeding in that case?—I am not aware of any case of that kind having happened.

2502. Would that be a question triable in any way?—I should consider, certainly, acting upon the principle laid down, I think, in Terrien or in Rouillé, that in those cases it was usual not to punish the individual, who had committed a crime, if at the time of his trial he were insane. I consider that the advocate might put in a plea of present insanity; that that plea might be tried; and, if found true, the individual would be acquitted, as an insane person.

2503. Would it be tried by the Court or by the enditement?—It appears that it should be tried by the enditement.

2504. You do not know of any instance?—No.

2505. (To Mr. Dupré.) Are you aware of any instance?—I am not aware of any instance: but, I think, if we looked into the old Coustumier, we should find that no trial would take place before the enditement or grande enquête. "Se aulcun est hors du sens et il occist ou mehaigne ung homme par sa forcenerie, il doit estre mis en prison, et estre soustenu du sieñ, etc. Par ce texte appert q̃ se aulcũ hors du sens mehaigne ou tue ung hom̃e, il ne doibt pas estre puny capitalement, et aussi ne recepveroit on aulcun à faire gaige cõtre luy. Mais il seroit mis en prison à tousjours, et soustenu du sien, et des communes omosnes ainsy q̃ le texte le declaire." It is said that he could not be judged capitally, and battle could not be waged against him.

2506. The gloss goes on to say, "Se aulcũ est en telle manière forcené que l'en le doye doubter de sa forcenerie qu'il ne trouble le pays ou par feu ou par aulcune chose, etc.. Par ce texte peut apparoir que se aulcun est forcené en telle manière que l'en doubte qu'il ne trouble le pays, et qu'il face aulcun mal par sa forcenerie, ceux du voisine sont tenus le venir dire à justice affin qu'elle y pourvoye et se ilz ny vieñent, et le forcené faict aulcun mal ilz l'am̃deront; lors quand les voisins l'auront insinue à justice elle y doibt pourvoir de son office. Cest assauoir il doibt estre lye et baille en garde à ses amys et ses biens aussi, lesquelz le doibuent garder en tel lieu qu'il ne face mal; et s'il n'a biens ne parentz tous ceulx du voisine, chascun selon sa faculté, luy doibuent aider à luy pourvoir, pour la sustentation de sa vie." Would not it appear as a question for the Court upon that?—Yes; we have exactly that practice with respect to persons in that unfortunate situation. If a man is insane, it is the duty of the constable, on the information of the neighbours or friends, to report the same to the Court through the Attorney General. Then six of the principal inhabitants, being his nearest neighbours, are called to give information on oath to the Royal Court on the state of that person's mind; and, if they find him to be insane, then the Court place him in the custody of a curator, who is bound to take care of him and deprive him of the possibility of doing mischief. That answers the second case, which has been put.

2507. Do you think that course would be pursued by the Court in case a person pleaded insanity as an answer to a crime?—I think, in that case, the informateurs would be heard in the first instance, and that, from the depositions, the Court might decide the case, or send it to a jury if there should be any doubt.

2508. You mean,, by sending it to a jury, having him tried by a jury mixing up the question of insanity with the question of culpability?—Yes.

2509. When the proceeding takes place with the six neighbours, do they specifically find the time at which the insanity began to exist?—No; they do not.

2510. Suppose a person were put into the hands of a curator, and it appeared that he had recovered and were well again, and he were let out of their hands: would he then be tried for a crime committed before he was in the hands of the curator?—I know of no law, either in the ancient law of Normandy or in our practice, which can elucidate that question.

2511. Do you recollect, in your experience, any plea of insanity being set up and tried as a separate question?—I do not remember one.

2512. Mr. Hammond. I mention, in my answer to that question, that the fact of a prisoner's insanity, at the time he committed the act for which he stood charged, would have the effect of staying proceedings, if ascertained before he was regularly arraigned; and ulterior measures would be adopted by the Court, consequent upon the fact. Here is a Rapport upon Du Bois' case, which I will hand into the Commissioners.

The same was read as follows.

2513. " Mai 26. L'an mil huit-cent vingt-un, le vingt-sixième jour de Mai.

Par devant Thomas Le Breton, Escr., Lieutenant de Monseigneur le Bailly de l'Ile de Jersey, assisté de Phillippe D'Auvergne et Thomas Anley, Escrs., Jurés.

Le Procureur Général du Roi a donné lecture à la Cour d'un Rapport du centenier Marett de la paroisse de St. Brélade, présenté en justice par le connétable de la dite paroisse, exposant que, Lundi, 21e jour de Mai, 1821, environ les sept heures du matin, il fut informé, de la part de Mr. William Amy de la paroisse de St. Pierre, que George Du Bois, habitant de la paroisse de St. Brélade, venait d'assassiner Jeanne Amy sa mère: le dit centenier se rendit au plutôt au domicile de la dite Jeanne Amy, où il la trouva sous les soins du Docteur Morton et de plusieurs autres personnes, lesquels l'assurèrent qu'elle avoit effectivement reçu de grièves blessures de la part du dit Du Bois, son fils, par le moyen d'une fourche. Que, le dit Docteur Morton ayant de plus informé le dit centenier que les blessures que la dite Jeanne Amy avait reçues étaient d'une nature si allarmante qu'il ne pouvait répondre de sa vie, le dit centenier crut devoir saisir la personne du dit Du Bois. Et, le dit connétable ayant en conséquence présenté le dit Du Bois en justice, après que le dit George Du Bois a été entendu, et ne paroissant pas que la dite Jeanne Amy soit hors de danger, il a été envoyé en prison, pour être reproduit, et qu'il soit procédé vers lui selon que les circonstances pourroient exiger: instance du dit Sieur Procureur Général du Roi."

2514. Mr. Hammond. The man in that case was put in the hospital, and remained there as a notoriously insane person. Nothing more was done, because it was ascertained that the man was completely non compos; he was put in there, and, I believe, is there to the present day.

2515. Mr. Marett. The Commissioners were asking me how the Court would act if a plea were put in that the prisoner was insane at the time of the trial. I should say that we should be guided by this passage in Terrien, at page 496. " Est il opinion de Guiller. Benedic. que des délicts mesmes qu'il aurait commis devant sa fureur, il ne peut estre puny que par ses biens, et non pas en sa personne pour ce qu'on ne doit donner affliction à l'affligé." A distinction appears to have been made between a person insane at the time of committing the act, and a person who became mad after its commission. It is said in Terrien, " il ne peut estre puny que par ses biens." Following the analogy of our present system, there being no examination previous to the committal, but the prisoner being presented before the Court, the Procureur Général forming his accusation and the prisoner being called upon to plead at once, as the necessary course is for the Court to allow the Procureur Général to inform the moment the Report is presented, as the Court, without the consent of the party, cannot decide upon any facts so brought before them, the facts must go before the enditement.

2516. In case of his being found insane, what becomes of the accused party? Is there any statutable law upon that subject, as to what is to be done with such parties?—There is no Act of the States, nor any Act of Parliament applicable to us, that I am aware of, and no Order in Council upon the subject.

2517. Suppose the jury found a verdict of " Not guilty" because the prisoner was insane at the time of committing the act, what would be the form of the verdict?—They would bring in a verdict that he was innocent, stating their reasons.

2518. If their reason were that he was insane, how would that be expressed?—It would depend upon the jury themselves, how they would word their verdict. If they wish to give a special verdict, they word it according to their view of the case.

2519. What would then take place?—I consider that the course would be for the Procureur Général to summon seven of the friends, relations or neighbours of the insane party, for the purpose of appointing a curator or guardian.

2520. (To Sir John De Veulle.) Is there any distinct law upon the subject?—The following is an Order in Council in a case of that kind.

The same was read as follows.

Locus Sigilli.

At the Council Chambre, Whitehall, the 18th day of July, 1745,

Present :—

Their Excellencys the Lords Justices.
Lord Chancellor.
Lord Privy Seal.
Marquis of Tweedale.
Mr. Chancellor of y^e^ Exchequ^r^.
Lord President.
Duke of New Castle.
Earl of Cholmondeley.
Earl of Bath.
Lord Monson.
S^r^ Will^m^ Yonge.

Upon reading at y^e^ board a Report from y^e^ Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the Affairs of Jersey and Guernsey, dated the 28th of last month, in the words following, viz. :—

" Their Excellencys the late Lords Justices having been pleased, by their Order in Council " of the 13^th^ of October, 1743, to referr unto their Comitty a representation of the Royal Court " of the Island of Jersey, setting forth that, upon the tryal of John Gasnier of that Island " for the murder of Nicholas Le Marquand his father in law, the Jurats of the said Royal " Court, after having proceeded to call a Jury or Indictment, and not agreeing among themselves " in what manner they should proceed further against the said Gasnier, thought proper to " transmit the whole process to His Majesty in Council to know His Royal will and pleasure " thereon: That the reasons of this application are grounded upon the dismal condition and " allienation of mind in which they have during a long process found the prisoner, who had, for " some years before the said murder, been observed to have lost the right use of his senses, and, " this increasing daily upon him, his madness came to that degree of fury that at y^e^ request of " his relations he had been, by Order of the Royal Court, to prevent violence and mischief to " himself or others, for some time chained at his own house before the said murder was com- " mitted, and it was during a fatal interval of his liberty, which by the negligence of his keep- " ers he found means to obtain, that he is said to have committed the said murder, since which " time it is notorious that there has been no visible alteration in him but for the worse, insomuch " that he may be said to have entirely lost his senses without any hopes of a recovery, and " therefore the said Royal Court recommend him as an object worthy of His Majesty's mercy " so far as relates to his life, but not his liberty. And His Majesty having been pleased, by " His Order in Council of the 29th of November, 1743, to referr unto this Committee the " humble petition of Rachel Dumaresq, widow of Nicholas Le Marquand deceased, praying, " in regard to the distracted state of mind of the said John Gasnier, that His Majesty would " vouchsafe His Royal favour and Pardon to him, or to make such other order in the premises " as to His Majesty should seem meet: The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to the said " Orders of reference, this day took the said representation and petition into their considera- " tion, and examined into the proceedings transmitted by the said Royal Court, and have been " attended thereupon by counsel in behalf of the said Gasnier: And, in regard to the particular " circumstances attending this case, do agree to report that the said John Gasnier is an object " of compassion, and that it may be advisable for your Excellencys to grant him His Majesty's " Royal Pardon for the said offence so far as relates to his life, but not to his liberty."

" Their Excellencys the Lords Justices in Council this day took the said Report into considera- tion, and, approving thereof, are hereby pleased, in regard to the particular circumstances of this case, to extend His Majesty's mercy and compassion to the said John Gasnier, and to grant him his Majesty's Pardon for his said offence so far as relates to his life, but not to his liberty. And to that end their Excellencys do hereby order that no further proceedings be had against the said John Gasnier, and that he be forthwith discharged from prison. But that, notwith- standing this, the said Gasnier be put under a proper restraint or confinement to prevent his doing further mischief. Whereof the Bailiff and Jurats of His Majesty's Royal Court of Jersey and and all others whom it may concern are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

(Signed) JA. VERNON."

2521. The proceedings in that case are stayed; and then there is a recommendation to mercy?—Yes.

2522. What is the meaning of a recommendation to mercy of a person who is not in the power of the Crown at all, from not having been found Guilty?—It is rather to stay proceedings.

2523. Mr. Dupré. This is the Act of Court in that case; upon which the proceedings before the Privy Council are founded.

The same was read as follows.

" Oct. 5. 1742. Continuation des dits Plaids.—Par devant Phle. Le Geyt Esc^r^, Lieuten^t^ de Monseig^r^ le Bailly de l'Isle de Jersey, assisté de Guill^e^ Dumaresq, Michell Lemp^re^, David Patriarche, Phle. Le Geyt, Elie Dumaresq, Jean Hardy, Jean Hamtonne et Jean Poingdestre, Esc^rs^, Jurats.

Crime Transmis au Roi et au Conseil.

Marquand auroit receu trente sept blessueres, de gros et menu plomb, pendant que le dit Le Marquand étoit à travailler avec Phle. le Ruez, son valet, dans une certaine pièce de terre appartenante au dit Le Marquand, située en la contrée de L'Estac, ꝑoe de St. Ouen.

Après avoir cejourd'hui entendu lecture de témoignages qui ont été pris dans le cours de la procédeure, avec les conclusions du Proc$^{r}$ du Roy, et s'agissant que l'enditem$^{t}$ allast en particulier consulter entr' eux po$^{r}$ ensuitte faire leur Rapport à la Justice, la Cour, prenant en considération l'estat du dit Gasnier, et les difficultés qui se remontrent, sçavoir si les gens d'enditement doivent prendre cognoissance dans leur Rapport du desrangem$^{t}$ du dit Gasnier, ou seulem$^{t}$ parler sur le fait, dont il est accusé, Mess$^{rs}$ de justice, au nombre de huit assistants, s'étant trouvés partagés dans leur sentiments, quatre étant d'opinion de transmettre la procédeure à Sa Très Excell$^{te}$ Majesté et aux Très Hon$^{bles}$ Seig$^{nrs}$ de son Conseil Privé, et les quatre autres étant d'opinion d'entendre l'enditement, il a été jugé, par la ballance de Mons$^{r}$ le Lieuten$^{t}$ Bailly, que la procédeure et toutes les pièces qui en dépendent seront incessamment transmises à Sa dite Très Excell$^{te}$ Majesté et aux Très Hon$^{bles}$ Seig$^{rs}$ de Son Conseil Privé, afin que leur bon plaisir soit cogneu làdessus. Et entre temps le dit Gasnier est renvoyé en prison cõme devant, po$^{r}$ y estre détenu, les fers aux jambes et aux mains: ins$^{tce}$ du Proc$^{r}$ du Roy."

2524. Then the recital in the order of Council is incorrect?—Quite so, according to the Act of Court. There were eight Jurats, who were divided in opinion; four were of opinion to send the case before His Majesty in Council, the other four to refer to the enditement. The Lieutenant Bailiff gave his voice for a reference to the King in Council.

2525. Your view is that that is not a regular course of proceeding, according to modern practice?—No.

2526. (To Mr. Marett.) Is there any law in the Island which, after a person has been acquitted of a crime on the ground of insanity, enables the public to put him under restraint in order that he may not commit a crime again?—No; the ordinary mode is to deliver him over to a curator. The Procureur Général is supposed in some measure to be ex officio the guardian of all insane persons; and the curator is under his surveillance. I think the only mode of proceeding here would be to appoint a curator and deliver him over to the curator, and that the Procureur Général would be bound to see that the curator put him in a proper place.

2527. You think that the Executive, in the character of punisher of criminals, has no longer anything to do with him?—No. It is suggested to me to mention that, when a guardian is appointed, it is at the suit of the Procureur Général. The guardian is responsible to his electors for the property, and to the Procureur Général for the person.

---

Mr. François Godfray (Advocate) further examined.

Mr. François Godfray.

2528. You wish to refer the Commissioners to a passage in the Coustumier as to non-age?—The following is the passage to which I refer. It is to be found at chap. lxxv. De Suite d' Assault, f. 97.—" Len doibt scavoir que se aulcun qui est en noãage est appelle de ses mẽbres, il doibt estre garde tant qu'il soit venu en aage ou estre baille en garde: sicomme il plaira à la justice, et sicomme elle verra que la chose le requiert." This is the note upon it.—" Contre ce texte on peut ainsi arguer. Se ung soubzaage cõettoit ung crime capital on ne pourroit asseoir punition capitale sur luy: comme il peult apparoir par l'usage sur ce notoirement gardé. Et la raison est pour le petit sens qui est en eulx qui les excuse de estre punys capitalement. Est ainsi s'ensuit que on ne peut faire suyte de gaige contre ung soubzaage, neantmoins qu'il ait cõis crime capital. Et oultre se on ne le peut suyr de gaige le temps pendant de son soubzaage il s'ensuit que on ne le pourroit suyr, luy venu en aage: et que la cause qui empesche la punition capitale a aussi bien lieu comme s'il estoit en aage: et par consequent appert le texte faulx. A l'argument on peut respondre que se ung soubzaage cõettoit ung crime capital, luy estant en moindre aage que de quatorze ans, il n'en seroit point puny capitalement, et ne le pourroit on suyr de gaige luy venu en aage: et de ceulx procederoit bien l'argument. Mais s'il estoit au dessus de l'aage de quatorze ans, pourveu qu'il fust abille de ses sens, il en seroit puny capitalement s'il confessoit: car il est es ans de discretion quant à ce, et pourroit testamẽter et porter tesmoingnage en tel aage. Et en a l'en veu plusieurs cõdemner à mort. Toutesfois doibt justice avoir regard en faisant la condemnation à l'abillité de leur sens: car, s'ilz n'estoient suffisanz et abilles de leur sens, on ne les debueroit pas condemner, nonobstant l'aage."

Thomas Le Breton, Esquire, further examined.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.

2529. In reference to the fifth question of the second series, the Commissioners wish to know, supposing by any inaccuracy in the Report you had simply charged a person with having committed the actual offence and had not included the having participated in it, upon the evidence proving a participation, what would follow?—The form of drawing those accusations is always the same. We always accuse them of having committed the crime, or having aided and assisted, whatever the evidence may be, because we do not know what the evidence will bear out.

2530. Participation, if it were found by the enditement or the grande enquête to have really taken place, might take place at a distance?—Yes.

2531. The distance would simply be an element in ascertaining the fact?—Exactly.

2532. Does the Court possess an Admiralty jurisdiction?—It does possess an Admiralty jurisdiction.

2533. Is it a jurisdiction derived from any particular statute or grant of the Crown, or is it

JERSEY.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.

involved in the general criminal jurisdiction instituted by the constitutions of King John?—I conceive so. I know of no particular law or statute which establishes it.

2534. In matters of crime, what is the extent of it?—I should think it extends no further than within the usual jurisdiction of the Island.

2535. What do you consider to be the usual jurisdiction of the Island?—I should think, if a crime were committed in the bays or creeks of the Island, or upon any small rock or island which had always been considered as forming part of this Island, such as the Echreho.

2536. Supposing a crime is committed on the High Seas upon a vessel belonging to one of the inhabitants of Jersey, would that be within the jurisdiction of the Court?—If they came into Jersey. I know of no such instance.

2537. Mr. Hammond.—Yes; there was one case of a captain of a vessel who was accused of murder upon his return.

2538. Mr. Le Breton.—There is a case of Captain Waller, who was tried here for the murder of a young boy, who died here in consequence of the ill treatment he had received during the voyage from the West Indies.

2539. In that case the death took place here?—It did.

2540. Was that a Jersey ship?—No; it was an English ship.

2541. Do you think that the death occurring in the Island made any difference in that case, to give the Court jurisdiction over the crime?—I was not Crown officer at that time. I defended Captain Waller; but the person dying here I think put all doubt out of the question.

2542. Supposing on board a British registered ship, a ship of the port of London, a man were murdered, and they put in here?—I should think they would be amenable to the Court here.

2543. Though he died in the middle of the Atlantic?—Yes.

2544. Are the Commissioners right in supposing that you think there is no distinction whether the ship is a Jersey vessel or not?—None.

2545. Would it make any difference if the murder were committed on board a French ship upon a native of Jersey?—I should think not.

2546. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do you coincide with the Attorney General upon those points?—I do not think our charters or the constitution give the Royal Court in such a case a power over any other persons but those who may be considered as inhabitants or attached to the Island, persons who are justiciables. The charters of the two Charleses and Elizabeth go rather beyond the constitutions of King John; they give power to the Court to try all matters arising within the Island, or in which one of the parties is a Jerseyman.

2547. Mr. Charles De Ste. Croix. The following is an extract of an Order in Council of the 22nd of June, 1565. "Their Lordships accordingly thereunto thought good to order that from henceforth all suits commenced between any subjects of the said isles shall be heard, ordered and adjudged in the same isles, and not within this realm; and the like order their Lordships determined should be kept in suits arising and concerning two parties whereof the one is resident here in England and the other in the said isles."

2548. Mr. Dupré. I conclude, therefore, that any crime committed in a Jersey ship on the high seas by or against a Jerseyman would be tried before the Royal Court; but I doubt whether a crime committed in an English or a French ship on the High Seas could be prosecuted here.

2549. If a person upon whom the crime were committed were a Jerseyman, would that make any difference?—I think it would.

2550. You register your ships here as of the port, do you not?—Yes.

2551. If a ship were registered of the port of Jersey, would a service on board such a ship give a man quasi citizenship for the time?—I consider that it would.

2552. You think that the ship carries its country with it?—Yes.

2553. Should you say that a passage on board would do the same?—I consider that it would likewise.

2554. The definition which the Commissioners have received from the Bailiff and the Bench is that the distinction between "crimes" and "délits" consists entirely in the punishment?—There is no classification by any law here as to the higher offences mentioned in Rouillé.

2555. "Crimes" and "délits" are not strictly words of art, you think?—No; délits are smaller crimes.

2556. (To Mr. Hammond.) Strictly, do you think that there is any technical classification of crimes here such as into crimes and délits?—I am guided in my answer on that subject by the fact that they are denominated by particular names, frequently in the proceedings before the Court. I should consider that "délit" comes near to the English term of misdemeanour. When I spoke of crimes, I should say that I consider crimes or felony involve all those in which the punishment includes forfeiture of the property of a convicted felon.

2557. Is there any distinct enactment, or any distinct laying down of the rule, by the Coustumier, as to the forfeiture of goods?—(Mr. Dupré.) Yes; under the title of "forfaictures."

2558. (To Mr. Le Breton.) With respect to the limitation of prosecutions for crimes, the limitation is stated as a year and a day for particular proceedings. For the crime of felony is there any limitation at all?—Twenty years has been stated as the limitation: but I do not know whether it is very clearly established.

2559. Mr. Dupré. I find this in the Coustumier, as to the limitation of twenty years. "Len doibt scavoir q̃ aulcun ne peut suyr de mesfaict qui dedès lan et le jour ne ait este mõstre à la justice, et de quoy la clameur n'ait este faicte sicomme elle doibt. Mais de meurdre peut on suyr quand certain signe et enseignes en sont monstrées par loyal tesmoignage du pays par qui len sache certainement du meurdre qui a este faict."

JERSEY.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.

17 September, 1846.

2560. Mr. Hammond. This is what Terrien says upon the subject, commenting the passage just read from the Coustumier. Lib. xii. c. 18, p. 502. "Plainte d'excez et mal façons de corps se doit faire dedans l'an et jour du délict. Mais suite d'homicide et d'autre crime publique, ne se prescrit que par le laps de vingt ans comme il est dit de crime de faux."

2561. (To Mr. Le Breton.) All the evidence which is given in criminal cases must be given, we have heard, under the sanction of the oath of the witness. We have been referred to a statute which has lately been passed by the States, embodying the provision of our laws substituting the affirmation of Quakers and other Dissenters in lieu of the oath which was formerly taken?—That has not been confirmed by Her Majesty in Council; but there is such an Act, dated in 1842. The following is the Act referred to.

(*The same was read.)

The Act of the States relative to the above projet de loi is as follows. "Les Etats ont chargé le Greffier de transmettre au Clerk in attendance du Conseil privé de Sa Majesté l'Acte relatif aux Quakers et aux Moraves, passé par eux aujourd'hui, et d'en solliciter la confirmation par Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil. Un projet d'Acte relatif à l'Acte du Parlement qui ordonne la substitution dans certains cas des déclarations et des affirmations aux sermens ayant été présenté aux Etats, les Etats ont ordonné qu'il demeurera logé au Greffe, et l'ont reféré au Comité chargé par Acte du 19e Janvier, 1842, de reviser les réglemens logés au Greffe à cet égard, afin qu'il le prenne en considération, y apporte telles modifications qu'il jugera nécessaires, et fasse son rapport sans délai."

2562. Sir John De Veulle. It was transmitted; and we have applied two or three times, but could never get it confirmed. Every person here is obliged to perform military duty; and I believe it was thought some difficulty would arise upon that subject.

2563. (To Mr. Le Breton.) What are the crimes that render a person infamous?—A capital conviction, or any conviction which would entail confiscation, which would include capital offences or having been found guilty of perjury.

2564. The pillory was a mode of punishment here, was not it?—Yes.

2565. Would a condemnation to the pillory, and suffering that punishment, have the consequence of rendering a person incompetent as a witness?—I should think so, and particularly as formerly the pillory was very generally accompanied with the cutting off the end of the ear.

2566. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) Do you think that there has been any difference as to whether a person had actually undergone the punishment or not?—There have been some who have been heard after the punishment was over.

2567. (To Mr. Le Breton.) What do you take to be the law upon that subject? Do you think that having suffered the punishment would restore the competency?—I should think they might be heard in a case of murder. The Court would of course consider how far weight was to be attached to their testimony. I do not think any disallowance ought to be made in a case of murder.

2568. You think that any person would be allowed to be heard in a case of murder?—I should think so.

2569. Do you think that having suffered the punishment relieves from the disqualifying infamy?—I do not know a case. No law is laid down here on the subject, that I am aware of.

2570. Mr. Hammond. I do not agree in the view that a person having suffered the punishment would restore his competency. I recollect, in a recent case, having objected to a party as having suffered punishment; and I recollect that Mr. Solicitor General adverted to certain enactments. I am pretty certain that it is alluded to in the Act of Parliament; and I believe it was in consequence of that that it was included in the Act of the States.

2571. What is the direct proof of the conviction?—By producing the judgment of the Act in Court.

2572. And identifying the party?—Yes; they are generally so well known here, that it is not necessary to call witnesses.

---

J. W. Dupré, Esq., further examined.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.

2573. Does anything of this sort ever take place? Supposing two parties were joined in an accusation, and the evidence appeared totally to fail as to one when it came to be read, does it never happen that the counsel for that prisoner says, "I ask the opinion of the Court whether this prisoner may not immediately be acquitted, in order that his evidence may be given for the other party?"—I conceive, if two parties were charged with the same offence, and no evidence appeared against one of the parties, that the Attorney General might abandon the prosecution against that party, against whom no evidence could be brought, and that he might then be admitted as an informateur.

2574. Is the Procureur Général's consent necessary? Could not the counsel for the prisoner put it to the discretion of the Court?—I think the party could.

2575. And the Court might direct the Procureur Général to abandon the case against one of the prisoners?—Yes, I think the Court would have that power.

2576. Have they the power to say to the jury, "the man must be instantly acquitted?"—The Court might, having the evidence before them, declare that there was not sufficient evidence to send the case to the jury; and then they might make the party competent to be a witness.

2577. After the enditement is in Court?—No; I should think not. The witnesses have all been heard before the enditement. If there is no evidence against one of the parties, the Attorney General would most likely abandon it; or, if the parties were to ask that one prisoner against whom no evidence had been produced should be heard, the Court would decide before the case was sent to a jury.

2578. Mr. Hammond. Supposing I were counsel for two parties so accused, and I considered that no evidence was given respecting one, but that I might make him an important witness for the other, if the public prosecutor would not abandon the case, I do not think the Court could exactly acquit him; but I think the counsel might ask that that person's case might be brought separately before the enditement, that he might be acquitted.

2579. Mr. Dupré. I have never seen a case before the enditement, when two were accused together, and tried separately.

2580. Mr. Hammond. This is before the enditement is convened. I know nothing in our practice which would prevent my moving the Court to have his case tried separately to the benefit of the other, if there were no abandonment.

2581. Mr. Dupré. Where an accusation is laid against two parties for the same offence, I look upon it that, unless one is abandoned, you could not have a separate trial for the other. The case must come before the jury entire.

2582. You think that the Court could direct the Procureur Général to abandon the case, if there were no evidence at all against one of the parties?—I conceive the Court would do so, particularly if it appeared that he was brought in merely to prevent his giving evidence in a case where he was not an offender.

2583. Mr. Hammond. I doubt whether the Court would assume that power. If it is a case to go before the jury, the Court are not judges of the fact; but they would constitute themselves judges of the fact at once in that case.

2584. (To Mr. Dupré.) Can the defendant be heard by himself or his counsel to argue against any particular person being admitted as evidence for the Crown?—Yes; the counsel may argue it, and the Court would decide between the two. No accused party can be admitted as King's evidence except with the sanction of the Court.

2585. And that sanction may be a matter of discussion?—Yes.

2586. The counsel for the other prisoners would have a right to be heard against the admission of one of the prisoners as King's evidence?—Yes.

2587. With respect to the tenth question of the third series, where there is evidence for the Crown given by an accomplice, the Commissioners have inquired whether it is necessary that the testimony should be confirmed. Several gentlemen, who have answered us, have misunderstood the question. We did not mean, whether the weight to be given to the testimony would be increased by the confirmation, but whether, if that were the only evidence, the Court would direct the abandonment of the prosecution?—No; the Court would not withdraw the case from the jury.

2588. The enditement might convict, therefore, though there were no other witness?—Exactly; though it is not likely.

2589. What is the existing law with regard to incompetency which arises from the consanguinity of the witness to the party accused?—The relation of a party accused, within the degree of uncle, nephew, aunt or niece, would be an incompetent witness either for or against the accused, except where the crime had been committed in the family, and there were no other witnesses present or who had knowledge of the fact.

2590. Has there been any proposition before the States to alter the law in that respect?—The law has been recently altered.

2591. That was the old law, was it?—By the old law, no relation within the degrees I have mentioned could be heard at all under any circumstances. But recently an Act of the States was passed, changing the old law.

2592. What is the date of it?—The 14th of December, 1842.

2593. The exception goes still further in the old Norman law, and extends to cousins, does not it?—Yes; but we have never admitted that portion of the Norman law.

2594. Do you think that the law with regard to the exclusion of witnesses within the degree of cousins went further than witnesses who were called witnesses "de crédence?"—I think it goes further than that.

2595. This recent law excludes parties from being witnesses, if any other evidence can be produced. Do you agree in the propriety of making a law of that kind. Would not it have been better to have admitted them generally in all cases?—I thought it would, at the time the law was passed.

2596. Do you see any reason for the exclusion?—I do not.

2597. Mr. Hammond. There is this further anomaly also. It only lets in witnesses as informateurs, not as witnesses for the defence.

2598. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do you agree that that is the effect of the law?—Yes.

2599. Do you think that also a defect?—I think so. I think we extend the incompetency much too far.

2600. If one brother sees the commencement of an affray which ends in the death of another brother, and a third sees the death, the proof in conviction could be heard, but not the proof in defence?—Just so.

2601. There is another limitation also, that the offence must have occurred in the bosom of the family?—Yes; which is a limitation I do not exactly understand.

2602. What do you think is the legal construction of the phrase "in the bosom of the family?"—I cannot exactly say how it would be interpreted. I should think it meant in the house where the parties were living, among the family only.

2603. An uncle committing an offence upon his niece, would that be in the bosom of the family?—It would be so interpreted, I imagine. It is a very loose term.

2604. (To Mr. Dupré.) The 15th question is, "If such statements have been made by the party charged under the influence of a promise or threat, does this render them inadmissible in evidence?"—I think the evidence would not be received.

JERSEY.

J. W. Dupré, Esq.
17 September, 1847.

2605. From whom is it necessary that the promise or threat should proceed in order to constitute the exclusion? An indifferent person promising or threatening would not exclude the evidence, would it?—It is supposed to be some person having power or authority to execute the threat, or to perform the promise.

---

John Hammond, Esq.

John Hammond, Esq., further examined.

2606. The Commissioners understand, by the answer to the 16th Question, that the party may give evidence of his innocence in every case where he has not pleaded Guilty?—Yes.

2607. What people have access to a party charged, when he is in prison?—The police officers, before he is brought up, have access to him. I do not know what regulations there may be exactly, by the Prison Board.

2608. Sir John De Veulle. All the members of the Prison Board have constant access, of course, and the gaoler and the other officers of the prison: but no one else, without a written order from one of the members of the Board.

2609. Do you recollect any cases in which evidence of the declaration of the prisoner has been given by the gaoler, or officer, or policeman?—That is frequently done.

2610. By whom is the evidence given?—Both by the police officer, and also by the gaoler, if he has been present when the prisoner has made the declaration.

2611. Do you know any instance of control being exercised, or of a rebuke being administered to a police officer for questioning a prisoner?—I cannot say that I remember anything of the kind. It may have been done.

2612. Mr. Hammond. That has been of very frequent occurrence here; and I think it is to be deprecated.

2613. Of course the Court always check it?—I do not think that it has been checked. The reason which has been given by the police officers often is, that, supposing there is reason to believe there were participators in the crime, it is desirable to try to obtain some clue to the apprehension of those persons.

2614. By questioning the prisoners?—Yes.

2616. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Can you tell the Commissioners what is the practice upon that subject?—Our law and practice is quite different from the English law. The Police have always been in the habit of putting questions to prisoners relative to the offence with which they are charged; and the admission of the prisoner has always been received by the Court, provided no improper means have been resorted to to obtain it from the prisoner, provided it was a free admission. I believe that, by referring to the Reports which have been presented by the different constables, such admissions are generally mentioned in the Reports. At the same time, I must mention that I do not believe that the admission of the prisoner alone would be considered a sufficient proof of his guilt by the jury, if it were not corroborated by some other evidence.

2617. Of course, if you require two witnesses it would not?—We do not now, in our practice, require two witnesses. I could mention that Mr. Chevalier on one occasion has been accused of having trepanned prisoners into an admission of their guilt, and especially a man of the name of Noon. I do not suppose that centenier Chevalier ever saw the man while he was in gaol.

2618. Of course trepanning a prisoner would be contrary to law; but your practice is to question him, is not it?—Yes, and to ask them to account for their being present at such a place, or how they account for being absent from their home; but, of course, any admission given under a promise would be immediately rejected by the Court.

2619. Whether it would be considered to have been given under a promise or not, would, of course, depend upon what the police officer might say?—Yes.

2620. Would this rule in practice be confined to the constable, properly so called, and the centeniers, or would it extend to every officier de connétable?—More especially to the constable and centeniers, though in some cases admissions made to police officers have been received by the Court.

2621. Mr. Hammond. I think we may say that police officers are heard as generally as other members of the police.

2622. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) With respect to the practice of allowing policemen to question prisoners and producing afterwards the answers they give in evidence, what do you say?—I think it is one of the greatest abuses which have been introduced very lately.

2623. It does exist, does it?—It does exist; that is, by "existing" I must be understood to mean that it is sometimes practised; for I have never done it, and I should consider it a dereliction of my duty if I had. Oftentimes a prisoner denies in a very strenuous manner what has been stated by the party who has been questioning him in gaol, or he states that some promise or threat has been held out to him.

2624. It then rests with the policeman who has questioned him to say whether he did promise or threaten him?—If there are no other witnesses it must necessarily rest with him.

2625. You think it is a modern practice, do you?—I never heard that it was practised before I was constable in the town; and it never was practised while I was constable.

2626. Mr. Le Sueur. I think, if you refer to the Reports of constables, you will see there are admissions made by prisoners, and that they have been always received. In the case of Noon, which I have cited, I went to the prison, after the verdict of the inquest. I put no question to Noon about his culpability; but, in the evening, when I put him in gaol, I did not know whether he was quite sober. I went to tell him that such an inquest had taken place, and that they had given such a verdict. The gaoler and two police officers were then present.

JERSEY.

John Hammond, Esq.

17 September, 1846.

2627. (To Sir John De Veulle.) In the case of an instrument attested by witnesses, can it be read unless the witnesses are produced?—Perhaps the witnesses may be out of the Island.

2628. If there is no good cause for their non-production, would the Court allow the instrument to be read?—I think not, if it were insisted upon by the other side.

2629. Do you apply that to all the attesting witnesses?—To one, at any rate.

2630. Should you exclude an instrument from being produced in all cases where it was not registered? Supposing, for instance, the case of two parties indicted for a conspiracy, where they have a contract between them, which of course they would not register?—In that case I do not think the Court would refuse it.

2631. It would be admissible in evidence, not to prove the contract, but to prove the fact of the crime?—Yes.

2632. Acts of Court, of course, are produced from the registry?—Acts of Court are signed by the Greffier, and of course prove themselves.

2633. Is the exemplification evidence without its being produced by the proper officer?—Yes.

2634. Supposing a question as to a parish rate, must you produce the parish books?—They would be produced and proved by the parish constable.

2635. Would you admit a copy?—They generally produce the books; but, if a copy were signed by the constable, it would be admitted I think.

2636. Would that be on the ground that the constable was a public officer?—Yes.

2637. (To Mr. Hammond.) The 17th question is, "Is the examination of a witness, whether against or in favour of the party accused, confined to those facts which the witness knows of his own knowledge? Or may he be examined as to what he has learned touching the matter in dispute from declarations, written or oral, of third parties?" The answer made by all the gentlemen is, that the witness must give evidence upon things which he has seen and heard himself. Is hearsay altogether excluded from the consideration of the Court, or is it admitted to be given, being stated not to be evidence?—I consider that it is not admissible at all, strictly speaking; but it is equally true that sometimes it is admitted to be given to connect facts which an individual knows, where it is scarcely possible to have a clear statement without his referring to those matters which are, so to speak, a link in his evidence, and where it would be very difficult to expunge them altogether. But hearsay evidence is no evidence in itself at all.

2638. That is, no evidence of the truth of the thing told to the party?—If the person were to commence by saying he has heard such a thing, it is rejected in toto. It would not be evidence of the fact at all.

2639. If the witness said, "John Brown told me that the prisoner was stealing my wood, and I went to his house, and found him," you would strike out the first part, and say, "in consequence of something which was told me, I went to his house?"—Yes.

2640. If by chance, in one of those depositions taken by an écrivain, hearsay evidence were to creep in by the negligence of the parties, could that evidence be objected to at any time after it had been written?—At any time it could be objected to: and, in pleading before the enditement, the counsel could also make the remark that, though part of the evidence, it was not legal evidence.

2641. Mr. Dupré. He could not have it expunged after it was signed.

2642. Mr. Hammond. I think, if the party were brought forward again, the question might be raised in the presence of the witness, if he were heard in two or three days. The deposition is read to him again; and he has to corroborate that which he said on the previous day; and, if there were any thing of that kind in it, the counsel for the prisoner would have a right to moot the question, because it is read before all the parties and he might raise that question and ask the judgment of the Court upon it.

2643. Do I perfectly understand you, that, a witness being recalled, the first proceeding is that some officer of the Court reads to him all his prior examination?—Yes.

2644. Then he is questioned as to the new matter?—Yes.

2645. You think that, at the time he is called up a second time, the Court might order a passage to be struck out from the first evidence he has given?—Yes, upon the objection being taken. The question may be put to the witness whether he confirms that; and he may add to or explain what he has stated before; and there may be many changes made. A witness is called, for instance, upon one day; he gives his evidence; that evidence is closed for that day; and he signs it. He is brought up a second or a third day; and, when this is read to him, that witness has a perfect right to change it in this way, "I meant to say so and so."

2646. Can the Court order particular expressions in a deposition which has been signed by a party to be struck out, on the objection of counsel that they are hearsay?—I consider that it may, while the witness is before the Court.

2647. Supposing a trial before the enditement. The enditement convict. In the mean time, before the period at which the case is submitted to the next tribunal, the counsel for the prisoner, conning the thing over, sees that there is a great deal of hearsay evidence. Could he apply to the Court to have it struck out?—No, I think not then; but he could always remark to the jury upon that which he considers to be hearsay evidence, and that which is direct evidence.

2648. Must not the Report of the constable be hearsay?—Yes.

2649. Mr. Marett. I believe there never has been an instance of any evidence once signed being altered or expunged in any way.

2650. Mr. Dupré. No change can be made in a deposition which has been written after the witness has signed it, and has left the Court. If the écrivain writes an answer to a question, and the advocate objects to it as hearsay evidence, it may be struck out before the witness signs it; but no evidence can be altered after the witness has signed it.

2651. In that case, it could only be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury by the counsel or the Court calling their attention to particular passages, which they ought not to take notice of because they are not evidence.

2653. Mr. Hammond. That is the way I would expunge it virtually. I do not say the pen would be drawn across it; but, suppose that it is hearsay, and it comes to the knowledge of the counsel, he would put the question, "is not that which you have declared derived from such a source?" and he must answer to that. We do not obliterate the former evidence; but we shew that it is not evidence by asking the witness as to the source from which he obtained the evidence. Supposing a witness is asked, on the second occasion, "do you confirm your evidence?", he may upon that say, "I confirm it, except so far, that so and so is incorrect;" or, "It is not as I have stated it." The other is not obliterated; but the subsequent declaration in fact virtually expunges the other, though both are before the Court.

2654. In a case like that, would that have the effect of withdrawing the evidence from the enditement?—No, not of withdrawing it, but of paralyzing the effect of it. In fact, if a person makes a statement on his first examination, and, between that and the second examination, the counsel for the defence discovers that the statement has been a representation of something told to the witness, he would put the question, "Was not what you said the other day what was told you?" The witness would answer, "Yes." That would get rid of the effect of the previous statement, to some extent.

2655. Would that be withdrawn from the enditement?—No.

2656. Would not it depend upon the discrimination of the enditement whether they took the evidence as hearsay or not?—What would be pressed upon them would be the subsequent declaration; but both would be put before them.

2657. Mr. Marett. When an error is made and retracted, both the error and retraction are read before the jury.

2658. (To Mr. Hammond.) With regard to dying declarations being received, to what is that confined?—I should think it would be only in the case of homicide.

2659. Do you confine it to the dying declaration of a person murdered?—Yes. Then, of course, we must receive hearsay evidence, that is of those persons who can come and testify that such was the statement of the person dying.

2660. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do you agree in that?—I do.

2661. So that the fact, that an ordinary witness was dying and made a delaration in that state, would not make that declaration evidence?—Not unless it were heard before the Vicomte. If a witness was so ill as not to be able to appear before the Court, the only remedy would be to have an officer of the Court to hear that evidence; and then it would be perfectly valid, if taken in the presence of the prisoner.

2662. (To Sir John De Veulle.) Of course, when parties are confined on any charge of crime, an order to see them is never refused to their counsel or legal advisers?—No: the article of the prison regulations says that the legal advisers may be admitted at all times.

2663. Without any other person being by him?—Yes; all possible facilities of that kind are given.

2664. The Commissioners observe that all the gentlemen consider that evidence as to the character of the accused may be given for and against him at all stages of the case.

2665. Mr. Hammond. I do not know that it could be given against him. I do not know any case in my practice where that has been done; because a party charged would be before the Court on the particular accusation; and therefore I should consider it extraneous, and oppose it.

2666. You think you could not give evidence of the bad character of a prisoner in proof of his guilt?—No, any more than committing one offence necessarily makes him guilty of the charge before the Court.

2667. You say that particular acts of good conduct may be given in evidence?—My meaning is that we are allowed to bring forward specific facts.

2668. Can evidence be gone into to disprove a particular act of that kind?—Yes. The Crown has a perfect right to rebut the evidence.

2669. Supposing a man were indicted for murder, to show his humane conduct you may prove that he had rescued some person?—Yes.

2670. That might raise a collateral issue, therefore?—Certainly the Crown might call witnesses to contradict it.

2671. And evidence of his previous character might be brought to support that again?—Yes.

2672. You appear to agree that evidence can be given of the bad or good character of a witness, and that there you may introduce particular facts again?—I consider that the prisoner has a right to impugn the character of a witness.

2673. By proof of particular facts?—Yes; but I think, in general, he ought to state specifically his objection to the witness when he is called: at least that that would be the safer way.

2674. That would be on both sides, would not it. The Attorney General might produce evidence that a witness for the prisoner was a man of bad character?—Not as an objection to his evidence, but as to the credit to be given to him. I cannot recollect, in my practice, that the Procureur Général has had recourse to that.

2675. You all agree that you may impeach a witness for the prosecution, at all events, by proving some particular fact against him. The other side, of course, are entitled to rebut that?—Yes.

2676. Then, if they do so, they may do so by proving that the witnesses who have proved that second fact are themselves unworthy of credit?—I suppose so.

JERSEY.

John Hammond, Esq.

17 September, 1846.

2676. Is there any limit to that divergence from the main issue?—Wherever the parties saw it was of use, they would continue it, no doubt. Evidence is brought for or against the charge. The scope of the evidence to which I allude would be to shew that there is not evidence, or at any rate that it is doubtful evidence, and is not to be trusted.

2677. Would not that be a trial of so many distinct questions? I bring evidence to say that a witness should not be believed because he told a particular lie on a certain day. He would bring evidence to rebut that.—It would have no other effect than this, that, the evidence being brought before the enditement, they are to appreciate that evidence: then they are to see that which would go to impugn the evidence, and that which would go to support it.

2677. Must not this be the case, that the first question which the enditement must ask themselves is, "Is this witness to be believed?" To decide that question, they must try whether he told the lie or not. Then would come the next question; "Did the prisoner commit the fact or not?" That would be tried by the general evidence, from which the testimony of the witness would be excluded, or into which it would be introduced, according as they thought him worthy or unworthy of credit?—That would be according to the working of their own mind without any specific declaration on their part.

2678. Is not that an inconvenience which arises out of allowing a particular fact to be given in proof of the good or bad character of the witness?—The contrary course might tend to curtail the evidence: but I do not know that it would be a great advantage, practically.

2679. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do you agree with the rule that particular facts may be given to show the good or bad character of the witness?—I have never seen it done.

2680. You know no instance of it?—No.

2681. (To Sir John De Veulle.) The Bench tell us, in their answers, that the general rule is that two witnesses are necessary to establish a fact, but that the evidence of one credible witness, whose testimony is corroborated by extrinsic evidence, would be sufficient to establish a fact. What do you mean by the corroboration of a witness?—When we met, we discussed these questions together. I think instances were mentioned where, one person having sworn to a fact, and that being corroborated by some extrinsic matter, the evidence had been found sufficient, and the jury had convicted upon it.

2683. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Do you think it is not any longer considered law that two witnesses are necessary?—I think not. Sometimes advocates may cite the old Norman Law upon that point; but it is not the practice.

2684. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). Wherever the States think that one witness will be sufficient evidence, or that two witnesses could not be easily produced, they enact that one credible witness shall be enough.

2685. Mr. Le Sueur. That provision has been left out in all recent Acts.

2686. (To Mr. Hammond.) Do you agree with Mr. Godfray, that two witnesses are always necessary?—I think that two witnesses must give evidence of the crime in order to convict the prisoner.

2687. Supposing a man were to say, "I saw the prisoner at the bar shoot another man through the head," and it were proved by another witness that the man had been seen with a gun, would that be sufficient?—I doubt it very much.

2688. Sir John De Veulle. Suppose I heard a noise in my house, and got up, and found a person in the house, and he ran away with a watch of mine, and was afterwards taken with the watch in his possession, I think the jury would convict him upon that.

2689. Mr. Dupré. I do not think there is any number of witnesses necessary for the establishment of a particular fact.

2690. I might be walking in the street; and a man might run up against me, and take my watch; I might pursue him and get it back. Would that be taken to be sufficient evidence?

2691. Mr. Hammond. The old rule is that the denial of a prisoner is equal to the statement of a single witness.

2692. (To Mr. Dupré.) Would you prosecute upon an information supported by the evidence of one witness?—No. In the case of Nicolle, there was one man saw the prisoner run from the direction in which the gun was fired towards the house. He was the only witness to that particular fact.

2693. Mr. Le Sueur. It was not my intention to say that, if there was only one witness to prove the death of a person, that would be sufficient evidence; but I think that it is not necessary to have two witnesses to the same fact.

2694. Why should not one witness be sufficient to prove the crime itself?—In that case, it would be very strange that one person only should be called to prove the death. When I said that we did not require two witnesses, I meant two witnesses to the same fact.

2695. Sir John De Veulle. There was an old man, whose name I have forgotten. Two men went into his house. They had been there before; and, when he saw them come in, he said, "You are come to finish me to-night." They beat him very much, and nearly murdered him, and stole some things. He was the only person to swear to their identity. They were convicted, and transported; and, on visiting Pentonville, I saw the very man in prison.

2696. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). There were other facts in corroboration of that; they had been met near the house. The Court would never say, "There is only one witness, and we must stop the case."

2697. If a criminal is charged with any offence here, and escapes to England, you cannot get any help from England, can you?—No; I think not.

2698. (To Mr. Dupré.) Can you state how that is?—We now make an exchange of prisoners, which we did not before. That is by a special law which has been registered here.

2699. (To Sir John De Veulle) Supposing a man escapes from Jersey to England, what could you do?—We could claim him. Formerly, in one case I remember, after the Bristol riots, several of them came here; and I could not give them up. But now the constable comes with a warrant from England; and I deliver them up.

2700. Mr. Le Sueur. Before the new Act of Parliament was passed, a burglary had been committed on a watchmaker here of the name of Woods. The persons went off to England with part of the stolen property. They were taken up in England, and brought back here by two officers.

2701. English policemen?—Yes.

2702. Have you any knowledge under what authority that was done?—The party who was robbed went over to England. One of the men confessed.

2703. Mr. Hammond. If the police officers in England had not thought proper to bring them over, I am not aware that we have any authority to take a prisoner in such a case.

2704. Sir John De Veulle. If a criminal escapes to Guernsey, we have no power to get him back at all.

2705. (To Mr. Dupré.) Do you consider the statement of Pipon and Durell an authority on which the Commissioners may generally rely?—In most cases.

2706. With respect to that and to the other statement of Hemery and Dumaresq, and also the statements and counter statements of the States and the Royal Court, may the Commissioners rely on the documents there set out as authorities?—I think they may.

2707. So with the charters?—Yes.

2708. (To Sir John De Veulle.) How is it with regard to an Englishman who has committed a crime in England, and is in this country? Supposing an application were made from England to have the person taken up for a crime committed in England?—Formerly, very often, the constable would come here; and I could not give up the person without an Order in Council. Now, by the new Act, the 6th and 7th of Victoria, chapter 34, constables have come, and I have given persons up.

2709. I understand you to say, that there is still the same difficulty with regard to criminals who escape from Jersey to Guernsey?—Yes.

2710. That difficulty is not cured at all?—No.

2711. (To Mr. Hammond.) What do you do when you want evidence from England?—I do not see that there is any help for it whatever.

2712. Nor vice versâ?—No.

[Adjourned to to-morrow, at half-past ten o'clock.]

Friday, 18th September, 1846.

Sir John de Veulle.
18 September 1846.

Sir John de Veulle examined.

2713. The Commissioners understand that you have some statement which you wish to make to them.—I wish to make an observation with respect to what the Attorney General stated. I know he did not wish to cast any reflection upon me; but, from what he said, it might be supposed that I sometimes declined to appoint days for criminal cases. I must say that I never refuse to appoint days when I am asked. I appoint as many as I can, both in Term time and in Vacation, with regard to the general business. I should also state that I am obliged, as President of the Prison Board, to report to the Secretary of State for the Home Department the state of the prison; and that, whenever it happens that a prisoner has been more than two months in gaol without being tried, I am always obliged to give a reason why it has been so. It very seldom happens that a person is more than two months: but it has sometimes happened without our being able to help it. Mr. Le Breton will remember a case where the prisoner stated that he had a material witness in Newfoundland; he was kept in consequence six months in gaol, till the return of the witness; and, when he came, it was found, I believe, that he knew nothing material.

2714. Do not you think this Island is in want of some means of obtaining witnesses that are out of the Island?—It would be a very good thing if we had the means.

---

Thomas Le Breton, Esq., further examined.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.

2715. The Commissioners were discussing, the other day, the law as to registering Acts of Council and Acts of Parliament. Their impression was, that there was an order of Council of 1806, stating that Acts of Parliament in which the Island is named were law, independently of any registration. It is a Guernsey Order, they find.—Yes. It is with regard to some revenue regulations.

2716. That, I presume, is law here now.—I should think so.

2717. Supposing the Act of Parliament mentioned "all Her Majesty's dominions, not being part of the United Kingdom," should you consider that those words included Jersey?—Yes.

2718. It would be law without registration?—Yes; but it is always registered.

2719. Should you think the words "all Her Majesty's dominions," without the words "not being part of the United Kingdom," would include Jersey?—I should doubt it.

2720. Acts of Parliament not naming the Island are considered not to be law till registered here?—No.

2721. Before you register an Act of Parliament not naming Jersey, do you always have an Order in Council?—I know very few cases: but I do not know of any Act of Parliament not naming the Island being registered.

2722. (To Sir John De Veulle). Do you agree with that?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.

18 September, 1846.

2723. Mr. Le Breton. They are never registered without an Order in Council.

2724. With respect to Orders of Council, they generally carry in the body of them an order that they shall be registered, do not they?—They always do. The Commissioners will allow me to remark that, when an Act of Parliament in which the Islands are not named has been sent here for registration, the material provisions of the Act have generally been taken and made into a local Act, and then confirmed by Her Majesty in Council.

2725. Orders in Council are always registered, are not they?—Yes.

2726. Was not there a right claimed of suspending the registry of an Order in Council?—That claim exists.

2727. For what length of time do you claim that?—Till there has been an opportunity of making a representation to Her Majesty.

2728. Has not that been noticed in some Order in Council?—There was a censure in the case of my father when he was appointed Attorney General. That was for refusing to swear him in according to his Letters Patent.

2729. With respect to Local Acts, if passed for three years only, it is understood that they are law for that time without any order in Council?—Yes.

2730. Is there any limitation as to the subjects to which acts of that sort may apply?—No; there is no law limiting the legislation of the States upon any subject.

2731. Supposing an Act of the States passes which does not, on the face of it, bear that it is to last only for three years, does that last for three years without an Order of Council?—The enactment never mentions the time that it is to last: but any Act of the States not confirmed by the Council ceases to be law at the expiration of the three years.

2732. You make them occasionally perpetual by re-enacting them, do not you?—Yes.

2733. Toties quoties?—Yes.

2734. Are there any Acts which have been law in the Island for a long while in that way, by triennial renewals?—There are regulations as to taking away gravel and stone from parts of the Island, inflicting small penalties for taking gravel from the shore, regulations as to the boatmen and porters, and others as to matters of that kind.

2735. There is a Lottery Act, is not there?—I believe that has expired.

2736. How long did it last?—I believe it was renewed, with some modifications, once.

2738. (To Mr. Le Breton). Am I right in supposing that no Act of the States becomes law, except by the consent of the Lieutenant Governor?—Yes.

---

François Godfray, Esq., (Advocate) further examined.

François Godfray, Esq.

2739. Do you distinguish between robbery and larceny as we do in England?—Yes, though in the accusation it is always put vol.

2740. What is the distinction between the two?—One would be more severely punished than the other, if there were violence.

2741. Does violence constitute the difference between robbery and larceny?—Yes, as to the punishment.

2742. What is robbery?—Messrs. Pipon and Durell, as to robbery, state, at page 7 of their statement:—"Robbery, whether it be the taking from a person by violence, as on the highway or from his house, is punishable with death." Robbery was either entering violently into a house, or attacking a person and robbing him. Rouillé says:—"Je me plaing de B. qui en la paix de Dieu et du duc m'assaillit, et me batit, et me fist sang et playe, et me tollit ma chape en roberie: pourquoy il me convinst crier haro. Se lautre le nye mot a mot et il offre à soy defendre len doibt premierement faire enqueste du haro par ceulx enquel voysine il deust estre crie ou ceulx qui y furent presentz. Et se ils dyent et tesmoignent que ils ouyrent le haro de la roberie lors doibvent les gaiges de la battaille estre receuz en la maniere que nous avons dict."

2743. The cry of "haro" is discontinued in that case, is not it?—Yes; it does not apply now to criminal matters: it is disused altogether.

2744. Is there any enactment disusing it?—I am not aware of any. I do not think any person could be capitally punished if there were not great violence amounting to a wound. Roberie would be on the person.

2745. I understand you to say "robbery" is where a person either violently enters into a house and steals, or steals from the person?—Where you use the word "robbery," the word we use in the island now is "vol." Then it is defined how the "vol" has taken place; and, according to the circumstances, the person is judged. We have no such crime in Jersey now as robbery. The accusation would be vol; and the circumstances are aggravating circumstances, which would naturally increase the punishment. "Vol" depends upon how the accusation is framed; it is stated whether it is "vol" on the highway, whether it was "vol avec violence," "vol dans une maison habitée avec effraction," or "dans la nuit."

2746. The definition of roberie is a part of the ancient Coustumier which has gone?—Yes.

2747. Is the word "larcin" used as the designation of a crime?—No; it is called vol. I suppose, when Messrs. Pipon and Durell used the word, it was to be understood by the persons they wrote to.

2748. If the Commissioners were to report that the law as to robbery and larceny was regulated by the ancient Coustumier, they would be reporting untruly?—The Court for forty years has not put any one to death for "vol avec effraction."

2749. Would it be now law to do so?—I should think that, there having been no cases for for forty years, it would hardly be considered as law to put persons to death.

2750. Should you say it was an illegal punishment, if a man was hanged for robbing me and cutting my face?—It would not be called illegal, because the law would bear it out. The question would be, whether the Court would use a proper discretion in applying it after having been disused so long.

2751. Do you find in the ancient Coustumier anything authorizing the Court to mitigate the punishment from a capital one?—No.

2752. Do you find anything substantially authorizing the act of imprisonment?—As far as the records go, the Court has sometimes imprisoned persons.

2753. Do you find that authorized by the ancient Coustumier?—No, not for roberie.

2754. Is there any trace of the origin of that power?—None, except the practice.

2755. What is the ordinary punishment now for the crime of robbery with wounding?—Transportation.

2756. What is the authority for that?—There is no authority.

2757. Banishment, you think, is legal?—Yes: the Court has the right to inflict it.

2758. Is banishment recognized in the ancient Coustumier?—It is.

2759. Mr. Dupré. It is mentioned under the title of forfeitures, chapter 23: "Meuble est le chatel à ceulx qui sont damnez par jugement. En trois manières sont les hommes damnez en Normendie, si comme leurs dessertes le requierent: ou parce que les corps sont destruictz, si cõme de ceulx qui sont pendus ou ardz ou enfouys ou qui ont les yeulx crevez ou les pieds ou les poingz coupez: ou pour ce quilz sont forbãnis. Si cõme il appert des fuitifz qui sont accusez d'aulcun crime et defuyent quand ilz sont appellez à la paix au duc: tant quilz sont banniz par jugement de quoy nous dirons plus plainement tantost apres: ou pour ce quilz forjurent le pays. Si cõme il advient de ceulx qui sont fuytifz pour aulcun crime: ou qui sont en chartre: ou en lieux qui eschappent et senfuyent en leglise, ou ils embrassent vne croix. S'ilz forjurent le pays, ils forfont tout ce qu'ilz possidoient."

2760. Terrien is quoted by Pipon and Durrell in page 10. He appears to think that a "vol," which he there calls "larceny," though not in any one of the instances committed with aggravated circumstances, if committeed three times, would be subject to the punishment of death.—I see nothing in the books to show that a simple "vol" might be punished with death.

2761. You do not assent to the law as laid down by Pipon and Durrell in page 11?—I know of no instance in the records where a person has been hanged for a simple "vol."

2762. If the Court carried the sentence of death into effect, do you think it would be murder? It would, of course, if there were no law authorizing it.—I should say it was illegal.

2763. You think it would be technically a breach of the law to hang him?—I should think so.

2764. Have you any doubt that at one time in this country it would not have been a breach of the law to hang him?—I have no knowledge that there ever was a law authorizing a man to be hanged for it.

---

Mr. Hammond further examined.

Mr. Hammond.

2765. Mr. Hammond. Perhaps we might find, in that part of the Coustumier, something which might assist us as to punishment. We take the Coustumier as defining crimes; and we recognize the crimes so defined. The difficulty which appears is that it is laid down that certain crimes are to be punished in a certain way: but we do not follow the law as to the punishment of those crimes. Rouillé himself says: "Pour le déclaration de ceste question, len doibt scauoir que anciennement len souloit vser de punir vng malfaicteur en tel cas; de peine sembable au mesfaict qu'il avoit faict. Cestassavoir se aulcun crevoit vng oeil a vng aultre on luy crevoit vng oeil: et sil auoit coupe le poing à aulcun, on luy coupoit le poing: et ainsi es sembables cas et appelloit on celle peine ou loy Ad penam talionis. Mais len ne vse point pour le present de celle loy, car plusieurs punitions demeurent en tel cas en la raison et discretion de justice selon l'exigence des cas, et semble quil debueroit estre pillorie ou puny par longue prison, et par grande amende de justice et a partie. Et luy pourroit len bien couper loreille ou vng poing selon lexigence des cas et lestat des personnes." In Jersey there have been changes or modifications in the modes of punishment following that which has been done in the Duchy of Normandy in the earliest time. We have reason to think, or at any rate there is nothing to show the contrary in our books, that those changes in the mode of punishment were the result of new enactments.

2766. Do you think that the change in the way in which the Court exercises its discretion makes the old punishment cease to be law?—No; I do not.

2767. You do not think, if a man knocked out my eye, and the Court ordered the man's eye to be knocked out, it would be bad law?—At the time Rouillé wrote it is difficult to say whether it would be considered law, when there appeared to be another punishment substituted at that time.

2768. Is that more than a choice of punishments?—Yes; I think it is a substitution at that time.

2769. I gather from you that there was always, by the law of Normandy, a discretion in the Court in the amount of punishment, which has been carried out in the Courts of Jersey?—I should say, precisely in the same way.

2770. Then it is a discretion which binds, or at all events, binds in one direction, their successors?—Supposing a punishment were decreed, but that, during a period of thirty or forty years, another was substituted, that would be substituting that punishment for the prior one; and the more recent would be considered the punishment to be awarded.

2771. Would the latter punishment be the law?—It is a difficult thing to say that it would positively be the law: there always arises a little difficulty: but there is that change of punishment.

2772. Will you read on a little farther?—"Et luy pourroit len bien couper loreille ou vng poing selon lexigence des cas et lestat des personnes. Et oultre selon lopinion de plusieurs se vng homme avoit creve les yeulx a vng aultre ou coupe le poing, ou le bras, ou la jambe il ne debveroit pas pour ce estre pendu ou recepeior punition capitalle. Mais serait puny par la discretion de Justice selon lexigence du cas. Toutesfois justice ne doibt pas estre ainsi legiere ne incline a pyllorier pour tel cas ou semblable vng homme destat, ne a le punir par peines infamables ne par destresse de prison comme vne simple personne. Mais le doibt punir par grandes et grosses amendes tant a justice que a partie. Et se len demandoit pour quoy les punitions ne sont terminees en tous iceulx cas comme elles sont es crimes capitaulx. Len pourroit respondre que c'est pour la grand mutation et variation des cas qui adviennent qui sont differentz lun de lautre et digne de greigneure punition lun que lautre selon leur circumstance. Et pour ce ny peut on vrayement determiner aultre punition. Mais conuient auoir recours a la discretion de Justice et de raison, qui doibt sur ce pourveoir: en baillant punition greigneure ou mendre selon que le cas le requert."

2773. That would leave it in this way: the law says there is a punishment; but, according to the party or the nature of the case, they shall have the right, at their discretion, to make a modification of the punishment?—Yes.

2774. Is any such right claimed by the criminal Court here?—Without stating that there is such a claim, or such a right, I should say the practice has been very analogous to the reasoning of the passage which has been cited. I will take the instance of the pillory, to illustrate my meaning. The punishment by pillory has been often resorted to since I was at the bar; but, of late years, it has been almost entirely put aside, except in particular cases: but still, if the Attorney General, during the present term, for instance, found it necessary to move the Court to award the punishment of the pillory in a particular case, such as we have precedents for, the disuse of it for the last four or five years would not, it appears to me, prevent the use again of the pillory, if the Crown officers thought it necessary to move for that punishment. As to cutting off the ears, that has been disused for a long period, though it has been in practice since I have been at the bar. I should suppose, if it were insisted on by the Attorney General, there are a great many precedents for it.

2775. If the Attorney General were to conclude, after the enditement had brought in coupable, for cutting out the eye, is that law?—I do not think he could turn to any precedent in our rolls for that: he could for the other.

2776. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). In 1771, it must be observed, the Court had the power of making laws and ordinances.

2777. (To Mr. Hammond.) You say that you think the only sense in which the ancient Coustumier can be considered strictly as law is the definition of crimes, and not the awarding of punishments?—Not as awarding the punishment laid down in those books. And my reason is that we find them at that very period changed without any special enactment.

2778. You conceive the Coustumier would be referred to as law as to the definition of crimes?—Yes.

2779. Mr. Godfray informs us that two distinct heads of definition of crime in the ancient Coustumier have disappeared, and that a more general word has been substituted for both?—I do not think we follow it as to the technical mode of expressing crimes.

2780. Roberie and Larcin are very technically defined in the ancient Coustumier, and adhered to as distinct heads of offence in Pipon and Durell. Those, we understand, are no longer adhered to?—It is not that the law is changed, but the practice. For instance, when an accusation was framed for murder, the word "proditoirement" was introduced. There is nothing of that sort now: so the word "vol" might be also introduced in the same way.

2781. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Do you consider that there is any definite law defining crime, and assigning punishment in the criminal Courts of Jersey?—We have no other law than the Coustumier, except one for homicide and another for sodomy, and in the code of law regarding accomplices. The Court use their discretion or equity. Whether it is in consequence of that passage which has just now been cited, I cannot say.

2782. Has it occurred to you that the fact of the law being altered by a general discretion rather than by distinct enactment may be attributed, in some degree, to the Court itself being constituted popularly?—No doubt of it.

2783. Mr. Dupré. In the case of Nicolle, he was accused, and found guilty of murder. The punishment for that crime is, and always was, capital; nevertheless, when the Court was called upon to give judgment, two of the Jurats said that their consciences would not allow them to apply a capital punishment; and they opined for transportation for life.

2784. I understand you to agree with what the Attorney General has stated with respect to the formation of the Court?—Yes; the very nature of its formation will necessarily bring variations in the practice.

2785. It will bring about a discretionary and arbitrary exercise of justice?—Yes.

2786. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) With respect to banishment, do you happen to know whether banishment was always conducted as it is now. At present, you take the trouble to see a man on board a ship, and pay his passage, do not you?—Yes.

2787. Who determines the place to which the passage is to be paid?—The person says, generally, where he wishes to go.

Deputy Vicomte. A pass is given from the Vicomte's office.

2788. Suppose a person said, "I should wish to go and live in the Island of Madeira," should you permit him?—He would not be sent there. His place of residence would be ascertained; and we should send him to the nearest port in his country.

2789. The Vicomte. I have invariably asked a person where he was born; and, if we could get at the truth, we should send him as near to his place of residence as possible. The object in fact is to send him back to his parish.

2790. (To Mr. Le Breton.) May the Commissioners assume that the jurats, in their discretionary administration of the law, have taken as a general guide the progress of public feeling and of enactments in England?—I think so.

2791. Are the Commissioners right in supposing that, where a party has been condemned to a certain punishment, and is in the course of suffering that punishment, it is usual for the Court to exercise the power, upon the recommendation of the Attorney General, that part of the punishment should be remitted?—No.

2792. You know no instance of that sort?—No.

2793. Does the Court possess any power at all of interposing in the way of mercy, so as to diminish the weight of any formal sentence which has been passed?

2794. Mr. Dupré. I know of one case, where the Court did so, in the case of a contempt of a civil court. I know of no other case.

2795. (To Mr. François Godfray, Advocate.) Banishment is distinctly notified, in the instance to which you referred the Commissioners, as a punishment for certain crimes. It is at present rather a mitigation of the punishment of transportation, in practice, is not it?—I should say the Court would only send a person to Botany Bay, when by the old law he might have been condemned to death.

2796. I suppose banishment is considered one of the lightest punishments which can be inflicted?—There is of course no comparison between banishment and transportation.

2797. After the Attorney General had concluded for imprisonment for two years, might the prisoner's counsel apply for such a mitigation of punishment?—A prisoner is sometimes imprisoned for a year or two, and afterwards banished.

2798. Has the Court a power to banish in all felonies?—Yes.

2799. Can they banish in cases of délits?—No. They sometimes order a person to find bail or leave the Island, if he has been a rogue or a vagrant; they are ordered to find bail for their good conduct, or that they will leave the Island.

2800. Would that be so in any case tried before the enditement?—No.

2801. Is there anything which would be tried before the enditement for which they cannot banish?—No: I think banishment may be annexed to nearly every crime which comes before the enditement.

2802. Is there any ordinance annexing banishment to any offence?—There is a law passed in 1798, as to tumultuous or riotous meetings, which authorizes the Court to banish for five years.

2803. Is that a local law, or is it confirmed by Council?—It is confirmed by Council. The following is the second article of the law of 1798.

"Si quelque connétable ou centenier est informé d'un attroupement, ou rassemblement illicite de personnes dans sa paroisse, il est autorisé et chargé de s'y présenter sans délai, et de commander à haute voix, au nom du Roi, à ceux qui seront ainsi assemblés, ou attroupés, de se retirer incessamment et paisiblement chez eux, ou à leurs occupations légitimes; et si demi heure après tel commandement il reste encore au nombre de six personnes au plus ensemble l'Officier de Police en ce cas est autorisé et chargé de saisir et presenter en justice les réfractaires, et pour cet effet de se faire assister non seulement de tous Officiers de Police, mais de toutes autres personnes, lesquelles en cas de besoin il jugera convenable d'appeler à son secours, lesquelles personnes seront tenues de donner au dit Officier de Police toute l'assistance en leur pouvoir, sur peine de telle amende, ou de tel emprisonnement que le cas sera trouvé mériter. Et chacun de ceux qui auront continué ainsi assemblés, nonobstant tel commandement, sera puni par un banissement qui n'excédera pas le terme de cinq ans."

2804. Is there any process now existing by which a person abjures the country?—No.

2805. Was not that, when it existed, where a person took refuge in sanctuary?—Yes: and he was conducted to the sea-side.

2806. Mr Dupré. From every church there was a road leading to the sea-side.

2807. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). Those roads are sown over and do not exist now.

2808. Mr. Hammond. They have fallen to the Crown: they were given to Sir Edward Carteret in the time of Charles the Second.

2809. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) There is no practice now by which a person can avoid a prosecution for a crime by leaving the country?—No.

2810. Mr. Charles De Ste. Croix. The following is a case in which the parties were ordered by the Court to find caution for good behaviour or to leave the Island.

"William Gordon et Robert Gordon (fils du dit William Gordon), saisis de fait par le centenier Chevalier de la Paroisse de St. Hélier, et présentés en justice par le connétable de la dite paroisse, sous accusation de s'être, dans la soirée de Samedi, 2e du courant, battus, et d'avoir autrement troublé la paix publique, le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au Rapport du dit centenier, qui est demeuré logé au Greffe. Après que, les dits accusés ont été entendus: il a été ordonné qu'ils donneront caution, tant de leur bonne et paisible comport, que ni eux ni la famille du dit William Gordon ne tomberont point à la charge de l'Isle, sur la penalité de cinq livres sterling, chacun, et, faute à eux de fournir le dit cautionnement, ils seront renvoyés dans leur pays natal. Et est le Vicomte chargé de s'entendre avec la police de St. Hélier afin que la famille du dit William Gordon quitte le pays avec lui."

2810. That is a case in which the Court decided upon the facts so disputed?—Yes.

JERSEY.

Mr. Hammond.
18 September, 1846.

There is another case in which the person was accused by the Procureur Général; and that would have gone to the enditement.

"Julia Supple, saisie de fait par le centenier Chevalier de la paroisse de St. Hélier, et présentée en justice par le connétable de la dite paroisse, a été accusée par le Procureur Général de la Reine, en conséquence du Rapport du dit centenier, d' avoir, dans le courant du Mois de Novembre, 1842, ou vers ce tems là, retenu sans droit une quantité de linge et autres effets d'habillement, entr' autres, quatre draps de lit, quatre caisses d'oreiller, une jupe en flannelle, et un essuiemain, la propriété de Dlle. Charlotte Igraden, veuve Backhouse, et de sa famille; les quels effets lui avaient été remis pour être lavés; et d'avoir, la dite Julia Supple, frauduleusement approprié les dits effets à son profit, en les déposant en gage chez Mr. Joseph Stephens, fripier en la ville de St. Hélier. La dite Julia Supple a sur ce plaidé et fait sa déclaration, qui a été redigée et logée au Greffe; et elle a été constituée prisonnière sous la dite accusation, instance du dit sieur Procureur Général de la Reine, au quel il est permis d'informer, étant le Rapport du dit centenier, ainsi qu'un essuiemain, produits en cour par le dit connétable, demeurés logés au Greffe."

"Julia Supple, convenue à l'instance du Procureur Général de la Reine, pour ouir dépôt d'informateurs sur l'accusation qui lui est faite, en conséquence du Rapport du centenier Chevalier de la paroisse de St. Hélier, le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au dit Rapport et en l'acte de la cour, en date de l'an 1842, le 12e jour de Décembre. La dite Julia Supple a été reçue à son offre de vuider le pays, et se retirer dans son pays natal pour éviter plus outre poursuite. Partant, conformément aux conclusions du Procureur Général de la Reine, il lui est défendu de retourner dans cette Isle avant l'expiration du terme de cinq ans, sur telle peine qu'il appartiendra, sauf à elle à donner caution de sa bonne conduite et qu'elle ne tombera point à la charge du pays à l'avenir. Et elle est renvoyeé en prison jusqu'à ce qui'il se présente une occasion convenable pour la faire transporter dans son pays natal. Et le connétable de St. Hélier est chargé de s'entendre avec le Vicomte; afin que la famille de la dite Supple quitte le pays avec elle."

2811. That is the ordinary mode of proceeding, is it?—Very frequently.

2812. (To Mr. Dupré.) Would you refer this also to the same discretionary power you have mentioned, of doing what was right under the circumstances of the case, which you suppose to be vested in the Court?—Undoubtedly: it is established by long custom.

2813. (To Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix.) Is there any distinction in practice between the natives of the Island and those who are not natives, as to that?—There is.

2814. What is the distinction?—Natives of the Island are not sent out of the Island, because they might be sent back.

2815. The Commissioners understand that, in some cases, English paupers have been sent away to their place of settlement in England?—Yes.

2816. Are the lawyers here familiar with the English law of settlement?—The English law of settlement is that which is generally quoted in our Courts. The question has only arisen very lately, within two or three years.

2817. (To Mr. Le Breton). If you send paupers back to their settlement, do you look into the question whether a particular adjudication of settlement in England is such as to bind any future case?—No: we do not examine into particulars: we merely send them to the actual place of their birth.

2818. Would you send a married woman to her birth settlement?—To the birth settlement of her husband.

2819. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). That is to say, we give them a pass to Southampton, directing that they are to be passed forward.

2820. If a man were to say, "I was born in Ireland, but I have served a parish office in England giving me a settlement in Huntingdon," should you send him to Ireland?—Yes: I have never known of such a case as that.

2821. Are persons ever allowed to leave the Island to avoid prosecution?

2822. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. I have quoted such a case.

2823. In that case, is sentence of banishment recorded against them?—Their offer to leave the Island is recorded; and they are banished upon the conclusions of the Attorney General.

2824. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) That does not agree with your statement, that persons are not permitted to leave the Island to avoid a prosecution.—I suppose the person in the case referred to was permitted to leave the Island, beeause the Attorney General had no evidence against him. I do not suppose, if the Attorney General had had evidence enough to convict him, it would have been permitted.

2825. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. It is generally done, when the evidence is imperfect or the offence is very slight.

2826. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) Have you any definite offence of piracy?—No.

2827. An act of piracy on the High Seas would hardly take place without comprehending three or four crimes?—Yes: some of the crimes would fall within one of the definitions; and they would be punished for that.

2828. You have a distinct law as to Receivers, have not you?—Yes.

2829. From Rouillé and the Order in Council of 1635?—Yes.

2830. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. This is the case of Le Brocq, who was banished.

The same is read as follows..

Octobre 4. L'an mil huit-cent trente-trois, le quatrième jour d'Octobre.

Par devant Messire Jean De Veulle, Chevalier, Bailli de l'Ile de Jersey, assisté de Charles Le Maistre, Philippe De Carteret, Philippe Marett, George Phil. Benest, Phil. D'Auvergne, George Bertram, Nicolas Le Quesne, Edouard Léonard Bisson, et Phil. De Ste. Croix, écuyers, Jurés.

François Le Brocq, fils Edouard, sous accusation d'avoir, dans la soirée du Jeudi, 11 Juillet, 1833, ou vers ce temps là, assailli, sur le chemin public, en la paroisse de St. Ouen, Monsieur Edouard Le Gresley, de la dite paroisse, de l'avoir terrassé et violemment maltraité, et de lui avoir volé douze billets de banque, ou environ, de la valeur d'une livre sterling chacun, ou d'avoir aidé, assisté ou participé au dit assaut et au dit vol, le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au rapport du chef de police de la paroisse de St. Ouen et aux actes de la Cour à ce sujet; et le quel François Le Brocq, fils Edouard, a été endité criminellement sur la dite accusation, comme paroît par acte en date de l'an 1833, le 26e jour de Septembre, convenu à l'instance du Procureur Général du Roi, pour ouir le rapport des hommes de la grande enquête du pays, dont il a démandé le bénéfice, et voir ensuite ordonner par justice sur la dite accusation.

De la paroisse de St. Ouen :—

Monsieur Hélier Vibert.

Actionnés par le dit Sieur Procureur Général du Roi pour passer comme hommes de la grande enquête du pays, à la charge ou décharge du dit François Le Brocq, fils Edouard, sur la dite accusation. Les hommes de la grande enquête ont été dûment assermentés, comme en tel cas est réquis et accoutumé; l'accusation a été lue au dit prisonnier; et il a sur ce plaidé et fait sa déclaration, qui a été rédigée par écrit et logée au greffe. Lecture a été donnée des dépositions des témoins, çi-devant rédigées par écrit et logées au greffe, et des autres pièces de la procédure. Le dit prisonnier a été entendu en sa défense par le moyen de son avocat; et le Procureur Général du Roi a été sur ce ouï. Les hommes de la grande enquête se sont rétirés, avec les pièces de la procédure, pour délibérer dans le particulier; et, étant de retour et à un accord, ils ont fait leur rapport à la justice, par le moyen de leur chef, que le dit François Le Brocq est plutôt coupable qu'innocent del' assaut et du vol dont il est accusé, mais sans maltraitemens. En suite de quoi, le dit prisonnier ayant été entendu en mitigation par le moyen de son avocat, la Cour, faisant droit aux conclusions du dit Sieur Procureur Général du Roi, et considérant les circonstances atténuantes qui ont accompagné la commission du crime, a condamné et condamne le dit François Le Brocq à un emprisonnement solitaire d'un an, et, à l'expiration du dit emprisonnement, à être banni de cette île, pour le terme et espace de sept ans, sans pouvoir y revenir pendant ce temps, sur peine d'une punition plus grève. Et tous les biens, meubles et héritages du dit François Le Brocq demeurent acquis et confisqués au Roi, ou au Seigneur auquel il appartiendra. Et a le greffier délivré au dit Edouard Le Gresley l'argent et les effets logés au greffe dans cette poursuite.

2831. He was a native, was not he?—Yes.

2832. Looking through the Acts of the Court or the annals of the Prison, do you find that it has been a common punishment to inflict upon natives, during the last ten or twelve years, that of banishment?—Lately natives have not been banished the Island; I think not since the change in the Poor Law system in England. The authorities in England have been much more strict in sending them back again since that change; but, before that, natives, as well as English, indiscriminately, were banished. I have known an instance of a native of the Island banished returning twice; and, after returning a second time, he was sent back, and forbidden to return on pain of its being made a capital crime. I believe, however, he did return: the sentence was not put into execution: he was sentenced to death; but, on a petition to the King in Council, the sentence was commuted into seven years' transportation; and he subsequently obtained a pardon. The Court had no alternative but to sentence him to death.

2833. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) You have no distinct punishment for embezzlement, except as a species of larceny, have you?—No.

2834. I think you have no general head of Frauds in your law, have you?—No; but they are punished.

2835. Supposing the case of Concealment of his goods by a bankrupt?—In that case, there is a special punishment by a law of the island, confirmed by the King and Council. It is the law of the 19th of January, 1832: "Sur les Décrets." The following are Articles 45 and 46.

Article 45. Quiconqne, étant prisonnier pour dette, ou ayant remis son bien entre les mains de la justice, détériorera, ou fera détériorer, aucune partie de ses biens, sera puni d'un emprisonnement de trois mois, au moins, et de deux ans, au plus. Quiconque l'assistera à faire les dites détériorations, sera puni d'un emprisonnement de trois mois, au moins, et de deux ans, au plus, et sera en outre obligé de réparer le dommage causé.

Article 46. Quiconque, étant à la veille de perdre un héritage dans un décret, détériorera, ou fera détériorer aucune partie de cet héritage, sera puni d'un emprisonnement de trois mois, au moins, et de deux ans, au plus, et sera, en outre, obligé de réparer le dommage causé. Quiconque l'assistera à faire des détériorations, sera passible des mêmes peines.

2836. In the case of obtaining goods by personation of another person, what is the punishment?—There is a special punishment for that: it would be obtaining goods "frauduleusement, sur faux prétextes."

JERSEY.

Mr. Hammond.

18 September, 1846.

2837. There is no special law of Burglary, is there, except as a circumstance attending the Vol?—No.

2838. You have a law as to Arson, have you not?—Yes.

2839. Do you think "les Ardeurs" is confined to persons burning houses?—I think so.

2840. A stack, you think, would not be included in it?—I think not.

2841. You have the crime of Forgery, have not you?—Yes.

2842. Would you confine Forgery to the case of a deed?—No. Persons have been punished here for forging a bank note. Any kind of Forgery, in fact.

2843. Suppose I wrote a letter in your name to a man?—That would be a forgery.

2844. Whatever the subject of the letter?—Yes.

2845. In the case of an invitation to dinner, for instance?—No: there must be some criminal intention in a Forgery.

2846. Must it be a fraud?—Yes.

2847. A pecuniary fraud?—A fraud upon property.

2848. In the case of forging a receipt to avoid payment of a debt?—Yes.

2849. You think the distinction between Murder and Homicide was authorized from the earliest times, from your finding them distinctly mentioned in the Coustumier?—Yes.

2850. (To Mr. Hammond.) In the case of Jollin, who murdered his father, your attempt was to reduce it to manslaughter, was not it?—Yes.

2851. That was when Sir Thomas Le Breton was bailiff?—Yes.

2852. Your argument, I believe, was principally derived from English books?—Yes.

2853. You relied upon the fourth Institute, I believe; and Mr. Le Breton quoted against you a passage from Blackstone, which is a transcript from Hale?—I cannot remember what were the books quoted; but I believe I relied mainly upon English books.

2855. How many Bailiffs have you practised under?—I practised under Sir Thomas Le Breton as Lieutenant Bailiff of Lord Carteret. I remember hearing Mr. Le Couteur plead a cause as an advocate, before he was Solicitor-General: and I remember his quoting largely from an English author at that time.

2856. Do you recollect the year of Jollin's trial?—In 1829.

2857. What would you do in the case of a man who set fire to a wheat-stack?—I know of no case where a wheat-stack was set fire to. I suppose he would be prosecuted for setting fire to a wheat stack, and he would be punished in the discretion of the Court. Arson would be punishable with death; but I do not think burning a wheat-stack would come within that.

2858. It would be a malicious injury to property, which the Court would take notice of and punish, according as, in its discretion, it thought justice and equity required?—Exactly.

2859. Is Mayhem ever punished, except as a violent assault?—I have no recollection of its being punished, except as a violent assault. I know no case where a man has lost his limb.

2860. Mr. Dupré. There was a case of a man knocking out another's eye by firing a gun: the enditement found him Not guilty.

2861. Can you say what would have been the conclusion of the Attorney General?—I should think imprisonment with hard labour.

2862. Would it be treated as an Assault simply, or as the crime of Mayhem?—He simply fired at him. The custom of the island is, if a person marries, for his friends and neighbours to go and fire round his house. In this case, the neighbours went to perform this ceremony. The father of the bride got very angry, and was accused of firing over a hedge at the people. The shot struck the eye of one of the men, and the person was tried in consequence.

2863. Did the accusation lay an attempt to kill?—I think it did.

2864. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. The following is the Act of Court in that case.

The same is read as follows.

"L'an mil huit cent quarante-trois, le dix-septième jour de Mai. * * * * Edouard Touzel et Messrs. Philippe Richard Touzel et Clement Le Neveu, ses cautions, le dit Edouard Touzel sous accusation d'avoir, dans la nuit de Samedi 1er à Dimanche 2e October 1842, ou vers ce tems là, tiré un coup de fusil chargé à plomb sur Mr. Francis Pike, lorsque le dit Pike était dans le chemin public proche la maison du dit Edouard Touzel en la paroisse de St. Clément; par quel coup de feu le dit Pike fut atteint et grièvement blessé à l'œil gauche et à l'épaule; le tout selon que plus au long et contenu au Rapport du connétable de la paroisse de St. Clément, et aux Actes de la Cour à ce sujet, convenu à l'instance de l'Avocat, stipulant l'Office de Procureur Général de la Reine pour ouir le Rapport des hommes de l'enditement de la paroisse de St. Clément sur la dite accusation, Messieurs Jean Averty, centenier, George Jean Pirouet, François Roissier Junr., Richard Filleul, Philippe Le Rougetel, Josué De Rue, Thomas Clément Junr., Philippe Manger Junr, Philippe Filleul, William Baal Arthur, Thomas Touzel Jun., Jean Le Neveu, fils Clément, Philippe Payn, actiounés par le dit Sieur Advocat, stipulant l'office de Procureur Général de la Reine, pour passer comme hommes d'Enditement à la charge ou décharge du dit Edouard Touzel sur la dite accusation. L'accusation a été lue au dit prévenu; et il a sur ce plaidé, et fait sa déclaration, qui a été rédigée et logée au Greffe. Lecture a été donnér des dépositions des témoins, ci-devant rédigées et logées au Greffe, et des autres pièces de la procédure. L'accusé a été entendu en sa défense par le moyen de son Avocat; et l'Avocat, stipulant l'office de Procureur Général de la Reine, a été oui. Les hommes de l'enditement se sont retirés, avec toutes les pièces de la procédure, pour conférer dans le particulier; et, étant de retour, ils on fait leur Rapport à la justice: savoir, un nombre plus que suffisant d'entr'eux, qu'ils croient en leurs consciences que l'accusé est plutôt innocent que coupable de l'accusation. Partant, conformément aux conclusions du dit Sieur Avocat, stipulant l'Office de Procureur Général de la Reine, il a été déchargé de l'accusation et libéré de son cautionnement."

2865. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) As to Assaults, does not the intent of the assault form a part of the specific accusation?—The intention would be put down.

2866. Might the enditement affirm the Assault and negative the intent?—Yes.

2867. Supposing they found the whole, what would be the conclusion of the Attorney General?—Imprisonment.

2868. With capital punishment?—No: the Court possibly would transport the offender.

2869. An Assault with intent to commit a Rape, for instance?—If the Rape was not committed, it would not be capital.

2870. In the case of an Assault laid with an intent to murder; would the punishment still be merely imprisonment?—I do not think, unless the man were murdered, it would be a capital punishment.

2871. Do you recognize a specific class of offences in cases where the act, if carried into effect, would have been Murder, or Grievous bodily harm?—The punishment would vary.

2872. Are not those aggravated Assaults distinguished only by being triable by an enditement instead of being disposed of by the Court?—They would be distinguished by their punishment, and, naturally, by the form of the accusation. An assault need not be of that very grievous nature for the man to go before the enditement. Grievous bodily harm, without the intention of killing the person, would go before the enditement.

2873. An Assault with intent to commit a Rape, an Assault with intent to commit murder, or to maim, would be Assaults with intent to commit a felony; but an Assault to do grievous bodily harm would not be an assault with intent to commit a felony?—No: but still that would go before an enditement.

2874. What would be the case with respect to a felo de se?—I think that is, in practice, set aside, because the jury always find that the man destroyed himself when he was mad.

2875*a*. But the law is not altered?—No: a man would forfeit his chattels.

2875*b*. Did you ever know an instance of Assault de charrue?—No.

2876*a*. Should you treat it as a common Assault?—Yes.

2876*b*. Mr. Marett. All crimes committed félonieusement were crimes which were triable by wager of battle. Félonie, in the Coustumier, signifies an offence done by a vassal to his feudal lord, or a crime committed by another person with violence; but Felony, in the English sense of the word, is not to be found at all in the Coustumier. There was this distinction between Félonie and Larcin: that Félonie might be compounded before battle, whereas Larcin and Treason could not.

2877. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). The following is from Rouillé.

" L'en fait suyte d'assault et de paix brisee en diverses manieres selon la diuersite des lieux. Car len suyt dessault de charue, et d'assault de chemin, de assault de maison, de assault de champ. Les suytes en sont toutes faictes en vne maniere: mais que len nõme les lieux ôu l'assault fut faict; et si conuient monstrer le mesfaict du corps et le sang ou il y ait peril de mort on de mehaing. La plaincte doibt ainsi estre faicte. Je me plaing de D. qui'en la paix de Dieu et du Duc me assaillit felonneusement a ma charue en aguet pourpeuse et me fist ce sang et ceste playe que je monstre à la justice."

2878. In the case of an offence of the sort contemplated, the corpus delicti would be the injury to the man's person, and the other would be a circumstance of aggravation?—Exactly.

2879. In case of False Imprisonment, should you treat that as an Assault, or is there any specific punishment for it?—There is no specific punishment: but I know of no instance of a person having prosecuted another criminally for that.

2880. Would it be made a cause en ajonction?—Or an action for damages.

2881. Is the Abduction of women a specific offence?—No: it would be an Assault.

2882. Mr. Marett. Terrien speaks of that, under the head of " rapt," as being distinguished from Rape.

2883. The language of the Coustumier as to Rape is " despucellement de femmes à force." Of course the crime would not be confined to that now, would it?—No.

2884. Would the fact that the woman was a person of bad character, a prostitute, prevent a person being punished for violating her?—No.

2885. Mr. Hammond. Terrien makes a difference as to the punishment in that case.

2886. Do you recognise a legal distinction as to that now?—I believe not.

2887. Unnatural crimes are provided for by an order in Council?—Yes, on the ground that there was no law.

2888. In the case of Coining?—We have tried Coining in the Island lately: when it was Treason, we could not try it.

2889. Did it cease to be Treason here, when it ceased to be Treason in England?—I suppose so.

2890. Mr. Dupré. I think it has never been tried here since it was made no longer Treason by enactment.

2891. Is that Act registered here?—No; I do not think it is.

2892. As to Uttering bad money, knowing it to be bad, that of course has always been tried here?—Yes.

2893. Have you any head under which you put that offence?—No; it is treated as a fraud against the party.

2894. How is it punished?—Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. It is punished in the same way as Forgery was.

2895. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). It would be punished by imprisonment.

2896. How would Having weights which are false, or which the Vicomte has not stamped, be punished?—There is a law as to that in page 259 of the code of 1771.

JERSEY.

Mr. Hammond.

18 September, 1846.

2897. Seditious Meetings or Seditious Publications: have you any law as to them?—There is the law which has been already referred to as to Tumultuous and Seditious Meetings. The preamble is as follows.

"Considéré que plusieurs écrits anonymes et incendiares, tendant à exciter la haîne des habitants de cette Ile contre les autorités constituées, à les animer à la sédition et à la révolte, et les encourageant à massacrer les Magistrats, et à suivre d'ailleurs l'exemple du peuple Français, ont été depuis quelque temps répandus dans le public: Considéré que plusieurs de ces écrits anonymes exhortent le peuple à des rassemblemens, et indiquent des moyens pour agir de concert afin de mettre en exécution les horribles et sanguinaires menaces contenues dans ces écrits: Considéré que depuis que ces écrits ont paru, il s'est manifesté des dispositions, et des mesures même ont été prises, pour des rassemblemens illicites et alarmans: et considéré que les lois existantes ne suffisent pas pour prévenir, réprimer et punir efficacement des attentats si dangereux à la société: Les Etats, dans la vue de conserver l'ordre et la tranquillité publique, et protéger les honnêtes et paisibles habitans de ce déréglement funeste, ont jugé nécessaire, dans ces circonstances urgentes, de proposer et adopter les Articles suivans, pour avoir force de loi dans ce pays, et y être observés, moyennant la Sanction de Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil. Partant les Etats très humblement supplient Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil d'accorder son approbation Royale aux Articles suivans, afin qu'ils ayent force de loi dans ce pays, et y soient observés, jusqu'à ce que par la même autorité, il soit jugé convenable de les rappeler ou changer. Desquels Articles la teneur ensuit."

2898. (To Mr. Dupré.) Have you any general law as to Sedition? For instance, as evinced by speaking or writing?—We have no law; but persons have been prosecuted for it.

2899. What would you do in such cases?—They would be tried by the enditement.

2900. What would the charge and the punishment be?—They would be tried for Sedition, and punished by fine or imprisonment, or both.

2901. With deportation?—Most likely not, unless it came under the law of 1797. By the oaths taken by several of the officers, they are bound to prosecute for Sedition.

2902. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix.—I have here an entry of a prosecution for Sedition.

The same was read as follows:

"John Jefferson Davis, natif de l'Isle de Wight, convenu à l'instance du Procureur Général de la Reine pour ouir dépot d'informateurs sur l'accusation qui lui est faite en consequence du Rapport du connétable de la paroisse de St. Sauveur, d'avoir, le Dimanche le 19e jour de Juin 1842, ou vers ce tems là, tenu des propos séditieux, criminels et méprisants touchant la personne et le Gouvernement de Notre Souveraine Dame Victoria, Reine de la Grande Bretagne et de l'Irlande, en disant et déclarant en langue Anglaise, en parlant de, et faisant allusion à, John Francis, lequel a été trouvé coupable de Haute Trahison en Angleterre, que c'était dommage qu'il (le dit Francis) n'eût point tué la Reine. "It is a pity that he (Francis) did not shoot the Queen:" Plus, en disant et déclarant aussi, en langue Anglaise, en parlant et faisant allusion au dit John Francis que le Jury n'aurait pas dû le trouver coupable, "That the Jury ought not to have found him guilty:" Plus, en disant et déclarant aussi en langue Anglaise, nous n'avous pas besoin d'une Reine, l'Angleterre serait mieux sans Reine, nous devrions être gouvernés par un Président comme en Amerique, ce serait une économie pour la nation, et cet argent pourrait être donné pour la nourriture des pauvres," "We don't want a Queen, England would be better without a Queen, we ought to be governed by a President, as in America, it would be a saving to the nation, and the money might be given to feed the poor," ou d'avoir dit et prononcé des propos et paroles ayant ce sens et significations, les dits propos et paroles constituant un délit grave contre la personne et le gouvernement de notre dite Souveraine Dame Victoria, suivant l'acte de la Cour en date de l'an 1842 le 27e jour de Juin: Mr. James Caple à la cause à informer. Le dit James Caple a déposé par serment, et sa déposition a été rédigeé et logée au Greffe. Ensuite de quoi le dit John Jefferson s'étant avoué coupable du crime dont il est accusé, et s'étant soumis à la justice, la Cour oui le Procureur Général de la Reine en ses conclusions, a condamné le dit John Jefferson Davis à subir un emprisonnement et un travail forcé de trois mois; et injonction lui a été faite de se conduire à l'avenir d'une manière convenable, sur telle peine qu'il appartiendra."

2903. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate). Have you any law as to Unlawful Oaths?—No.

2904. How should you punish that offence?—I do not know.

2905. It would be treated as a crime, would not it?—I know no example of an unlawful oath having been administered in the Island: therefore I cannot say how it would be treated.

2906. With regard to the offence of Breaking Prison, is there any particular offence of that kind in the laws of Jersey?—No; there would be a punishment for it.

2907. What offence would it be?—Bris de prison.

2908. What would be the punishment attached to it?—Imprisonment and hard labour: it would be that, added to the punishment they would have incurred for the crime they had committed.

2909. If a person in prison for three months with hard labour were to break prison, how would he be punished?—He would be punished, in the discretion of the Court, with imprisonment and hard labour.

2910. Would it be tried as a crime by the enditement?—No; I think it would be tried by the Court.

2911. Mr. Dupré. There is an article in the code of 1771, which applies to Prison Breaking.

"Conformément à l'ordre du Conseil de 1635, le 12 Juin, ceux qui seront accessoires en crimes de meutre, ou qui en félonie, après le crime commis, recevront ou favoriseront les coupables avant leur conviction, ou qui emporteront ou favoriseront l'évasion des coupables hors de l'Isle, après que proclamation aura été faite de les appréhender; et ceux qui briseront la prison, ou assisteront tels délinquants, seront punis par amende et emprisonnement."

2912. Has the offence of Returning from Transportation ever occurred in this country?—No; I have no knowledge of any case.

2913. I think I understood that, in case of a banished person returning before the period of his banishment expires, he is considered to be liable to incur the punishment attached to the crime for which he was banished?—I could not say that.

2914. What punishment would attach?—At the discretion of the Court, imprisonment.

2915. Mr. Hammond. There is a case which would illustrate our mode of proceeding, before the present mode was adopted of transporting for life. A man named Sandford, in 1820, was tried and convicted: he was sentenced to be banished for seven years, under pain of a greater punishment in case of returning before his banishment expired. In April 1821, he was brought up for returning before the expiration of the period of his banishment. He had been, first of all, scourged. He was then scourged avec grande effusion de sang; and then he was banished under pain of death if he returned. He did return, and was punished with sentence of death: but the Court adds that, taking into consideration the circumstances of the case, they recommended him to mercy. I was then a young member of the bar; and the Bailiff requested me to send up a petition for the prisoner. The sentence was commuted into transportation for twenty years to a penal settlement. I believe that was one of the first instances of transportation from Jersey to a penal settlement. He was kept in the hulks, and subsequently was pardoned, and pleaded his pardon when he was again taken up here.

2916. Is there any particular punishment attached to perjury?—I know of no case where a man has been tried for perjury.

2917. Can you say at all what would be the punishment for perjury?—I know of nothing more than is laid down by Mr. Pipon.

2918. You are aware that in England it is a transportable offence?—Yes.

2919. Would a conviction for perjury render the person incompetent for ever as a witness?—Yes; but the law which has been sent for confirmation, and which the Commissioners have seen, I think, will destroy that.

2920. That law would restore competency after the punishment has been undergone?—Yes.

2921. How is Misconduct in an officer punished?—It is laid before the Court.

2922. In The case of Bribing an officer?—The Court would take cognizance of all those offences.

2923. Do you mean, as a contempt of justice?—No; the Queen's Procureur Général will prosecute them.

2924. He prosecutes in all cases?—Yes; it would be a public action on the part of the Procureur Général against the party who was a delinquent.

2925. Tried by the enditement, or decided by the Court?—Before the Court generally. There are some cases in which it would be tried by the enditement.

2926. (To Mr. Dupré.) Within your own practice, have you any instance of any officer of the Court being tried for misconduct in the discharge of his duty, or for accepting a bribe?—For misconduct, I have; not for receiving a bribe.

2927. Would it be tried before the enditement, or before the Court?—Bribery would be tried before the enditement, I should think. A simple case of Misconduct in a public officer would be tried, I should think, before the Court, without the enditement.

2928. How would a case of that sort originate?—A case before the enditement usually commences in the constable's Report.

2929. It would depend upon the manner in which the information was laid?—If it were laid by the constable, it would come on upon his Report. if the information was given to the Attorney General directly, it would be done by a process which we call a Représentation.

2929. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). There was a case in point; the Lieutenant Governor prosecuted me as constable.

2930. For alleged misconduct as constable?—Yes, and for writing a letter which he thought contemptuous. That was tried before the Court merely, though I tried to have it sent to a jury.

2931. Was it tried at the simple instance of the Procureur Général?—Yes. The Lieut. Governor wrote to the Procureur Général; and he made a représentation to the Court. I should say that I was acquitted. There was also the case of Mr. Nicolle; he was dismissed from office.

2932. Was that at the representation of the Procureur Général?—Yes: he was constable; and he had presided at a meeting which the Court declared to be illegal; that was under the law of 1797.

2933. Was that also tried before the Court?—Yes.

2934. The Vicomte. I have here a prosecution, of the date of 1770, in which a vingtenier was discharged and punished for seditious language.

The same was read as follows.

" A La Cour Royale de L'Ile de Jersey.

L'an 1770, le 13$^{me}$ jour d'Aout, sur l'action du Pro$^{r}$ Gen$^{l}$ du Roi, vers Mr. Jean Robichon jun., un des vingteniers de la paroisse de St. Martin, saisi de fait et présenté en justice par le Député Vicomte en vertu de l'Acte de la Cour de l'an 1770, le 11$^{me}$ du courant, pour subir ce que justice trouvera propre, pour s'être servi de propos séditieux et menaçans à l'assemblée de la d$^{te}$ paroisse, tenue le 9$^{eme}$ de ce mois, ayant déclaré, en parlant de l'Ordonnance récemment faite pour les chemins, que cela occasioneroit une seconde révolte, et, en outre, que cet ordre là étoit un bougre d'ordre. Après l'aveu du dit Robichon, et sa soumisson à la Cour, oui le Proc$^{r}$ Gen$^{l}$ du Roi en ses conclusions, il demeure déchargé de la place de vintenier et d'officier du con$^{ble}$, condemné à l'amende de deux cents livres d'ordre, applicable tiers au Roi, tiers à la réparation de la cohue royale, et l'autre tiers à l'Hôpital Gen$^{l}$, et à démander pardon à Dieu, au Roi, à Mons. le Commandant et Chef, et à la justice, ce qu'il a présentement effectué, et à donner caution de son bon et paisible comport, et envoyé en prison au pain & à l'eau pour l'espace de quinze jours, étant défendu au geolier de lui administrer d'autres alimens: en suite de quoi a produit Mr. Jean Carter sen., pour sa caution, lequel y est demeuré accordamment."

2935. How would a case of Riot be tried?—Under the law of 1797.

2936. With regard to a person Breaking forcibly into a house with a view of taking possession of it?—That would be punished by the Court, or he would have a civil remedy, if he chose.

2937. By Clameur de Haro?—That would prevent a person coming in at all; if the person inside called out "Haro," that would prevent the other entering.

2938. Suppose he did enter, notwithstanding, what would be the consequence?—Then he would be punished more severely.

2939. Disobedience to the Clameur would itself be a crime?—Yes.

2940. In civil matters, is Clameur de Haro a common mode of proceeding now?—It is only adopted as to the possession of landed property.

2941. It is a common mode still, is it?—Yes; it is a common and a very summary mode; it has some advantages: it will apply to Term or to Vacation.

2942. In the case of Forcible Entry, would that be punishable by imprisonment?—Yes, or fine, according to the nature of the case.

2943. And so the non-obedience to a Clameur de Haro?—Yes.

2944. What is the technical form of taking possession of land after Clameur de Haro?—I have never known a case where a person has taken possession of a piece of ground after a Clameur de Haro. The moment a Clameur de Haro is called, proceedings are stayed.

2945. But, if a person does go on, he becomes guilty of a crime?—Yes.

2946. Is there any specific name for that crime?—He would be actionné by the Attorney General; and it would be called "Mépris de Haro."

2947. Mr. Le Sueur. There have been cases where a person has been fined for continuing work after a Clameur de Haro has been cried.

2948. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). There have been cases where persons have been very obstinate, and have gone on with it; and they have been fined.

2949. Can you give us the record of an instance of a condemnation for Mépris de Haro?

The same was produced, and is as follows.

L'an mil huit-cent vingt-trois, le vingt-unième jour d'Avril.

Sur l'action du Procureur Général du Roi et Mr. Francois Roissier, voisin et propriétaire de terre dans les environs de la commune du Hocqe, située en la paroisse de St. Clément, sur le fief de Samarés et en cette qualité ayant droit à la dite commune, ajoint, vers Jean Le Neveu, Esq., pour soubir l'amende du Clameur de Haro, que le dit ajoint fut dans la nécessité d'interjetter Jeudi, 19e jour d'Avril, 1821, lorsque le dit Sieur Le Neveu allait, sans aucun droit, faire ouvrir une tranchée dans la dite commune dans l'intention d'y faire ériger un mur, et se voir, le dit Sieur Le Neveu, condamner à telle autre peine ou amende, et à faire telle récompense au dit ajoint, que justice trouvera propre, suivant les prémisses; et ouir record du Député Vicomte, et dépôt de témoins, et droit et jugement sur les lieux, par devant le corps de la Cour, suivant l'acte à ce sujet, et suivant à l'appointement de la cause pour aujourd'hui, Philippe Godfray, Gent., Mr. Jean Feuvre, Junr., et Mr. Philippe Le Jeune, à la cause à témoigner. La justice a vu et considéré les lieux; les parties ont exhibé leurs tîtres et évidences, et ont été entendues en toutes leurs raisons et allégations, par le moyen de leurs avocats. Sur la prétention du défendeur que l'ajoint n'était point partie capable d'interjetter la Clameur de Haro, la Cour a trouvé bien jugé sur ce point par l'acte du 14e Mai, 1821, et mal appelé. De laquelle sentence le defendeur a été reçu á appeler en fin de cause, par devant Sa Très Excellente Majeste en Conseil. Le défendeur est ensuite convenu d'abandonner son appel sur l'autre point préliminaire, mentionné au dit Acte du 14e Mai, 1821, et que le dit ajoint a droit conjointement avec plusieurs des tenans du fief et Seigneurie de Samarés et des voisins de la dite commune à l'usufruit d'icelle; les dits témoins ont déposé par serment, et note a éte prise de leurs dépositions. Un bail à termage de la partie de la dite commune, qui est présentement enclose, au dit Mr. Philippe Le Jeune, daté le 6e Avril, 1821, et dont il est question dans sa déposition, a été logé au Greffe à la requête de l'ajoint, à fin qu'il puisse en avoir copie authentique à ses frais. Après quoi la Cour, oui le Procureur Général du Roi en ses conclusions, a jugé d'opinion unanime que le dit Mr. François Roissier doit être maintenu à l'avenir dans son droit d'usufruiter à la dite commune, comme d'ancienneté: partant le dit Jean Le Neveu, Esq., a été condamné à l'amende de Clameur de Haro, et à payer au dit ajoint un dédommagement de cent livres d'ordre, et aux frais. Et ayant paru que le dit Jean Le Neveu, Esq., a continué l'ouvrage qu'il avait entrepris sur la dite commune après que la dite clameur avait été interjetté, il a été pour ce fait condamné à une amende de cent livres d'ordre, instance du dit Sieur Procureur Général du Roi. Cette sentence, en ce qui a rapport au dédommagement accordé au dit François Roissier, a été prononcée par la majorité des opinions. De laquelle sentence, en ce qui régarde Mr. François Roissier, le dit Jean Le Neveu, Esq., a été reçu à appeler par devant Sa Très Excellente Majesté en Conseil. Vû lequel appel, l'ajoint a été reçu à protester pour toutes pertes, préjudices, intérêts et dommages. Et sont Messrs. Jean Mounamy, Junr. et Charles Coutanche, demeurés pleiges du dit appelant, tant de la poursuite du dit appel dans le tempts permis en loi, que de l'amende, coûtages et dépendances, s'obligeant, le dit appelant, indemniser ses dits pleiges sur tous ses biens meubles et héritages présens et futurs.

2950. In that case, would proceedings be instituted by the Attorney General?—Yes; but sometimes it happens that they go on with the proceedings, and, when the judgment is given, they take both the case and the contempt together.

2951. Mr. Dupré. The case could be brought on by the Attorney General, independently of the civil suit.

2952. Is it made usually a cause en ajonction?—Yes; it is always made so. In case a person cries "Haro" improperly, he is fined.

2953. If you cry Haro, being in the wrong, you subject yourself to a fine?—Yes.

2954. If you are in the right, the defendant is fined?—Yes.

2955. Supposing a person stops the moment Haro is cried?—Then the original case is tried.

2956. Any thing is considered to be a crime which makes the cry of Haro necessary?—Yes.

2957. Supposing a person were to Send a Letter to another, threatening him, or trying to provoke him to fight a duel, is that a criminal offence?—Yes; it is punished by the Court.

2958. With respect to Libel and Slander, they are heads of crime, and are cases mentioned by Pipon and Durell?—Yes.

2959. Is the distinction between Slander and Libel, of the one being words spoken and the other words written, known to your law?—You may take either a civil remedy, or ask the Attorney General to be joined in a cause en ajonction.

2960. If criminal at all, would it be a cause en ajonction?—If it were against a public functionary, it might be put en ajonction still, criminally. There was a case of that kind.

2961. What is the punishment in such a case?—I know of no case of a Libel against a public functionary in which a person has been found Guilty. There was one which went on for some time; but it was dropped. If it were a very grave matter, the party might be imprisoned.

2962. Was the case which you have alluded to tried by the Court?—I cannot say any thing about it. Mr. Dumaresq contends that it ought to have been tried before the enditement. It commenced as if an enditement was to be called; the enditement was never called; and they dropped the matter. There was no decision.

2963. Mr. Dupré. I think there is a case where a private individual brought an action for Libel which was tried before the enditement.

2964. Do you make this difference in your law between Slander and Libel, that Libel means injurious expressions written, and Slander injurious expressions spoken?—No; there is no such distinction. A cause en ajonction may lie for both. If it was a Libel, it might be by means of a remonstrance, or upon the application of the party; if the Procureur Général chooses to be a party to the case, he becomes one. In the other case, for mere words, it is a more summary proceeding; the party applies to the Procureur Général, who signs a bill en ajonction.

2965. A proceeding for Slander, supposing Slander to mean words spoken, as contradistinguished from written, is a proceeding more summary than the other?—Yes; the other must be by means of a Remontrance, setting forth the Libel and all the other facts which the party wishes to set forth.

2966. And then claiming the Attorney General to be joined with him?—Exactly.

2967. I understand you to say that there is no distinction between the two?—They are both tried in the same way: they are called "calomnie, défamation."

2968. Both in the case of a written and a spoken Libel?—Yes: in the case of spoken words it would put "or words having that sense or signification."

2969. In the passage from Rouillé, which is cited, he makes use of the word "laidenges" as being equivalent to defamation: does that apply to written and spoken defamation equally?—Yes.

2970. Besides fine and imprisonment, is there any apology made to the party injured?—Not always. According to the discretion of the Court, the amende honorable is made.

2971. Can the Court order it to be made?—Mr. Dupré: In case it is sought for.

2972. In what shape is that reparation put?—It is claimed, and the Court decide whether it shall be done or not.

2973. Does the Court prescribe the terms in which the réparation d'honneur is made?—No; I suppose he would say, "I am sorry," "I acknowledge I was wrong," or "You were right."

2974. I believe there was an old form called the "amende honorable?"—Yes.

2975. Mr. Hammond. There is one case in which the words to be used were prescribed.

2976. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). That is obsolete.

2977. The Vicomte. I have a case here with respect to the "amende honorable."

"A la Cour Royale de l' Isle de Jersey, L'an 1719, le 21e jour de May, Abraham Piton, qui fut envoyé prisonnier par Acte de l'an 1719, le 6e jour de May; pour avoir proféré plusieurs injures et calomnies contre la personne de l'honorable homme Robert Wilson, Ecur, Lieut. Gouverneur de cette Isle, dans le cimitière de la paroisse de Ste. Marie, au jour de Dimanche, et autres lieux, tendant à émouvoir le peuple à sédition; sur tout quoi la Cour (après avoir sur ce ouy les conclusions des gens du Roy) a condamné et condamne le dit Abraham Piton, considérant l'énormité du fait, à démander pardon à genoux à Dieu, au Roy, à la Justice, et à la partie offensée, et à se prendre par le nez, et à reconnoître qu'il avoit malicieusement menti, ce qu'il a effectué, et est de plus, le dit Piton, condamné à une amende qualifiée, qui sera applicable à la réparation de la prison, et en outre à retourner en prison pour être là détenu, les fers aux jambes, l'éspace d'un mois, au pain et à l'eau, pour être ensuite libéré."

2978. In the case of Smuggling, how do you take notice of that?—That is by an Act of Parliament.

2979. You have an impôt on brandy and wine, have not you?—Yes: and then there is a law protecting it. In all cases for Smuggling, there must be an Order in Council, or a Local Act confirmed by Her Majesty in Council. In the Smuggling Act it says the offences are to be tried before the Royal Court.

2980. That is, without the intervention of the enditement?—Yes, unless under the Smuggling Act there are cases, such as where a man struck an officer, in which case he would be tried by a jury. If it is for the recovery of fines, it would be always by the Court; and legally, I think, an appeal would be granted upon a condemnation.

2981. An appeal to the full Court?—Yes.

2982. Is that where the fine is above 5*l.*?—Yes. This appeal was a very modern practice. One case was carried to the Privy Council, in which the Privy Council decided that there was no appeal to them, but to the full Court. Since that, an appeal has been granted to the full Court.

2983. That order has always been acted on?—Yes.

2984. Is Bigamy an offence in this Island?—Yes.

2985. How is it punished?—Mr. Dupré. I do not think there is any case on record of that kind.

2986. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). There is one accused of that offence now, who will be brought before the Court to-morrow.

2987. What is the proof of marriage in this country?—By the persons who have assisted at the marriage. An extract from the register would prove the marriage; but you must identify the person too.

2988. If a person contracts marriage in England, is that a good marriage so as to prevent his taking a second wife in Jersey?—Yes, naturally, if he marries anywhere, so that it is a legal marriage.

2989. If it is a legal marriage according to the law of the country where it is contracted, that would be sufficient to render a person guilty of Bigamy who should marry a second wife in Jersey?—Yes.

2990. Do you allow foreign divorces as annulling the first marriage?—If a man was a foreigner, and there was a divorce in a competent Court, he could not be punished for marrying again, since he would be allowed to do so by the laws of his own country.

2991. In Turkey, for instance?—I do not know what kind of law there is there. I do not know what would be a divorce there.

2992. What constitutes a legal marriage in this country?—There is a law of 1841, which is registered, and is contained in the "Lois et Réglemens," regulating marriages.

2993. Is that as to what constitutes a marriage, or providing for the registration of a marriage?—What constitutes a marriage.

2994. Mr. Dupré. It is provided for also in the canons.

2995. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) Marriages are now regulated, are they, by this late Act?—Yes.

2996. Have you an offence similar to what in England we call Nuisance?—Here the constable would make a Report that there existed a Nuisance, and the party would be brought before the Court.

2997. Would keeping a brothel be a crime?—The constable would make a Report, and the person would be brought before the Court and punished; but it would not be under the word "Nuisance" that it would be abated; it would be merely stated that the person kept a brothel.

2998. So of a person exercising a trade which tended to destroy the health of the neighbours?—The constable would make a Report, or one of the parties would make a complaint to the Attorney General.

2999. Or a dangerous trade, like a manufactory of fireworks?—That would be the same. It was said, the other day, that, when a Report was presented, the Court ordered the person to be seized. It must not be supposed that in the meantime he is put in gaol; the officer takes bail for his appearance on that day.

3000. Is there any power, on the part of the authorities, not only to punish a Nuisance, if it may be so called, but to abate it?—The Court would condemn a person immediately to desist, and inflict a penalty if he did not.

3001. Would they inflict continual penalties till they succeeded?—If the person, after being ordered not to do it, continued to do it, it would become a contempt of the Court, and would be punished.

3002. Is there any specific head of crime for acts of Indecency, or indecent exposure of the person?—Persons are brought before the Court and punished.

3003. Summarily?—Yes.

3004. Is that under the general law?—Yes.

3005. There is no particular law of the States for it?—No.

3006. Is there any law against Gambling?—There is no law against it.

3007. Playing at cards or dice in taverns?—That enters into the law which has been recently passed. It is provided for by Article 9.

3008. Was there an old law applicable to it?—Yes; it is referred to in the code of 1771.

3009. Is the Soliciting the virtue of a woman a specific offence?—The person would be brought before the Court and punished.

3010. Mr. Dupré. There have been several instances of punishment for that.

3011. (To Mr. F. Godfray, Advocate.) Is the same the case as to Prostitution, as distinguished from Adultery?—They are to be brought before the Court; paillards and putains, by the oath of the constable, are to be brought before the Court.

3012. Are not there some Game Laws in the Island?—Yes; they are contained in the Code of 1771, page 28. Most of the lords of manors have not prosecuted for offences against them; but there was an instance of a prosecution last term.

3013. What is the Droit de chasse?—The Jurats, the crown officers, and the lords of manors possess it. By the 3rd Article of the New Code, a person may destroy game on his own land.

3014. Is Adultery now considered as a crime?—Yes; punished by imprisonment and hard labour.

3016. Is it a crime on the part of both the husband and the wife?—It was formerly the case that a man might be prosecuted for Adultery; but I have known no case lately.

3017. Are there recent instances of any punishment for Adultery?—Yes; there was one punished by imprisonment four or five years ago, which I brought before the Court.

3018. Was that a proceeding upon the Report of a constable?—Yes; I entered a Report, as constable of St. Martin's, at the request of the husband.

3019. Is it a proceeding by enditement?—I think the person might claim to go before the enditement; but in that case he submitted.

3020. Was that a conviction of a man for Adultery?—I think the man and the woman were both brought before the Court.

3021. You say they were punished by imprisonment?—Yes.

3022. There is an order made by the Royal Commissioners, under Queen Elizabeth, on this subject, cited by Pipon and Durell, page 13, of their statement;* is that considered now to be law?—It has always been questioned whether the decisions of the Royal Commissioners of 1591 have ever been law.

3023. They appear to have never received the sanction of the Privy Council?—No: sometimes they have been invoked by the Royal Court in their quarrels with the States: but they have never been registered; nor is there any trace of their being confirmed by the Privy Council.

3024. Is Incest considered as a crime?—It is.

3025. Between what degrees of relationship can Incest be committed?—I think in the direct line.

3026. In the collateral line, between brother and sister, also?—Yes: it might go to the case of niece and uncle; but I know of no case of it.

3027. How would a case of Incest be punishable now?—I suppose, if it were in the direct line, it would be death. There was a case where a step-father was accused of incest with his step-daughter.

The entry of the case was read as follows.

"Thomas John Beaugie, vers lequel prise de corps fut décernée par acte de l'an 1823, le 25e jour de Septembre, émané sur un Rapport du connétable de la paroisse de St. Martin, exposant que, en conséquence d'une information de Philippe Le Gallais, Ecuyer, tuteur des enfans de feu le Révérend Charles Le Touzel, que Caroline Le Touzel et Eliza Le Touzel, deux de ses pupilles, étaient enceintes à Mr. Thomas John Beaugie, leur beau père, il avoit fait des récherches pour s'assurer de la personne du dit Beaugie, mais qu'il n'avoit pu le trouver; le tout selon que plus au long est contenu au dit Rapport: et le dit Thomas John Beaugie, sous accusation d'avoir séduit Caroline Le Touzel et Elizabeth Margueritte Le Touzel, filles mineures du dit feu le Réverénd Charles le Touzel, et de Dlle. Marie Barbenson, sa femme en premières noces, la dite Barbeuson etant, au temps de la dite séduction, femme du dit Beaugie, et d'avoir, le dit Thomas John Beaugie, eu un commerce incestueux avec les dites Caroline Le Touzel and Elizabeth Marguerite Le Touzel, ses belles filles; le tout selon que plus au long est contenu aux actes en date de l'an 1823, le 25e jour de Septembre et du 14me Juin, 1825, convenu à l'instance du Procureur Général du Roi pour ouir le Rapport des hommes de l'enditement de la paroisse de St. Martin sur les dites accusations, Monsr. Philippe Godfray, connétable, Monsr. Philippe Nicolle, Monsr. George Asplet, Mr. George Payn, Mr. Phil Messervy, Mr. Timothée Mourant, Mr. Charles Le Boutillier, Mr. Jean Messervy, Jun., Mr. George Picot, Mr. Edouard Elie Le Sauteur, Mr. Phil. Billot, Mr. Phil. Du Fresne, Junr., et Mr. George Vardon, Junr., actionnés par le dit Sieur Procureur Général du Roi, pour passer comme hommes d'enditement à la charge au décharge du dit Thomas John Beaugie sur les dites accusations. L'accusation a été lue au dit prisonnier; et il a sur ce plaidé et fait sa déclaration, qui a été rédigé par écrit et logée au Greffe. Lecture a étè donnée des dépositions des témoins ci-devant rédigées par écrit et logées au Greffe, et des autres pièces de la procédure. Le dit prisonnier a été entendu en sa défense par le moyen de son avocat; et le Procureur Général du Roi a été sur ce oui. Les hommes de l'enditement se sont retirés avec les pièces de la procédure pour conférer dans le particulier, et, étant de retour et à un accord, ils ont fait leur Rapport à la justice par le moyen du dit Monsr. Philippe Godfray, qu'ils croient, en leurs consciences, que le dit Thomas John Beaugie est plutôt coupable qu'innocent du crime dout il est accusé. Ensuit de quoi le dit Thomas John Beaugie s'étant soumis à la justice, la Cour, conformément aux conclusions du dit Sieur Procureur Général du Roi, a condamné et condamne le dit Thomas John Beaugie à subir un emprisonnement de six mois, dont les derniers huit jours seront au pain et à l'eau, à une amende de cinquante livres sterling envers le Roi, et aux frais, et, après l'expiration du dit emprisonnement, il demeure banni de cette Ile pour le terme de cinq ans, avec défense d'y retourner durant le dit terme sur une plus grande peine."

3028. You think, in strictness, Incest would be punished, if in the direct line, by death?—Yes; but it is very unlikely that it would be so.

* By Ordinances of the Royal Commissioners under Queen Elizabeth, dated 3rd April, 1591, Article 32, it is provided that adultery, be it man or woman, who shall be thereof convicted, shall be imprisoned for the space of three weeks, and during that time shall be publicly punished in the market-place, by being put in the stocks from nine of the clock in the morning to three in the afternoon, and shall afterwards be whipped to the effusion of blood; provided nevertheless that if it should happen to any of the members of the States, or any other person of reputation, it shall rest in the power and discretion of justice to commute the corporal punishment into a pecuniary fine, which shall amount to the value of one year's income of such a person, payable in two different years, by equal portions: and forasmuch as several have gone unpunished for want of due order having been observed in the convicting of them, it is ordered that from henceforth, when any person shall be legally accused, and not having been taken in the fact, shall not confess, such person shall be formally indicted according to the usual form of enditements; that if thereby found guilty, he doth submit for his acquittal upon a lawful enquête of 24 men; or otherwise he shall suffer close imprisonment for the full space of six months. And as to fornicators they shall be punished by the stocks on several market days, or by fine at the discretion of the bailly and justice, save notwithstanding in regard to such lewd women as shall be reputed public strumpets, or who have been before punished who shall be whipped, and if they continue shall be for ever banished from the said island.

JERSEY.

Mr. Hammond.

18 September, 1846.

3029. And in cases not in the direct line?—Yes; by imprisonment.

3030. Mr. Marett. It appears from "Terrien," p. 482, that a person was found guilty of Adultery upon the accusation of a third party, and convicted. He afterwards appealed, and was acquitted; and his costs were granted him against the promoteur. I should consider that that would be in some measure binding upon us now. The index says, "Adultérie en Normandie, non punissable par la coustume s'il n'y a plainte formée par l'une des parties mariées."

3031. Is Usury punishable as a crime?—Yes; by the code of 1771, at p. 128.

3032. What is the legal interest?—Five per cent.

3033. Has there been a recent case of Usury?—There has been one instance, in which the Court annulled the debt.

3034. (To Mr. Le Breton.) The Commissioners understand that a Report was presented, in the case of some proceedings, by a Mr. Brown against Falle, for embezzlement. What was done upon it?—I refused to enter the Report. I have not all the circumstances in my mind now; but I know that I considered it well. Mr. Le Sueur wished me to enter a Report, and pressed me very much to enter a Report; but, on a consideration of the case, and examining into the circumstances, I thought it was a civil matter, and not a criminal case.

3035. Mr. Le Sueur. I thought there was embezzlement in that case; and I suppose it will appear so on the face of the report.

The Report was read as follows.

A Messire Jean De Veulle, chevalier, Bailli, et à Messieurs les Jurés Justiciers de la Cour Royale de l'Ile de Jersey.

Lundi 1e Novembre 1841, Mr. Robert Brown me porta plainte, que Lundi, le 25 Octobre précédent, il avait chargé Mr. Elie Falle, qui était à son emploi, de recevoir plusieurs sommes d'argent, afin d'acquitter des arrérages de rentes que devait le dit sieur Brown, et qui devaient être payées au bureau de Hugh Godfray, Ecr., qu'en conséquence le dit Mr. Elie Falle avait reçu pour le compte du dit sieur Brown les sommes suivantes, savoir:

Ce qui avec une somme de 4*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* sterling que le dit sieur Falle avait précédemment entre mains faisait la somme de 191*l.* 8*s.* 8½*d.* ancien cours, égale à celle de cent soixante seize livres quatorze chelins deux pennys un farthing monnaie de la Grande Bretagne; que le dit sieur Falle prit les livres de quittances de Mr. Brown pour prendre des reçus des rentes qu'il allait payer, mais il les rapporta tôt après, et, Samedi le 30 Octobre, il dit qu'il n'avait pu payer ces rentes, le compte des frais n'étant pas préparé, mais qu'il les paierait le Lundi suivant. Dans la matinée de ce dernier jour Mr. Robert Brown s'étant aperçu que le dit Mr. Elie Falle, qui tenait une partie de ses livres, avait fait, le Vendredi et le Samedi précédents, diverses entrées qu'il avait antidatées, au crédit de son propre compte, pour les années 1839, 1840 et 1841, et de plus qu'il s'était débité sans le consentement ou la connaisance du dit Mr. R. Brown d'une somme de 89*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* stg. anciens cours, égale à celle de quatre vingt deux livres treize chelins six pennys stg. monnaie de la Grande Bretagne, comme reçue par lui du dit sieur Brown, et avait ainsi appliqué à son bénéfice partie de l'argent qu'il avait reçu et qu'il avait été chargé d'employer comme sus est dit, le dit Mr. Robert Brown me dit qu'il avait tout raison de croire que le dit Mr. Elie Falle voulait détourner à son profit partie de cet argent. Quelques jours après Mr. Robert Brown m'ayant confirmé cette plainte, et m'ayant informé que le dit sieur Elie Falle n'avait point payé les dites rentes, et qu'il refusait de rendre l'argent qu'il avait reçu, voulant retenir sur le montant diverses sommes qui ne lui étaient pas dues, je saisis le dit Mr. Elie Falle, en conséquence des faits ci-dessus rapportés. Samedi le 6 Novembre 1841, il me dit d'abord qu'il était tout prêt à me rendre l'argent qu'il avait reçu; que cet argent était à la campagne, mais qu'en allant au bureau de Hugh Godfray Ecr. il pourrait l'obtenir dans une dizaine de minutes. Le dit sieur Godfray, que Mr. Elie Falle avait envoyé chercher, étant arrivé, dit que le dit sieur Falle ne ferait pas cette chose, et qu'il resterait caution de le reproduire en Cour. En conséquence je pris le cautionnement du dit sieur Godfray de la reproduire toutes fois et quantes; et aujourd'hui je présente le dit Mr. Elie Falle en cour, afin qu'il en soit ordonné.

(Signé) P. Le Sueur, Cble. de St. Hélier.

Délivré en Cour Séante, ce jour de Décembre, 1841.

3036. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Did you obtain any evidence beside what is on the face of the Report?—I applied for information. Mr. Le Sueur was then the advocate of Mr. Brown, and conducted his business as his law agent, and of course I was not astonished at his pressing for my entering a Report; but I thought, and I still think, that there was no reason to attribute any dishonesty to Mr. Falle. Mr. Falle, I think, afterwards brought an action against Mr. Brown for a settlement of account, which is still pending, I believe.

3037. (Mr. Godfray, Advocate.)—The case is still pending as a civil cause before the Royal Court. Mr. Brown would not prosecute the cause, and it has been périmé, I think, twice.

3038. Are Mr. Brown or Mr. Falle party men?—Mr. Falle was Mr. Brown's clerk.

3038. Mr. Brown. I am no party man whatever.

3039. (To Mr. Brown.) Were you so then?—No. The greffier, just after the 29th of October, asked me for some rent, a rent of the same year that was due to him; I said, "Your son in law owes me three years' house rent, will you have the goodness to receive it of him?" He said, "No." I said, "Call next week and I will pay you your rent." Directly the greffier sends me a summons to court. The moment I saw what Judges were on the bench I was sure to be condemned, because these Godfrays will never let a cause come on unless the Judges are in their favour.

3040. Was this a civil case?—Yes. The next morning Mr. Hugh Godfray comes up and seizes my goods for rent, amounting to 145*l.* I said to my clerk, "What money have I here? I had so much." I said, "Go to such and such tenants and receive the remainder, and go and acquit the expenses of this rent." The Thursday he went. He said "I cannot ascertain the amount of the expenses, they are busy. I am to call tomorrow." That was Friday. On the Friday they put me off again. Mr. Falle told me that Mr. Hugh Godfray said it was not in their office, that it was in the greffier's office, and that he must go for the expenses. I said, "They are going to make an arrest on my goods, why do not you make haste and do it?" He said, "They have arranged that they shall not be touched so long as you pay it tomorrow."

3041. What the Commissioners wish to ascertain is this: did Mr. Falle deny to you his having received that money?—No.

3042. What right did he allege as entitling him not to give it you?—His excuse was, that he could not get the amonnt of the expenses which had been incurred.

3043. I understand your account to be, that he insisted upon claiming it to put it to his account, and you say he was not entitled to do so?—No; there was nothing due to him; he had been clerk to me for some time.

---

Mr. Charles De Ste. Croix further examined.

3034. There are some tenures here, are there not, which oblige parties to perform services connected with the criminal law?—Yes.

3035. Will you state what they are?—There are estates in the parish of St. Martin's, St. Saviour's, and Grouville, which are obliged to furnish escorts for the security of prisoners.

3036. What is the technical phrase for that tenure?—Le service de garde.

3037. How many do those estates furnish now?—From 160 to 180.

3038. Do they in fact furnish them?—Yes; it is now limited to guarding prisoners from the Court to the prison, and back to the grande enquête, and to capital executions. They formerly did so when persons were whipped from the court-house door to the door of what was the old gaol; but that punishment has been done away with of late years.

3039. Has the number of those tenures accumulated?—Every tenant in St. Martin's, on the Queen's fief, owes certain service. It has also been extended to St. Saviour's and Grouville. Every estate owed one guard. If the estate was divided into five different tenancies, every tenancy owed one guard, which would make five. A court was held, and prisoners were detained in early times in the Castle of Mont Orgueil, the castle being situated in the parish of St. Martin.

3040. They have some civil privileges, I suppose?—Yes.

3041. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). Formerly the whole of the parishes furnished service of guard. How it has all come to fall upon St. Martin's parish I cannot understand.

3042. Is that an advantage or not?—A disadvantage; they receive nothing for it.

3043. Mr. Charles De Ste. Croix. The service is not very onerous; they only come a few at a time.

Saturday, 19*th September*, 1846.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur further examined.

3044. I understood you to say, on a former day, that you thought some part of the objections to the present Police system, as regards the protection of life and property, might be met by the establishment of a night patrol?—Yes.

3045. Have you turned your attention to the source from which the payment for that might be provided?—Some portion from the States, I suppose, and a portion, perhaps, from the parish, by a rate or a tax upon houses.

3046. Have you turned your attention to the question, how far the extending that to the day would increase the expense?—I think it would increase it considerably; and at the same time the system would be very badly received by the inhabitants. With respect to a night-watch, it is true that some gentlemen have subscribed, and have a night-watch in their streets; but I am confident that in some cases it has been made a kind of speculation, and that persons who wanted to be employed as watchmen have given false alarms merely to get employment. As to the protection of property, some spouts were some time ago taken from the house of Messrs. Godfray and Gray, though one or two watchmen were walking up and down. There was another watchman on the pier when the door and part of the floor of a house were ripped up; and most of the things were found in the house occupied by one of the watchmen.

3047. You would say, probably, that the system of private watchmen is a very inefficient substitute for an organized Police?—Yes; and, as to having watchmen in every street, it is hardly possible, because this town is a very straggling town, and its extent is very large in proportion to its population. A few watchmen would patrol the principal streets, those in which the peace is more often interrupted.

3048. With the means of being summoned to the other streets, if required, by a proper organization?—Of course; but there is certainly a very strong feeling here against a paid Police. It would be a material alteration in our system. The Police must not be considered as exerting so much influence as is sometimes represented. The fact is, that now the Police in town is the stronger party in the parish assembly, and, I suppose, among persons that can be rated, and of course the other party must and does complain. In many of the parishes, however, the elections have been against the Police. The centeniers and constables have been elected against the majority of the Parish Assembly, of which the Police formed a portion. As to the influence of the Police of St. Helier's, it is not so much that the members of the Police have that influence; but the fact is that there are two parties in the Island. One party is composed of, or at least the leading men are, especially public functionaries holding important offices. The Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the Greffier of the Court, Mr. Hugh Godfray, the dénonciateur, a relation of his, Mr. François Godfray, advocate of the Court, who is also constable of St. Saviour's. They form a very compact and a very influential party; and it is not strange that in the election of Jurats people should prefer electing Jurats who are of the opposite party feeling, fearing to give to those gentlemen more influence, they having already so much in the offices which they hold.

3049. You would consider, probably, that this is essential to the existence of any powerful party?—Yes; but I should say that the dread of the other party now forms the strength of the Rose party. So that the fact, that there are so many Jurats who have been elected by Rose men, is not to be accounted for merely by the influence of the Police of St. Helier's.

3050. Most likely in St. Saviour's the Police would be of the Laurel party?—I am not acquainted with the local politics of the parish.

3051. Of course, the Commissioners' object is not to enquire into the merits of the parties, but distinctly to see whether there is a party for or against the Police, and, then, whether either party is powerful?—The influence which has been attributed to the Police is very considerable. The Police form part of the majority of the Parish Assembly in town; but they do not constitute that Assembly. I should add that there are only twenty eight persons in the Police of St. Helier's who are not Principaux, and that there are 376 Principaux altogether.

3052. Have you now the number of those who are Principaux, and who have been in the Police?—It would be impossible to ascertain that. Many gentlemen in town have been, many years back, members of the Police. Some of course, remain of the same party; others are of the opposite party.

3053. The complaint made is that the predominant party in every parish refuse to rate as Principaux their antagonists, whether the Police are Rose or Laurel, that their own party they rate as low as possible, so as just to make them Principaux, that their antagonists they rate as highly as possible?—Since the law does not give any power to the Parish Assemblies to ascertain what is the property of an individual, of course it gives a good deal of latitude. I am confident that, supposing the law was not altered, but that there were only Principaux in the Parish Assemblies, the rate would not be better made than it is now.

3054. Unless you got rid of party altogether?—Yes; which could hardly happen.

3055. Would not the influence of the Police, as a party, be the stronger, the smaller the parish?—I should think so. It would be stronger in the small parishes; and the more so that in the country parishes the Police are elected for seven years, while in St. Helier's it is only for four years. It would be a more permanent body.

3056. Would not the proportion of the Police to the Principaux also be greater in the small parishes?—Yes.

3057. I understood your answer just now to be, that you did not think the system was carried to the extent of just rating anybody they wish to vote at the lowest amount possible, while their antagonists were rated as high as possible; but is not that the tendency of the system?—That is almost entirely from party. As to the unjust apportionment of the rate in different parishes, it is not owing to the Police being members of the Parish Assembly, but owing to the bad state of the law.

3058. And to the influence of party?—Yes. Supposing the members of the Police were excluded entirely, the same state of things would exist. If the Police were the cause of all the arbitrary decisions of the Parish Assembly, we might exclude the Police, and everything would be right; but it is not so. It is very seldom that the Police is brought in contact with any persons who have taken any part in the political affairs of the island. It is more with the lower class, who are not rated.

3059. Now and then in cases of assault it happens, does not it?—Yes; it happens now and then in assault; but, of course, they are of very rare occurrence, and perhaps even would not occur so often if we had some law on Délits de la Presse. Persons here publish papers under fictitious names, or under the names of persons who have no property whatever, to screen themselves against actions for libels.

3060. They attack the Police, you think, from political motives?—Yes; they attack the Police, and they attack every one. With respect to the affair of Mr. Le Cras, who had been assaulted by Mr. Du Jardin, which is referred to in the evidence of Friday, the 11th, when I produced the letters I did not recollect precisely the circumstances of the case. I have been since reminded that Mr. Du Jardin had committed an assault on Mr. Abraham Jones Le Cras, I suppose a very trifling assault; but that Mr. Le Cras, the son, had taken the law into his own hands, and had assaulted Mr. Du Jardin; that, being less powerful, I suppose, than his antagonist, he came off the worse; and, although he may have had some mark on the face, as he had first attacked Mr. Du Jardin, I did not think it necessary to enter a Report.

3061. When did you ascertain the fact of its having been the consequence of a previous assault by him?—At the time.

3062. From whom?—From Mr. Du Jardin. Since Friday, I have been reminded of it.

3063. Did you ascertain it after Mr. Weston Le Cras had applied to you?—Yes.

3064. You would think it necessary to make an enquiry into his statement, I suppose?—Yes.

3065. And, in consequence of making that enquiry, you learned from Mr. Du Jardin what you have named?—Yes.

3066. You stated that you considered it your duty to enquire into the collateral circumstances of the case?—Yes; and in some cases to allow the party to have recourse to another remedy, which is that of a remonstrance in Court. At the same time, I must observe that I could not be actuated by any party motives, as Mr. Le Cras then gave his support rather to the Rose party, and Mr. Du Jardin belonged rather to the Laurel party.

3067. The Commissioners were informed that, not only in a case of assault, but in every case, it is the duty of the constable not to act upon the complaint of the party, but, before he makes a Report, to inquire into the circumstances of the case from third persons?—It is the general rule, and the duty, I believe, of constables and centeniers. They have, in fact, a kind of magisterial authority, not, perhaps, to give any decision or judgment in the case, but, as far as the first investigation is concerned, to make such an investigation, which is subject, of course, to the control of the Attorney General, and also of the chief magistrate. It is especially mentioned in the oath of the constable and the centenier.

3068. That they are to take cognizance of the orders of the Bailly, the Lieutenant Governor, and the Justices?—Yes.

3069. Are the Commissioners right in supposing that it is not the duty of the constable to act upon the mere complaint of the party, but that it is his duty to exercise a discretion?—Yes; if he did not, as the information is not given upon oath, it might be very unsatisfactory and imprudent to take the ex parte statement of the complainant.

3070. Must not you in any case end in doing that?—It is much easier afterwards to know who is in the wrong, after having heard the two parties, than after having heard one. It was said, the other day, that formerly a person was never put in gaol without having the committal of a magistrate before he was taken down to the gaol. By referring to the prison books it will be ascertained that even the Attorney General formerly gave committals, and that he has given a great many. It is entered in the prison books, "by order of the Attorney General."

3071. Mr. Le Breton. I have never given any.

3072. Mr. Le Sueur. There are also cases where the Sheriff has put persons in gaol for an assault.

3073. About what date would that be?—In 1829. I see, by the prison books, that John Lynch was put in prison for an assault: "by whose order;" "by order of the Sheriff:" "trial;" "none:" "liberated;" "April 10:" "by the Sheriff." But, no doubt, there are other cases, as the Sheriff and the Dénonciateur are also peace-officers, and of course can arrest parties who disturb the public peace.

3074. Deputy Vicomte. The Deputy Vicomte and the Dénonciateur have the power of committing to gaol without the warrant of a magistrate.

3075. Are they peace-officers?—Yes.

3076. Mr. Le Sueur. I have seen the Deputy Vicomte act, in his public capacity, to suppress a riot; and he had called out the soldiers of the guard. I have also seen Mr. Hugh Godfray, the Dénonciateur, take a person who had committed a breach of the peace in the square.

3077. Does the Dénonciateur take an oath?

3078. Mr. Hugh Godfray. He takes the same oath as the Vicomte.

3079. Does the Deputy Vicomte take an oath?—Yes; the same oath.

3080. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) In fact, the Vicomte, the Deputy Vicomte and the Dénonciateur have committed to prison on their own authority?—They have committed to prison. In some cases, it appears by the prison books that they have obtained the sanction of a magistrate. I am not aware whether they consider that they are obliged to do so.

3081. (To the Deputy Vicomte.) Do you consider that you are required to apply to the Bailiff or to the Jurats, previously to committing a man to prison?—No; I consider that the Vicomte, the Deputy Vicomte and the Dénonciateur have a right to preserve the peace by putting persons violating it in prison.

3082. In this entry in the prison books, to which Mr. Le Sueur has referred us, it appears that they were also liberated by the Sheriff. Have the Vicomte, the Deputy Vicomte and the Dénonciateur also the power of releasing prisoners?—I should consider not. I should not consider, myself, that I had a right to liberate a person whom I had put in prison, without an Act of the Court.

3083. Mr. Hugh Godfray. Perhaps this particular case of Lynch was an Act of the Court. If the Vicomte or Dénonciateur arrests a person for a breach of the peace by an order of the Court, he may be entered in the books as lodged in gaol without any order. I should not think I had any right of imprisoning a person without immediately informing the chief magistrate of it.

3084. You would put him there of your own authority then, and afterwards inform the magistrate?—Yes. I may be situated quite the reverse of the Police. The constable and centeniers have twelve officers in the country and twenty four in town, whereas I have nobody to assist me.

3085. Mr. Le Sueur. The office of Dénonciateur being lucrative, it is very easy to get persons to assist him.

3086. Mr. Chevalier. On the 24th of August, 1839, I seized a person named Cambridge, and put him in gaol.

3087. Had you orders to put him in gaol from the Attorney General?—Yes, I had; and the Report mentioned it. He had been sent out of the island, and, I think, returned.

3088. Then a sentence of the Court had been passed against him?—Yes.

3089. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Have you anything else to add?—I wish to contradict one or two statements which have been made by Mr. Charles Romeril. He asserted that the Police have a public fund at their disposal. There is no such fund. The only fund which the Police have is a voluntary fine of one shilling, levied upon such of the Police as do not attend the monthly meeting. That may produce perhaps four or five pounds a year, which is never applied to any party purposes. As to Mr. Romeril having asked centenier Du Parcq to arrest the young Chevaliers, I do not think it likely that Mr. Romeril intended to bring the affair before the Court on a criminal action, but that he intended to bring a civil action, or at least a cause en ajonction, against them, so as to claim damages. There could have been no other motive for his going to the Dean or the Recteur to get the baptismal extracts of the young Chevaliers' names, which he states in his deposition that he did.

3090. You think that his having taken steps, the only object of which was to bring a cause en ajonction, is inconsistent with his having about the same time wanted an arrest?—Yes. Mr. Chevalier, I believe, has a list of Reports which have not been proceeded with by the Attorney General. I think, when a Report is once before the Court, it ought not to be in the power of any one to stop it. A Report, I know, was presented against Le Gendre several years ago.

The following list was put in by Mr. Chevalier :—

"1837.—Sept. 18. Pierre Le Gendre et Marie Le Noble, sa femme.
1839.—Aout 24. John Cambridge.
1839.—Oct. 2. James Cormer.
1840.—Mar. 5. William Quint.
1840.—Aout 4. John Hansford.
1841.—Aout 3. John Lee.
1844.—Mar 19. George Phillippe.
1844.—Aout 24. William Turner.
1845.—Aout 7. Gallichan Laffoley, Blamfried, et autres, &c."

3091. (To Mr. Chevalier.) Those are Reports, furnished to the Court by the constable, upon which no prosecution has followed by the Procureur General?—Yes; the Report in Lee's case was presented; some of the evidence was heard; and the cause then was not proceeded with.

3092. Mr. Le Sueur. I think it is very improper that that discretion should rest with the Attorney General of stopping cases in that way. I think that, at all events, he ought to inform the Court of it; and it might then be done by an Act of the Court.

3093. Have you turned your attention to the best way of arranging the stopping of cases?—I think it is better that all cases should be brought forward by the Attorney General without choice.

3094. You would not, probably, substitute our Grand Jury system?—I think it would not be consistent with the opinion of any one in the island. I think, at the same time, there ought to be some proceeding well established, by which a party having a complaint against the Police or against the Attorney General for not taking up a criminal proceeding, or bringing a criminal action, might obtain redress.

3095. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). He has a civil remedy.

3096. Mr. Le Sueur. If a person has no right to damages, of what use is a civil remedy? When I stated, the other day, that the Court would have the power of calling on the Attorney General to go on with the prosecution, the two officers of the Crown differed upon the point. I think that that, at all events, ought to be cleared up.

3097. Will you give the Commissioners an account of the nature of a Cause en Ajonction?—There are two proceedings, essentially different, in a Cause en Ajonction. The first proceeding is instituted by what we call a bill, or summons, which is signed by the Attorney General. This form of action is generally resorted to for Slander.

3098. In Slander do you include Libel?—No; defamation by words. In that case, when the defendant appears before the Court he puts in his plea, and either denies or admits the facts which are alleged in the bill, and the case is sent to proof.

3099. Does it then go on like other civil cases?—Yes; except that those cases are not put upon the list of civil cases, and the Attorney General is a party to them.

3100. They take precedence, do they?—Yes; they take precedence of the others.

3101. Are those proceedings a matter of right, so that any party may commence an action of this kind?—Yes.

3102. Any person wishing to have an action for Slander against another has a right to institute proceedings?—Yes; no consent is necessary but that of the Attorney General, who signs the bill en ajonction; and he always signs as a matter of course.

3103. Could he refuse to sign the bill?—That is regulated by an Order in Council.

The following Orders in Council are delivered in.

3104. "At the Court at St. James's, the 28th day of March, 1771. Present, The King's Most Excellent Majesty, Duke of Ancaster, Earl of Bristol, Lord Chamberlain, Viscount Falmouth, Earl of Rochford, Viscount Hichinbrook.

"Whereas there was this day read at the Board a Report from the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the affairs of Jersey and Guernsey, dated the 26th of this instant, proposing, amongst other things, that, in regard His Majesty hath now been pleased to appoint a King's Advocate for the Island of Jersey, who, as well as the King's Procureur, is not to have the power of appointing deputies as heretofore, an amendment and explanation may be made of His late Majesty's Orders in Council of the 23rd of November 1749, and 31st of October 1751, concerning those offices, and His Majesty, taking the said Report into consideration, is pleased, with the advice of His Privy Council, to approve of what is therein proposed, and to order, as it is hereby ordered: That, for the future, if at any time the Procureur shall decline the undertaking an adjunct cause, the King's Advocate be, and he is hereby authorized, in such case, without any further formalities, to undertake such cause for the party complaining; also that, whenever the King's Procureur shall have undertaken an adjunct cause, or upon the King's Procureur having declined it and the King's Advocate having thereupon undertaken it, then, in either of the said cases, the King's Procureur or King's Advocate be generally dispensed with, and be understood in law to be dispensed with by His Majesty, and be capable, as any other counsel, ipso facto, and without further formalities, to act for the defendant in the same manner as if he were specially licensed by His Majesty so to do: And His Majesty doth hereby further order: That, in the absence of the King's Procureur out of the island, or being hindered by sickness, or being otherwise unable to act officially, the King's Advocate shall execute the office of the King's Procureur, pro hâc vice, and that un Stipulant l'Office de l'Avocat du Roi, or un Avocat Délégué, shall be appointed by the Royal Court and assigned to supply and execute the office, and so in the case of absence or inability of the King's Advocate. Whereof the Bailiff and Jurates of His Majesty's Royal Court of the Island of Jersey, His Majesty's Procureur and Advocate, and all others whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly."

3105. "At the Court at St. James's, the 23rd day of November, 1749. Present, The King's Most Excellent Majesty, Lord President, Lord Chamberlain, Duke of Richmond, Duke of Bedford, Duke of Newcastle, Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Halifax, Mr. Vice Chamberlain, George Dodington, Esq., Sir John Ligonier, Henry Legge, Esq.

"Whereas there was this day read at the Board a Report made by the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the affairs of Jersey and Guernsey, dated the 19th of June last, upon hearing the petition of Appeal and complaint of Charles Lemprière, his Majesty's Advocate General of the Island of Jersey, from a sentence passed in the Royal Court of the said Island on the 20th of February 1741, upon an action brought in the said Royal Court against the petitioner by John Le Hardy, Esq., his Majesty's Procureur of that Island, in relation to the rights of their respective offices, and likewise upon hearing the petition and Appeal of the said John Le Hardy, Esq., his Majesty's Procureur Général in the said Island of Jersey, complaining also of the said sentence: His Majesty, taking the said Report into his Royal consideration, was pleased, with the advice of his Privy Council, to approve thereof; and, agreeable to what is therein proposed, to order, as it is hereby ordered: That the said sentence of the Royal Court of Jersey, of the 20th of February 1741, be reversed. And his Majesty doth hereby declare that the Procureur is the superior officer, and the proper person to commence and carry on all criminal prosecutions, and all suits relating to the King's revenue, and all other suits in which the King's interest is concerned; That he, likewise, is the proper person to be made a party in all adjunct causes; And that, when a suit is commenced in the name of the King's Procureur, or he is made a party to an adjunct cause, the King's Advocate cannot interpose in such suit without the express direction of the King's Procureur, except in case of the Procureur's death before the determination of such suit: But that, in case of a vacancy of the office of Procureur by death or otherwise, or when the Procureur is absent from the Island, or where the Procureur is himself a party to the suit, the Advocate may commence a criminal suit, or a suit relating to the revenue, or any other suit in which the King's interest is concerned, in his own name, or may be made a party to an adjunct cause; Or, if the Procureur refuses to permit his name to be made use of in any of the said suits, and the Royal Court in Jersey are of opinion that he ought to have permitted his name to be made use of, the Royal Court may order such suit to be brought in the name of the Advocate; And that, when a suit is brought by the Advocate in any of the cases before mentioned, the Procureur shall not enter a nolle prosequi, or any ways interpose in any such suit: And His Majesty is hereby pleased further to declare that, in regard the Advocate's patent is in the same words with that of the Procureur, and it appears he has exercised the same powers in some instances; if, therefore, any criminal prosecution or any suit be brought in the name of the Advocate relating to the revenue, or in which the King's interest is concerned, or he be a party in an adjunct cause, the defendant shall not insist that such prosecution or suit was wrongfully brought, but that the Procureur may enter a nolle prosequi, and interpose in the carrying on such suit; but as, in case of a difference between the King's Procureur and Advocate, the King's interest may suffer very much if the King's Procureur should exercise this power in an arbitrary manner, his Majesty doth therefore hereby order that, during the continuance of the present Procureur and Advocate, or either of them, in their respective offices, the Procureur do not enter any nolle prosequi, nor interpose in any suit brought in the name of the Advocate, without the leave of the Royal Court of Jersey; whereof the Bailiff and Jurates of His Majesty's Royal Court of the Island of Jersey, His Majesty's said Procureur and Advocate, and all others whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly."

3106. The case, you say, goes on like a civil action?—Yes, except that it has the privilege of precedence of other causes.

3107. Is it heard before the smaller number or before the full Court?—It is heard before the smaller number; and, if the damages exceed five pounds, there is an appeal to the full Court on the damages.

3108. Is the appeal only as to damages?—Yes; and as to the merits of the case also. There is an appeal on the whole case, if the fine awarded by the Court exceeds five pounds.

3109. Is the Solicitor General at all a party to those causes?—The Solicitor General is a party in the absence of the Attorney General, and, I suppose, also in some cases where the Attorney General might refuse to sign the bill. The Attorney General may be retained by the party who brings the party before the Court; so that he may act both in his public capacity and as an advocate.

3110. He may be retained by what we should call the plaintiff?—Yes.

3111. Is it necessary that the plaintiff should retain the Attorney General to act as his advocate?—He may retain the Attorney General or the Solicitor General, or any of the advocates of the Bar.

3112. Are you confining your evidence at this moment to the species of the cause en ajonction which commences by a summons?—It applies also to that which is commenced by a remontrance.

3113. When there is a cause en ajonction, is the plaintiff compelled to have the Attorney General or the Solicitor General to plead his cause?—No; he may retain either of the other Advocates of the Bar; and then the Attorney General acts only in his public capacity.

3114. He still acts in the cause?—Yes.

3115. The Attorney General, in the case of the plaintiff retaining another advocate, acts only for the public or for the Crown?—Yes.

3116. Supposing no other advocate is retained, he has to combine the cause of the party bringing the action with his duties as a public prosecutor?—Yes: but, at the same time, I suppose the Attorney General has refused to act for plaintiffs during many years; at least I do not recollect any late instance in which the Attorney General has acted in both capacities.

3117. Are witnesses heard?—Yes. If the defendant denies the fact, the cause is sent to proof, and witnesses are called by both parties; but the defendant, if he wishes to become plaintiff, or to hasten the proceedings, must of course pay the fees of the Attorney General for signing the summons.

3118. If the plaintiff does not bring on the case after having entered his bill, the defendant is at liberty to proceed, if he pays the Attorney General his fees of office?—Yes, for signing the summons.

3119. We are supposing that a cause has been commenced by a summons being signed?—A fresh summons is necessary for each time the cause comes into Court.

3120. If the plaintiff does not proceed with the cause, the defendant is at liberty to procure a fresh summons from the Attorney General, and go on with it?—Yes.

3121. Supposing the cause to go on to proof, witnesses are heard on both sides. Who is heard first?—The plaintiff is heard first; and then the defendant; then the plaintiff again; and then the defendant; and afterwards the representative of the Crown: so that the plaintiff and defendant would be heard twice.

3122. There are five speeches?—Yes, and not always limited to that number.

3123. What is the object of the plaintiff and defendant being twice heard in this particular case?—That is in virtue of the law.

3124. Mr. Le Breton. It is so in all civil cases.

3125. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) After the Court have decided upon proof of the fact, is the Attorney General heard as to what the amount of the fine or the damages shall be?—He is heard before the Court has given any opinion upon the merits of the case, or any judgment. As soon as the counsel for the defendant has been heard last, the Attorney General sums up the cause, and draws his conclusions; and he states whether the defendant or the plaintiff are in the right, and states also what is the amount of the fine which the defendant ought to pay. If the plaintiff has not sufficient grounds for instituting the action, he is condemned to the "ajonction frivole," for having, without sufficient cause, called on the Attorney General to interfere.

3126. For having called in aid the Crown process without sufficient ground?—Yes.

3127. Is that ajonction frivole a fixed sum, or does it depend upon circumstances, or is it the costs of the proceeding?—It is a fixed sum.

3128. What is the amount of it?—Twelve and sixpence.

3129. Has he also to pay the costs of the other party in that case?—Yes, including the fees of the Attorney General, but not the fees of the counsel.

3130. The fees of Court and the fees of the Attorney General he pays?—Yes.

3131. The expenses of the witnesses?—Yes; all expenses, with the exception of the fees of the counsel or advocates and the hommes d'affaires.

3132. In case a plaintiff succeeded in his cause en ajonction, would he be entitled to costs against the defendant?—Yes; he recovers the same costs, and also damages.

3133. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). The amount of the fine is in the discretion of the Court.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.
19 September, 1846.

3134. Mr. Le Sueur. The Court fix the amount of fine to the Queen and the damages to the party.

3135. In a proceeding en ajonction by way of remontrance, how does that differ from a proceeding by bill?—The plaintiff presents in the first place a remontrance or petition to the Court, stating the case and the ground of action.

3136. In civil proceedings, is the first proceeding always called a remontrance?—A remontrance is a petition addressed to the Court, either to the inferior Court or to the full Court.

3137. Is the word remontrance confined to a cause en ajonction?—No; it is also the word used in a good many civil actions.

3138. The remontrance being presented, what is the next step?—The party prays the Court for the ajonction of the Attorney General; and the Court grants or refuses, after having heard the Attorney General as to whether there are sufficient grounds.

3139. Is the first mode of proceeding by ajonction confined to Slander or does it extend to other civil cases?—There are a few cases, where an Assault has been committed.

3140. Mr. Dupré. There are a variety of other cases to which it extends in practice.

3141. Is an offence by Words a necessary part of the proceeding?—I remember none without a Slander.

3142. Where the proceeding is by remontrance, what are the causes of injury which can be redressed in that way?—They are generally brought for Assaults, and also for Libel against a public functionary.

3143. A written Libel?—Yes.

3144. Would language threatening to do a person injury be a proper subject for a cause en ajonction?—No; there must be an Assault; and it must be sufficiently violent; or there must have been some ill treatment; otherwise the Court would not grant the ajonction.

3145. Supposing a man were to spit in another's face, would that be a sufficient Assault for a cause en ajonction?—I think not.

3146. There must be a beating, must there?—There must be a beating.

3147. (To Mr. Le Sueur). The ajonction of the Attorney General having been obtained, on application of the party, by order of the Court, what follows? Are the proceedings exactly the same as in the other case?—No; the Court, on the conclusions of the Attorney General, orders the party to be arrested by the officiers de justice; and the defendant must give bail for his appearance in Court, or go to Gaol.

3148. Does the Court fix the amonnt of bail upon the representation of the Attorney General?—Not at all; merely on the plaintiff claiming damages to a certain amount.

3149. Does the amount of bail which the Court requires depend upon the amount of damages claimed by the plaintiff?—The Court does not go into the question of bail, but only orders the party to be arrested by the officer. Then, of course, the party would take bail to the amount of the damages claimed, The following is the form of bail. "A. B. et C. D., lequel est demeuré caution de représenter la personne du défendeur et répondre à l'action toutes fois, et quantes, sur peine de répondre du jugé." The bail is generally given for such an amount of damages as the Court may award.

3150. If a party chose to claim very large damages, he could not increase the bail to that amount, the bail given being according to what the Court may award?—No.

3151. It is a security to produce the party in Court, as often as he is required, and to pay such sum as the Court shall award against him?—Yes.

3152. What would be the result, supposing, during the progress of the cause, the defendant did not come to Court?—The cause goes on in his absence; but of course he is responsible for the judgment of the Court.

3153. Does the cause then go on in the same way as the other cause en ajonction which you describe where the proceedings are by bill?—Yes: these causes also are privileged.

3154. Has the defendant the same power of pressing the cause on?—Yes.

3155. And in all other respects the proceedings are precisely the same?—Yes, entirely.

3156. Where the proceedings are by remontrance, does that take place also before the inferior number in the first instance?—Yes.

3157. With the same right of appeal, on the same conditions?—Yes.

3158. The only difference is the mode of procedure, and the fact of bail being required in one case and not in the other?—Yes; and that the party is ordered to be arrested in one case and in the other is brought up by summons of the Court.

3159. (To Mr. Dupré). You stated that the cause en ajonction by bill applied to other complaints than those Mr. Le Sueur referred to?—I have seen it in cases of Assault.

3160. You limited your former answer, as to the proceedings by remontrance, to Libel against a public functionary. Would a Libel against an individual be a ground for a cause en ajonction?—I know no case where a cause has been brought on as cause en ajonction by a remontrance in such a case.

3161. Slander against a private individual can be made a ground of a cause en ajonction by bill?—Yes. Cases for Libel are generally brought without the ajonction of the Attorney General at all.

3162. They are generally brought by civil action?—Yes.

3163. For words spoken, could a person bring a civil action?—Yes, without asking the ajonction of the Attorney General. Mr. Pipon thinks that a Libel on a private person may be a ground for a cause en ajonction.

3164. Do you agree with that?—I have not seen it done.

3165. Does any reason occur to you why a remontrance should be a proper proceeding in such a case?—For words spoken, the Attorney General may be brought as a party. It appears strange, therefore, that for even stronger words written he should not be made a party.

JERSEY.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.

19 September, 1846.

3166. Mr. Hammoud. In the case of a cause en ajonction by bill the party is not arrested.

3167. Mr. Dupre. Formerly the practice was that there was no saisie after an ajonction, except in cases of Assault.

3168. Mr. Hammond. I have never known a case of that kind in my practice. Wherever the Court have decided that the ajonction shall be allowed, and the Attorney General is a party, it is the Attorney General who moves the proceeding; and I have always seen it ordered that such a party should be arrested; whereas if it is by a bill there is no such proceeding.

3169. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). In a cause en ajonction by summons, there can be no appeal for the plaintiff, because he does not state the damages which he claims, but leaves it to the discretion of the Court; while, if it is by remontrance or petition, he claims certain damages, and, if those are not granted, he may appeal. On the appeal, the Attorney General is no party to the suit.

3170. Supposing, in an ajonction by way of bill, the decision is that the plaintiff has no ground of action at all?—Then he cannot appeal.

3171. The distinction which you make as to the sum not being named would hardly bear out that view?—If a plaintiff has asked no particular damages, he cannot appeal under 5*l.* I think a person who claims an ajonction for a Libel by remontrance ought to obtain it.

3172. As matter of principle?—Yes.

3173. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) What are the particular advantages of a cause en ajonction in contradistinction from a civil action?—It has the privilege of not being put on the list of causes, and therefore of coming much sooner before the Court; but the expenses of a cause en ajonction are greater than those of common causes.

3174. Is the getting precedence the only advantage?—I do not know that there is any other advantage, except that the defendant may be condemned to pay a fine.

3175. There would also be the advantage of neutralizing one of the Crown Officers?—Yes; and sometimes having the Crown Officer on your side, in the case of the Attorney General acting for the plaintiff, which has not lately been the practice.

3176. Would it apply equally to a remontrance en ajonction as to a bill, that the Attorney General has refused to act in both cases?—Yes.

3177. I presume this is a very lucrative part of the practice of the Crown Officers?—Not very lucrative; but the costs are sometimes very heavy for the parties. Formerly the causes en ajonction were more numerous than they are now. Women would quarrel together in the market, or such places, and very often have recourse to a bill en ajonction.

3178. The Procureur Général having by bill or remontrance come into Court, has the defendant a power of retaining the Avocat Général?—Yes.

3179. The Procureur Général gets no fees for ordinary prosecutions, does he?—No: if the defendant is condemned to pay costs, and has the means to pay them, the Attorney General gets his fees.

3180. The Crown pays him nothing except his salary?—There are some cases in which the costs are always paid. In infringing an Act of the States, for instance.

3181. You say, where a party is a solvent person, and is ordered to pay costs, part of those costs is ajudged to the Attorney General?—Yes.

3182. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). In criminal cases a defendant never pays costs.

3183. Mr. Le Sueur. Not in cases which go before a Jury. In all other cases they do. It extends to all cases that do not go before an enditement.

3184. Who fixes the amount of the costs to the Procureur Général?—Himself, I suppose: he fixes his charges according to practice.

3185. Is there any scale of charges?—There is none established by a law.

3186. If a party who was a rich man in this Island were convicted, might the Procureur Général say, "My fees are one thousand guineas"?—We have never heard of fees to that amount in this Island.

3187. Is there a scale of fees?—There is a scale, which is not always adhered to, to a pound or two.

3188. There is a well known scale which cannot be exceeded, is there?—There is a scale.

3189. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). I suppose the Procureur Général does not get twenty-five pounds for causes en ajonction in a year.

3190. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Is there any officer whose business it is to perform the duty which we call taxing costs?—The Court may tax all accounts.

3191. Does it do so by its officers?—No: if a person is actioned to pay costs, and he says the costs are extravagant, the Court may go through the items and reduce the costs.

3192. Mr. Evans. Cases that have arisen have generally been upon the Greffier's charges; they are established. I think the Greffier's charges are a general model of the charges of the hommes d'affaires.

3193. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Do you agree to what Mr. Godfray has stated as to the value of causes en ajonction to the Procureur Général?—Of late the amount has not been very great; whether it is 25*l.* or 30*l.* I cannot say. I think they may have amounted to 50*l.* in some years; but certainly not of late years.

3194. Mr. Hugh Godfray. I think there is a fixed scale of expenses.

3195. You are an officer of the Court, are you not?—Yes. The same charges have been made for the Attorney General as for the advocates in the cause, except the signature of the summonses, which are paid extra.

3196. Is there a fixed scale of the charges of an advocate?—It is fixed by practice. An écrivain may draw out the charges without reference to the advocate.

Mr. John Seward examined.

Mr. John Seward. 19 September, 1846.

3197. Have you anything to say to the Commissioners?—I understand Mr. Le Cras stated that the Police did not come to bind me down to keep the peace. Mr. Du Parcq came twice; and Mr. Le Sueur the constable came twice.

3198. How do you know they came?—I heard them come. I was not at home when Mr. Du Parcq first came; but I recollect Mr. Le Sueur came.

3199. You remember Mr. Du Parcq coming once, and Mr. Le Sueur once?—Mr. Le Sueur told Miss Gore, my housekeeper, that he was not going to put me to gaol, but I was to get some one to be surety for me. I took Mr. Copp; Mr. Hugh Godfray also sent to me.

3200. The Dénonciateur?—Yes; I went to him next morning, and took Mr. Copp as a security. I was then served with a remontrance by Mr. Godfray on the account of Mr. Le Cras.

3201. Mr. Copp became your security, did he?—He did.

---

Mr. David Bromer, examined.

Mr. David Bromer.

3202. Have you any thing to say to the Commissioners?—A person named Ariel was taken up criminally for causing a disturbance in the street and sent to gaol, where he remained. When presented to the Court, it was decided that he was of insane mind. The consequence was that his relations came over and wished to dispose of his property; when the property could not be disposed of till Mr. Le Sueur's fees, both for defending him and a Mrs. Fagg, were discharged, on the ground that, without the question of legality being entered into, if he did not pay them the Bailiff would suspend the sale of the property.

---

Mr. Charles De Ste. Croix examined.

Mr. Charles De Ste Croix.

3203. Do you deliver into the Commissioners some returns?—I do (producing the same). It is a statement of the number of persons confined in Her Majesty's gaol, Jersey, under accusation of crimes and misdemeanours, from the 1st of January, 1836, to September in the present year, specifying the date of their confinement and discharge, the age and county of each offender, and distinguishing the nature of the offence, the offenders dealt with and discharged by the police, those who submitted in the first instance, those dealt with by the Court without a jury, those tried before the enditement or petty jury, those tried by the grand enquête, and the acquittals and punishments.

3204. Have you examined those carefully?—I have. There may be some inaccuracies; but substantially they are correct, for they were made from the prison books and compared with the books of the Court.

---

John Le Couteur, Esq., Vicomte, further examined.

John Le Couteur, Esq.

3205. What are the fees in the case of a coroner's inquest?—5*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. are the whole of the costs in the case of an inquest. The paper which I produce will show the sum.

(The same was produced and is as follows.)

Mémoire des frais pour une Levée de Corps.

3206. How do you tell whether a person can pay or not?—They are pretty well known.

3207. Do not you think that, an Inquisition being always a very unpleasant thing, it is extremely hard to make the representative or family pay the expenses of a coroner's inquest?—Certainly. It is intended that it should be otherwise, by a regulation which is under consideration.

---

Thomas Le Breton, Esq., further examined.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.

3208. You were good enough to send to the Commissioners a report of Marin's case?—I did.

3209. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. It is a verbatim translation from the documents in the Court; it was translated by me.

3210. (To Mr. Le Breton.) We were told by Mr. Le Sueur that he thought the duty of the constable was on all occasions to inquire into all the circumstances of the case?—He collects all the information possible.

JERSEY.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.

19 September, 1846.

3211. He presents the information, whether it is hearsay or not?—Yes.

3212. Is that read to the jury?—Yes, as part of the proceedings.

3213. And they take it out with them?—Yes.

3214. Practically, then, the rule, that hearsay evidence is not receivable here, does not apply to that part of the evidence?—It applies so far that the jury are told that they are only to attend to the direct evidence in the case, and not to pay attention to the hearsay evidence which there may be in the report or in the depositions.

3215. We observe in this Report statements of what a wife has said of her husband?—That is very often entered in the Report, but of course cannot be considered as evidence.

3216. Mr. Charles De Sainte Croix. Generally speaking, in all criminal proceedings, the statement of the Attorney General, and the direction of the Judge, point out to the jury what is evidence and what is not.

3217. Mr. Hammond. In rather a recent case, I have heard it argued by the Bailiff, in summing up, in answer to an objection taken by the counsel, that it was evidence, because it was confirmed by the oath of the constable: but that could not make it evidence a bit more where it was not really evidence.

3218. Mr. Le Breton. I should like to remark upon that that I have always made it a point to inform the jury that they were not to rely upon any hearsay evidence; and, when the advocates have pointed out some information of this kind as being hearsay, I have always told the jury it was so, and they were not to attend to it.

3219. Mr. Hammond. No doubt the Attorney General is quite ready to admit, when such a part of the evidence is pointed out by the counsel, that it is not to be received as evidence.

3220. Mr. Le Breton. Formerly the constable's Reports were not so full as they are now. Within these ten or fifteen years we have introduced a little history of the case, as it were.

3221. (To Mr. Le Breton.) In cases which have been argued on points of law, do the learned Judges give their reasons at all?—No; they give their opinions.

3222. Mr. Dupré. They give a summary of the reasons in the Act of Court.

3223. Mr. Hammond. I do not think you will find that they give their reasons in any way in a criminal cause.

3224. Do the Jurats, in ruling upon a point of law as to the admissibility of evidence, give their reasons?

3225. Mr. Marett. The counsel for the prisoner can insist upon the reasons being given.

3226. Mr. Dupré. I take it that, where there is a decision given whether the question was proper or improper, there would be an act of the Court. The Court would state its grounds for so deciding; but the Jurats do not give their opinions.

3227. Sometimes those cases are decided by a majority; of course, therefore, the reasons of the majority only are given?—No.

3228. (To Mr. Le Breton.) There has been, has there not, on some occasions a charge that, in cases where they took a personal interest, the enditement has been packed by the Police?—Such a report has been circulated in a recent case, that of Nicolle.

3229. Was there any report of that sort before the trial?—I did not hear of any.

3230. What was done in consequence of the report after the trial?—There was a representation presented to Court by Mr. Le Sueur, who presided at the enditement on that occasion.

3231. He was anxious to have it examined into?—Yes.

3232. Mr. Le Sueur. More especially as the man was under sentence of death.

3233. Mr. Le Breton. A copy of the representation is in the hands of the Greffier, I believe?

3234. What was done?—The Court, that is the larger number, directed the Crown Officers, without making an act of it, to inquire and investigate the matter, which we did in consequence, by applying to some of the parties named in the representation, and, more particularly, to Mr. Nicolle, the father of the convict.

3235. Did he make the representation?—Mr. Le Sueur. One of the family had spoken to me on the subject, and had asked me whether there had been such an understanding. In consequence of that, I brought it before the Court, so that the Court might deal with it.

3236. (To Mr. Le Breton.) Did you examine everybody mentioned in the representation?—I think we examined everybody except one man, Romeril, who appeared to be the authority, or at least the circulator of the report; but we examined the persons from whom he stated he had collected that information.

3237. The whole of them?—Yes.

3238. Did you examine Binet?—No, because he formed a part of the jury on that occasion.

3239. Binet was the proper person to summon the enditement, was not he?—Yes; he warned the officiers de connétable to attend the enditement; that we were not aware of. It was done by him in his capacity of vingtenier, by order of the constable.

3240. Did the charge come to anything, in your opinion?—Mr. Dupré. The father asserted strongly that the facts alleged were true, that he had it from one of the police officers.

3241. The fact of packing the jury?—Yes; and their meeting together to deliberate what verdict should be given beforehand. We required him to give the name of the party from whom he said he had it; but he never would do so.

3242. Did he name Binet?—I do not recollect his doing so; it rested with him to give up the name of the party; and we gave him till the next day to consider whether he would do so.

3243. His son was then under conviction?—Yes.

3244. And, of course, that might have very much influenced the fate of his son?—Yes.

3245. Did you make him aware of that?—Yes; we pointed it out in as strong a manner as

JERSEY.

Thomas Le Breton, Esq.
19 September, 1846.

we possibly could; we told him that, if we could prove such a fact, it would be our duty to take measures to stop the execution of his son. The next day he again positively declined naming the party, saying, it might be an injury to him if he did so. The Court met, I think, that very day; and we reported accordingly. Of course the Court could take no notice of such a case.

---

Mr. John Nicolle examined.

Mr. John Nicolle.

3246. Have you heard what these gentlemen have said?—Yes.

3247. What do you wish to say upon it?—I presume that the two Crown officers say we did not give up the names of those who had spread the report about. They had come to my brother, and informed us of a certain meeting being held by the police. I say that we gave the names up.

3248. Who is "we"?—My brother and myself.

3249. Whom did you name?—Mr. Charles Romeril and Mr. John Binet, as the summoning officer. I have a copy here of the representation that was made to the Court (producing the same).

3250. (To Mr. Dupré.) Why was not Romeril examined on the subject?—I spoke with him on the subject, but not with the proper officer.

3251. Why not?—He told me he had the report from two parties. We sent for those two parties from whom he had the report, who both denied that they told him so.

3252. Do you recollect the name of Binet being given to you?—No. He told us there was an officer of police who had full knowledge of the subject, and who informed him. He told us, I think, that he had been warned to attend the meeting, but did not attend it. We pressed him strongly to give us the name of the party; but we never could prevail on him to do so.

3253. (To Mr. Nicolle.) Did not you refuse to give up the name of the officer of police?—Yes, the centenier; but that is not either of the others that I stated.

3254. What did you tell this gentleman about Binet?—That he had packed the jury in one way.

3255. You told that to the Law officers?—It was told the Law officers by my brother, what Mr. Binet had done in the way of warning the officers of police.

3256. (To Mr. Le Sueur.) Who made the list on that occasion?—I made the list; or at least I gave directions to my clerk to make it, and put down the different police officers who had not deposed as witnesses, and who lived in the town.

3257. Can you state whether the list from which the enditement was summoned corresponded with the list you gave?—There was a name altered, with my sanction.

3258. What name was that?—Mr. Bischal, I think, and another substituted, James Dumaresq.

3259. What was the reason of that?—Mr. Binet told me, I think, that Mr. Bischal could not attend. I have since heard a different reason stated; but that was what was then told me.

3260. What is the reason you have heard stated?—Either that he said, he would not form part of the jury, or some such expression; that he was one of a former jury, where a person had been found Guilty; and that he would not attend.

3261. That he had a dislike to capital punishments?—That he had a dislike to the duty of attending. In fact, as to the accusation of packing, when the witnesses were excluded there would have been a very small number to pack from. As it was a very important case, I thought it was better to have the police officers who lived in the town. I must say that it is a very unpleasant duty to perform, although in most cases it is not very important who forms part of the enditement. I think it is also very unpleasant for the Attorney General to have to select the grande enquête in certain cases. And, as to the Police, it is very disagreeable to the Police to have to sit as jurymen, as it sometimes happens that things have come to their knowledge which do not appear upon the evidence. I believe, however, that in the verdicts of the enditements generally justice is done. If those things were to occur more often, it would render the position of the constable and the Police still more unpleasant. In nearly all the cases which have come before the enditement, the police are quite strangers to the individuals.

3262. (To Mr. Nicolle.) Have you anything to add?—I should be glad to know whether there was not another member on the list who was changed.

3263. Mr. Le Sueur. I believe that that was the only name that was changed after I gave the list; but I believe I struck out the name of Mr. François Romeril, because, as being editor to a newspaper, he might have written some articles on the case. Here is the list which I gave to my clerk. (The same was produced.)

3264. Mr. Nicolle. I should like to make an observation concerning the trial. Previous to my cousin Le Cronier's assassination, Mr. Hammond, on his going to England, told me that the Crown officers had heard all the witnesses for the accusation. Mr. Hammond left, I believe, on Tuesday. My son had been brought up on the Friday; and on the Friday the Procureur Général stated that they were all the witnesses that were to be heard for the accusation. Mr. Hammond went to England on the Tuesday. Mr. Le Cronier was assassinated on the Friday. Mr. Hammond was gone for several days. I believe he returned the Sunday following. When he returned, he told me that two other witnesses were to be brought up for the Crown; and he named me the two parties: one of them was Mr. Ligne, and another a French woman whom I did not know. I acquainted the counsel for the prisoner that I knew Mr. John Ligne was an enemy, and not a fit person to be heard. As to the other, I could not tell what she was. However, she did not come forward.

JERSEY.

Mr. John Nicolle.
19 September, 1846.

3265. Did Ligne come forward?—Yes. Previous to their going to Court to depose, the Attorney General, if I am well informed by what Mr. Chevalier has stated, sent his clerk and Mr. Chevalier to question Ligne: and, as the French woman lived in the same place, they also asked for her; and another person was then there; and she stated that Madame Tardif was afraid of the Police, and would not come forward. They said: "we must have her come; and you must go and call her." She was called. When she came forward, they said: "let us have all the truth." She said: "I know nothing about this affair; and therefore I can have nothing to say." They said: "do not tell us lies; we know all about it." She persisted, however, in saying that she knew nothing about it; and therefore she was not brought forward as a witness.

3266. (To Mr. Le Breton). Is a recent enmity a ground for excluding a witness?—No, certainly not.

3267. Mr. F. Godfray (Advocate). That has been decided in a full Court.

3268. (To Mr. Nicolle). Did your counsel, when Ligne was called, say, "This is a case of recent enmity against the prisoner; and therefore he cannot be heard?"—I cannot say. Mr. Hammond had not been the counsel whom my son applied to to defend his cause. He was appointed by the Court. He applied to Mr. Godfray to defend him; but Mr. Godfray refused.

3269. Have you anything to add to what you have said?—I persist in saying that we named Binet and Romeril.

3270. How came you not to give the name of the other policeman?—It was only the hearsay of this policeman. He had admitted that there had been a meeting that evening. I have also to explain that two of those who attended on the jury were out of their office for a considerable time. It is the duty of their office to attend an enditement: and, as they were not in office, nor re-elected, nor re-sworn, it is very unjust.

3271. You could have made an objection to the Court at the time, could not you?—I was not there.

---

Mr. Peter Le Sueur.

Mr. Peter Le Sueur further examined.

3272. A cause en ajonction, in some sense of the word, is a civil suit, is it not?—Both civil and criminal.

3273. Has the party who set the ajonction in motion the power of desisting if he pleases?—That is generally the case. There are many instances where persons have abandoned their cause en ajonction.

3274. Can the Procureur Général or the Avocat Général insist upon the cause going on?—I should think not; not the same cause.

3275. It is taken to a certain extent out of their control?—It is: but that is a reason why those causes should never be instituted, except for common Assaults or cases where the public is not greatly interested. It should not be instituted where there is crime.

3276. You say it should never take place where the public have any interest in the prosecution going on?—Where they have any great interest.

3277. If the public has no interest, there appears to be no reason why it should not be a civil cause.—No.

3278. In cases where the public has an interest, that leaves it to a certain extent in the hands of the party to compromise that interest?—Yes, which is highly improper; and indeed, I do not wish to go into the details of the case, but in one case a cause en ajonction has certainly been used by a party as a means to extort money; and the money was divided among the witnesses. It was an action brought by a party pretending that he had been assaulted by another with the intention to commit an unnatural crime.

3279. This Assault was the ground of a cause en ajonction?—Yes. The defendant was arrested; he gave bail; and shortly afterwards he compromised the matter: the money was divided between the plaintiff and one of the witnesses. It is not necessary to go any further into the case.

3280. It might be a mode of extortion in that way?—Yes. At the same time, I do not think that, by our practice, an ajonction ought to have been granted in that case.

3281. You think it ought to have been made an exclusively criminal case?—Yes, because I do not see how the plaintiff could have any right to claim damages in such a case. When a remontrance is presented to the Court, an ajonction is granted ex parte before the defendant has had time to appear before the Court: and I am confident that, in many cases, the Court would not have granted an ajonction if the defendant had been heard. But, when once given, I suppose the Court has no right to withdraw it.

Adjourned.

COMMUNICATIONS from JOHN LE COUTEUR, Esq., Viscount of Jersey.

SIR, Belle Vue, Jersey, September 23, 1846.

I HAVE the honour to inclose, for Her Majesty's Commissioners, some remarks and authorities in support of my evidence on "Enditements," &c., given before them, with a Return of the Prisoners sent to the Jersey Gaol, in the ten years previous to the introduction of steam navigation, and the twenty subsequent years.

Also, my remarks on the Royal Court, and suggestions for its modification, with a list of various charters granted to Jersey by the Sovereigns of England.

I have, &c.,

Charles Clark, Esq., J. LE COUTEUR,
&c. &c. &c. Viscount of Jersey.

P.S. I also inclose the decision of the Court with regard to Coroner's Inquests.*—J. LE C.

REMARKS on the DERIVATION of the "ENDITEMENT," which is now formed by the Constable and twelve Police Officers.

In an ancient edition of the "Grand Coustumier," of the year 1515, printed twenty four years earlier than the edition of Rouillé, usually so called, of 1539, in the "Stille de proceder," I conceive we find the trace of our "Enditement." At the article "Du Procedement à la Vue et "enqueste des dictz bref et Clameur de Haro," it is seen that twelve men were summoned by the "Sergent," to try the case, and, if these twelve men were not challenged by either party, they heard the cause. "Iceulx douze ainsy acceptez sont faictz retourner en Jugement." If seven out of the twelve agreed, as is the custom in Jersey, the verdict was good. The article de "Jureurs," chap. lxix. fo. xciii., informs us that "Jureurs sont ceulx qui sont mis en enquestes "et tesmoins sont ceulx qui sont mis en preuve de certain," which makes the distinction between the twelve jurymen and the witnesses clear.

At "De Haro," chap. liii. fo. lxxiiii., we find "Le Duc de Normendie a la Court du Haro "et en doit faire enqueste sil fut crye a droit ou a tort: car il ne doit estre crye fors pour cause "criminelle. Si comme pour feu ou pour larcin ou pour homicide ou pour autre evident peril." &c.

It is thus clear that cases of "Clameur de Haro" were then tried by twelve men, which is not the case with us now, as "Haro" is only used to arrest invasions on property, or some other civil cases. Terrien, Lib. ix. c. 33. p. 387., "De Preuve qui se fait par enqueste veue et ostension de lieux," cites Rouillé au chapitre de Querelle fioffal, where enqueste is said to be the "acknowledgment of the truth of the fact in litigation by the oath of twelve chevaliers, or of "twelve other preuds" (Preuds, is rendered by Kelham, wise, discreet men), "trustworthy "and not suspected."

Kelham renders "Enditement" to mean interpretation; and "enquester" to find out. The practice has varied in some instances. 1611. July 20. The Constable and six Sermentés of St. Ouen formed an Enditement. 1611. December 5. The Court ruled that if the six differ, there must be twelve for an Enditement. Here we see the decision of the Court to secure the absolute majority by the concurrence of the six Sermentés with their Constable or President; for we find once more in 1630, December 9, a Constable and six Sermentés on an Enditement; hence an absolute majority of seven was meant to be secured.

It may be proper to state here the opinion of the most learned commentator on the laws of Jersey, Lieutenant Bailly Le Geyt, whose works are considered of such authority and research as to be now in course of printing at the expense of the States. Mr. Le Geyt was equally renowned for his love of justice as for his attainments. I wish to shew his opinion, in answer to a remark by Mr. Advocate Godfray, who stated that I was incorrect in informing the Commissioners that an Enditement of six had ever sat, and that it was only as Voyeurs before the Vicomte. Here are the learned commentator's words. "Comme les Connétables doivent particulièrement faire observer les ordonnances de la Justice, et qu'à cet effet ils en doivent avoir, chacun d'eux, un Recueil, cela leur donne une grande connoisance de la Police, et comme ils assistent toujours aux déliberations des Etats, ils ont lieu de manifester leur mérite, et de remporter, comme ils font assez souvent, les suffrages du peuple, lors qui'il se présente quelque place de Justice à remplir. Les Connétables se tiennent découverts dans les Etats, et se levent quand ils parlent." (It would seem as if the jurats then sat covered in the States.) "Ils y doivent assister en personne, et ne pas envoyer des Centeniers sans une légitime excuse (Vide Acte de 1685, le 18me May). Lorsqu'il s'y fait quelque proposition, qu'ils ne goutent point, c'est à eux une evasion ordinaire de demander du temps pour communiquer la chose à leurs Paroissiens. Mais la cour ne le leur accorde que lorsqu'elle le juge à propos, et c'est souvent lorsqu'elle veut elle même que la proposition n'avance pas, ou qu'elle ne réussisse point, car il est peu de nouvelles propositions que le peuple agrée, et qu'il n'envisage comme un piège ou comme un projet, qui ne tend qu'à l'avantage de quelque particulier. La charge de Connestable est une des plus fatiguantes mais elle n'est pas perpétuelle. En 1577, le 3e Juillet, il fut généralement 'permis au Connétables de faire faire un choix de deux personnes par la pluralité des voix de leurs paroissiens, lesquels élus ils doivent présenter le prochain Samedy d'après le Saint Michel, et l'un desquels sera établi par la Justice, et après avoir exercé trois ans, sera déchargé s'il le demande.'"

It appears from this passage that the election of constables took place then nearly, if not simultaneously, which put an end to much party interference from parish to parish. "En 1621, le 6 Octobre cela ne fut plus laissé à la liberté des Connétables. On ordonna qu'après Trois ans on ferait un nouveau choix, toutes fois et quantes par devant un Justicier. En 1629, le 24 Septembre, 'Les Principaux de la paroisse" (not universal suffrage) "le Dimanche prochain

* This has been already printed at p. 173 of the Evidence.

JERSEY.

Communications from J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

après la Cène au Terme Saint Michel, une fois en trois ans pourront choisir un Connétable et luy assigneront jour du Samedy prochain.'"

Thus the Principaux elected the Constable on the same Sunday following the feast of St. Michael after Sacrament, simultaneously all over the island. It is also shown, that "En 1541, le 21e Avril, deux Connétables prirent serment pour la Paroisse de St. Hélier. Cet exemple n'à pas eu de suite; il n'y a qu'un Connétable par chaque Paroisse; mais il est secondé d'un Centenier qui fait le même serment mutato nomine, et les mêmes fonctions en l'absence du Connétable. Présentement il y a fort peu de paroisses où il n'y ait deux Çenteniers, et cette multiplication est nouvelle. Outre les Centeniers, les Connétables ont aussi pour assistants des Vingteniers et douze autres hommes des plus substantiels de la Paroisse, après ceux qu'on appelle les Principaux, et ces douze hommes portent le titre de Sermentez du Connétable. Un acte de 1576, le 17e May, dit, 'Que les Connétables feront cherche généralement en leurs Paroisses douze fois par "an au jour qui leur sera appointé par la Justice, assistez de tels gens de bien que bon leur semble.' En effet le nombre des sermentez n'etait pas anciennement si grand. Six suffisoient pour enditer, comme il a été dit ci-dessus, au lieu qu'il en faut à présent douze. Et parcequ'entre les sermentez, les uns peuvent être indisposez, et les autres absents de l'Isle, il y a peu de Paroisses où le Connétable n'ait dix-huit Sermentez, afin que le nombre se puisse toujours trouver complet. Dans les occasions presantes, la Justice en a même juré quelques uns qui par hazard se trouvoient en Cour." The Court thus swore in Special Constables, Officers, or "Sermentez," on pressing occasions. The Constables were given power to imprison in the year 1639 by Ordonnance of the Royal Court, which then was law. They have exercised it ever since, and are now bound to do so, when necessary, by virtue of their oath of office.

Terrien, at Lib. xii. c. 28. p. 503., cites the "Chapitre de Haro." "Tous ceux à qui la "Justice commandera à garder tels mal-faiteurs, ou les amener en prison en la ville où les mal-"faiteurs sont, doyvent faire aide de leurs corps une nuict et un jour, ou autres pour eux qui "soyent suffisans à les mener en prison. Et ce est appelé le plet de l'espée car tels mal-faiteurs "doyuent estre reprimez à l'Espée et aux armes; et doyuent estre mis en prison et liez." Which has been the practice of our Police; both the imprisonment and Enditement being traceable to ancient usage.

Our Enditement evidently was intended to be, as its name imports, the interpretation of the fact, and was to be followed by an appeal to the Grande Enqueste, or finding out.

Rouillé shows that the Enqueste was to be composed of twelve indifferent men. Hence I object to the construction of our Enditement, because some of its members may be, if not the identical individuals who have seized the offender in "flagrant délit," those who had him in custody, or those who may have been insulted or struck by him. If not these, they may still be their colleagues and associates, thus, probably, entertaining a leaning against a violent prisoner.

Again, if the prisoner should happen to be a near relative to one of the Police, the case becomes more complicated. No men, under such conditions, should be called on to sit on a Jury.

The remedy to this evil, which Dumaresq and Hemery viewed in the same light, would seem to be easy. The parish assembly in January, as soon as the annual rate should be finally fixed, might select a number of intelligent men, who are to be met with in every parish, to serve as Jurors. A list of these should be sent in, in due form, signed by the Constable, to the proper officer, who should draw a given number of names by lot, when required, from each district. The Juries from the western parishes to try offences committed in the eastern district, and Juries from the east to try offences committed in the west district.

The evidence should be vivâ voce, not written.

RETURN of the NUMBER of CRIMINALS, confined in the MAJESTY'S PRISON at JERSEY, from the 16th of June 1814 to the 16th of June 1824—being the ten years previous to the introduction of Steam Navigation.

Mr. Plees, a historian of Jersey, assumed the population of the Island to be about 23,000 in 1814, just at the close of the war: in 1824 it might have risen to 30,000. Two thirds being assumed to be natives, taking the average at 27,000 for the first ten years, we have 18,000 Jersey, and 9,000 of other countries; of these 552 were sent to the prison charged with offences, divided into 192 of Jersey or British Jersey parentage, and 360 Irish, English, Scotch and Foreign; being an average of 19 Jersey persons confined yearly, and 36 of other countries. Then dividing the 18,000 Jersey by 19·2=one confined in 930; also dividing the 9,000 of various countries by 36=one in 250. In the ensuing period from the 16th June 1824, when steam vessels first plied regularly, to the 16th June 1834, the population rose from 30,000 to 40,000 nearly. Estimating, as before, on an average of 35,000 persons, divided into 23,000 Jersey, and 12,000 of other countries, we find that 1257 were sent to gaol, divided into 412, of Jersey or British Jersey origin, and 845 of other countries; being an average of 41 Jersey persons confined annually, or one in 560, and of 84 of other countries, or one in 142. In the last period, from the 16th June 1834 to the 16th June 1844, the population has increased from 40,000 to 50,000 nearly. Assuming an average of 45,000 persons, divided into 30,000 Jersey and 15,000 of other countries, we find that 2174 were sent to gaol, divided into 643 of Jersey or British Jersey origin, and 1531 of other countries, being an average of 64 Jersey persons confined yearly, or one in 468, and 153 of other countries, or one in 98.

It may be stated that of those included in the Jersey class considerably more than one half are children of Jersey mothers, who have married English, Irish or other persons, who all call themselves Jersey; so that the list of crime, among the pure native population, would not be half the average above stated. It is also proper to add that about one sixth of the other offenders are foreigners, who came to this Island in the course of the extensive trade which is carried on here.

Viscount's Office, 22nd September, 1846. J. LE COUTEUR, Viscount of Jersey.

REMARKS and SUGGESTIONS of JOHN LE COUTEUR, Esq., Viscount of Jersey, on the Constitution of the Royal Court.

The charter of King John shows of itself that the Bailli existed before the Jurats. He may have previously exercised his very extensive powers under the Dukes of Normandy (Rouillé, Ch. iiij. de Justicier), with the Vicomte (Ch. V.), the Sergents de l'Epée, the Bedeaulx, and the Officers of the Crown; holding Courts with the seigneurs of Fiefs Hauberts (Terrien, Lib. III. Ch. xiii.), aided by the Juries of twelve or twenty four "Preuds" during the Assizes which lasted forty days (Coustumier, de Assize, Chap. xxiiij.); the Duke always reserving to himself Sovereign power. (Vide Coustumier, Chs. xii. xiii. xv. xvi.)

That charter of King John was invaluable for the period. It altered what was probably a pure feudal jurisdiction to one with the form of a Court Royal. It granted twelve Jurats, Coroners, natives of the soil, to be elected by the King's Officers and the "Grands du Pais," to act as Judges in last resort, in all cases excepting treason, or cases too difficult, which the Sovereign reserved for his own tribunal. The liberties of the people were well secured by the charter.

In the year 1835, when the Attorney General and myself were Deputies of the States, acting with Mr. Brock, the Bailli of Guernsey, to defend the right of the Channel Islanders to export corn to England, Mr. Stacey Grimaldi collected the titles of whatever Jersey or Guernsey charters he could then find. There are more, however. He found that of King John, registered in the Rolls, called Escheats, in the Tower of London, in the 33rd year of the reign of his son Henry III., 1248. Various and many charters, immunities, and privileges, were granted to Jersey and Guernsey, by the following Sovereigns. (See the list annexed.)

These signal rewards were bestowed for service in war against the most powerful and constant foe to England, for holding this small Island for the British Crown on eleven occasions of attack or invasion. The powers of the Bailli and Jurats were greatly extended by James the First and Charles the Second, who granted the Patent of Impôt, making them, with the Governor, the administrators of a great portion of the revenue. In other cases, as I have shown by my former replies, their powers have been restricted, and, in some few cases, extended.

Under all circumstances the Crown and the law appear to have intended the Jurats to be treated with deference, as being the administrators of the law, and enjoying the confidence, at least, of the majority of the constituency who elected them. Yet this right of election, which, after 1605, dwindled into universal suffrage, has led to the evil which the last Royal Commissioners foresaw: the Jurats are believed to be party men. While I had the honour to sit on the Bench I really did not find it to be so, excepting, perhaps, one or two purely election cases. In all others, every pains was taken to discuss points, and to arrive at the truth; and, although I might often have differed from my colleagues, I perceived sufficient reasons in their objections to lead me to think that they conceived they were right. In all cases, too, the leaning was in favour of a stranger, especially if he were unprotected. The chief difficulty was, the absence of fixed law to refer to. The Old Code of laws, Orders of Council, Precedents of the full Court and Acts of Parliament registered here, were our guides. Had the Reports of all the Royal Commissions which had been sent to Jersey been collected, revised, confirmed and registered, as the basis of a code, much good would have been done. The most serious charge against our ancestors is the shameful way in which they evaded to register salutary laws, which they themselves had approved, signed and sealed in the most solemn way, in conjunction with the most discreet men the Sovereign could select. The "Ordres, Loix, et Ordonnances" of Pyne and Naper in 38 Articles were admirable. I suspect that the restrictions which were laid on the Viscount and other influential officers of the Court were the cause of this.

About the year 1835, a most dangerous, nay alarming, practice prevailed, that of recusing or challenging the Jurats without limitation, so much so that, at one period, in certain causes, no Court could be formed.—See Duheaume v. Arthur, 30 Sept. 1835; Bisson v. Le Quesne, 18 July 1835; Whitfield's Case, 29 Oct. 1836; and others.

Besides the difficulties which perplex the Jurats there are minor evils to correct.

1. The pleading of the Crown Officers against each other in "causes en ajonction" tends to shake the confidence of the Court in the opinion it should entertain of these gentlemen; nor do these causes place the parties on a fair or equal footing.
2. The Crown Lawyers should act as advisers to the Court as they do in France.
3. The Jurats should meet, robe and deliberate in a room of their own, exclusively from all other persons.
4. The Jurats should not sit on Committees of the States. The coarse and familiar language which is there addressed to them, on party discussions, or on making appointments, such as for Harbour Masters or others, in the gift of the States, is unavoidably carried into the Court of Justice.
5. As it is in Guernsey, the Bar should not act in the double capacity of Constables and Advocates; the offices being quite incompatible, either with free discussion in the States, where they become mouthpieces to a party, or in the Court and on Committees of the States, where they are too much on a level with the Jurats.

In order further to suggest remedies for other evils, I had prepared matter with the view to show that our constitution might be propped and restored, in the original sense of the Charter of King John: but I confess that all my previous conceptions have been disturbed by the evidence which has been given before the Commission. I see no other light than to follow in the track by which the most free and wise people of modern days have travelled, the British, French and American races, all as free in their thoughts and as jealous of their liberties as we have ever been. The mass of evidence taken comprehensively must convince any ordinary understanding that the present form of our Court is totally unsuited to our high position in civilisation. Hence I hope that, when it appears in print, and is submitted to the good sense of my countrymen, they will come to the conclusion of other enlightened people.

JERSEY.

Communications from J. Le Couteur, Esq., Viscount.

With reference to the formation of a Jury, there are many "good men and true" in every parochial assembly, who might be named by the vestry meeting to act as Jurymen. A certain number from three parishes of one part of the Island might be summoned to try offences committed in the other, in the mode I have before suggested. There could then be no probability of frequent connection between the Jury and Prisoner; besides, there would be the right of challenge on both sides. It may be perceived that the lives, properties and interests of fifty thousand persons should not be entrusted to mere purity of motive, or mere honesty in practice. In order to be on a level with any other people, a sound knowledge of law is absolutely indispensable for those who act as Judges.

Of what value, or to what end, were the five previous Commissions, or the present, if all are to remain a dead letter? I have always been of opinion that, by sifting and condensing the information derived from former Commissions, we may yet preserve the entire spirit of our constitution, if not its letter; and I now believe that the best reform will be derived from those sources.

I consider that, by the Charter of the "Impôt" granted by King Charles the Second, the Governor, Bailli, and Jurats must administer that portion of the revenue which is entrusted to their care so long as any two of the Jurats live. That the present members of the States who hold seats for life should retain them so long as they see fit, or their health will permit it. I hold that every Briton, who may purchase a house, or build one, on his own land here, becomes a Jersey man, that he thereby acquires a right to enjoy our privileges, and that he is bound with us to defend them. That his sons, born here, may be Jurats or Rectors of Parishes. That the Bar should be thrown open, as the Bench of Solicitors has been. That two Judges should sit with the Bailli, to try all causes; these three functionaries to be taken from the Jersey Bar. On the illness of one or more of the Judges, the Bailli and Judges to name one or more Barristers to replace the absent Judge or Judges. All the offices of the Court to be held by Jerseymen as above described, practising in it, and being duly qualified. Appeals to be heard by the Judge of Assize (according to our constitution), who might extend his visit from Winchester to Jersey, with a final appeal to the Sovereign in Council. That the States be filled up by election, as are other similar deliberative bodies by members from the various parishes. That, on the demise of the last Jurat but one, the Impost be administered by the Governor, Bailli and States.

Under some such system there seems to be no valid reason why, with such modifications as time, reflection and debate produce, our privileges should not be handed down entire to our descendants. A greater number of situations of dignity and emolument would be open to our children. A higher and more diffused amount of education would be required, as the members of the Bar should be able to plead in either language as they do in Canada. Party spirit could no longer be charged against the Bench: and the money which now goes to England in cases of appeal would be circulated here. So soon as a greater security for property and sound law would be established, so soon as a better law of inheritance, and for the disposal of property, was passed, so soon would the value of land, and of household property, greatly increase.

| | MARY. 1553–1558. | |
| 1 Mary. 1554. 6th February. | This Charter recites a Bull of Pope Sextus IV., dated 1483, confirmed by Edward IV. of England, and Henry VIII., the whole of which it confirms; but the Charter has no reference to mercantile privileges, though called a Charter of Privileges. It is said to have been confirmed by the Queen by two other Charters dated 19th December, 1 A. R. & 1 Mary 2 A. R.: but these I have not seen, and they may relate to other matters. A Transcript of this Charter of 6th February is in the British Museum, Royal MSS. 13 B. I. 5. | Rolls Chapel, Chancery-lane. |
| 3 & 5 Philip and Mary. | Privy Seal to Sir Leonard Chamberlain, Captain of Guernsey, desiring a substantial hearing of a matter respecting a prize laden with French wine, taken by Wm. | Persons residing in Jersey, natives of England, Scotland, and Ireland . | 11,002 |
| Natives of the Island, children of the above residing with their parents . | 2,990 |
| Natives of the Island, born of Jersey parents . . . . . | 30,794 |
| British subjects, neither natives of Jersey nor of Great Britain and Ireland. | 931 |
| Foreigners, principally French . . . . . | 1,839 |
| Total Population in 1841 . . . | 47,556 |
| Ditto in 1831 . . . | 36,582 |
| Increase in Ten Years . . . | 10,974 |

Supposing the increase to have continued at the same rate as the 10 years from 1831 to 1841, the population may now be estimated at 53,000; and, as, during the same period, St. Hélier's parish increased upwards of 6000 out of the 10,974, the population may be fairly calculated at 28,000, 25,000 of which are in the town, and the increase two thirds natives of the United Kingdom.

I beg leave to observe that children of British parents not living with their families, such as married people, servants, &c., are included in the 30,794 under the head "Natives of Jersey born of Jersey parents," so that really the number which may be called English, including British subjects, not natives of Jersey, are equal to one half the population.

Communication from J. Gardner, Esq.

Governor's Office, September 18, 1846.

Sir,

Having been informed that the Constable of St. Hélier has represented that the Island revenue would not be sufficient to cover the expense attending the establishment of a paid police force, I beg leave to inclose herewith a scheme for paying a police establishment, including a sitting magistrate, to take daily cognizance of, and adjudicate upon, all police charges, without interfering with the revenue under the administration of the States.

As the States, in the year 1779, passed an Act imposing a duty on rum and gin, independent of the impôt raised under the authority of the patent of King Charles II., and have lately increased the duty on wines and spirits, to enable them to construct a new harbour, I do not see how they could reasonably object to a light duty on tobacco, for a purpose so important and beneficial.

I beg leave to observe that, were an increase of the members of the States, to twenty six representatives of the people, two for each of the county parishes, and four for St. Hélier's, independent of the clergy, to be proposed, there would be no difficulty in dispensing with the Jurats in the Legislative Assembly, with the general concurrence of the people; while the boon of increasing the number of representatives in the States for a limited period, in place of the Jurats, who are elected for life, would give universal satisfaction; and the present system of electing the Jurats would be easier dispensed with.

I have, &c.,

Charles Clark, Esq.,
&c. &c.

That no direct tax may fall upon the inhabitants for the support of the police force, nor any of the funds at present at the disposal of the States be diverted for that purpose, the following scheme is suggested; viz., a tax on all tobacco imported and consumed in the Island, at 4*d.* per lb, 3942*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, amount of annual tax, at 4*d.* per lb., 3942*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*

Tobacco pays no duty in Jersey, and sells at about 10*d.* per lb.

The weight of the packages not being known, I allow the weight of them to be equal to the quantity legally exported.

Sir,

Communication from Captain Hay.

The Commissioners for inquiring into the Criminal Laws of the Channel Islands have been referred, by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, to you, for information respecting the result of your late inquiries into the state of the Police under the system now in operation in Jersey. They have accordingly directed me to address the following questions to you, and to request that you will, in answer to them, communicate such information as you may consider it proper to furnish.

1. Have you had any, and what, opportunity of acquiring information as to the working of the police system in England?

2. Have you made any, and what, inquiries into the efficiency of the system of police now established at Jersey, and with what result?
3. If it should appear desirable to introduce at Jersey, in the place of the present system, a paid Police for day and night for the whole Island, and a paid Police Magistrate, what, in your opinion, should the numbers be, and what would be the whole expense?
4. To what extent would the expense be diminished, if such a Police were confined to the parish of St. Hélier's, and to such parts of the parish of St. Saviour's as include any part of the town or suburbs of St. Hélier, assuming the Police Magistrate to be retained?
5. To what further extent would the expense be diminished, if such a Police as supposed in the last question were to act for the night only, still retaining the Police Magistrate?
6. Would you propose that such a Police as supposed in any of the last three questions should consist, in the first instance, partly or wholly, of inhabitants of Jersey?
7. Supposing it desirable that few or none of the inhabitants should form a part of such a Police at first, at what rate do you think it might be practicable to introduce them into the body after it had once been put into operation? Can you state at what rate the members of the Metropolitan Police are renewed?
8. Be pleased to make any suggestions which, in your opinion, would be proper to be considered by the Commissioners.

I shall be much obliged by your forwarding your answer to me to the above address.

I have &c.,

CHARLES CLARK,
Secretary to the Commission.

Captain Hay, &c. &c.

SIR, 4, Whitehall-place, February 2, 1847.

I beg leave to inclose, according to your request, for the information of the Commissioners for inquiring into the Laws of the Channel Islands, my answers to the questions contained in your letter of the 29th ultimo.

I have &c.,

W. HAY,
Inspecting Superintendent of Police.

Charles Clark, Esq.,
&c. &c.

---

Answers.

1st. Since my appointment as Inspecting Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police, I have had many opportunities of acquiring information as to the working of the Police system in some of the principal counties in England. I have visited many counties possessing a constabulary, and have had frequent interviews with its officers, and also with influential persons who were well able to judge of its efficiency; and, from all I have seen and heard, I am led to believe that much and great good has resulted from the establishment of a system of Police based upon the Constabulary Act.

2d. Having been directed to proceed to Jersey in September last, to inquire into the state of crime existing in the Island, and to report upon the best method of establishing a paid Police, I had an opportunity, during my stay there, of judging of the efficiency of the system at present in operation; and I am fully impressed with the belief that it is exceedingly ineffective in the prevention of crime and for the due maintenance of the peace in the Island, however much the system may accord with the habits and feelings of the people. The yearly increasing communication with the Island, and the great number of strangers resorting thereto in the summer months, is also an urgent reason why the old system should be abolished, and a system assimilating to that of the Metropolitan or English constabulary be established.

3d. In a Report made by me for the information of the Secretary of State, relative to a paid Police for the Island, I attached a return thereto, of the number of Police which in my opinion would be required, and their yearly expense, a copy of which I annex. [No. 1.] In this Return I did not include the salary of a Police Magistrate, considering that such office might be amalgamated with that of one of the Law Officers of the Crown; as, in all probability, after the establishment of a well regulated Police, the duties of a Police Magistrate would be comparatively light. Assuming, however, that a magistrate were to be appointed, I consider that a salary of 400*l.* per annum would be the amount of pay of such functionary, and which would increase the amount stated on the Return to 2746*l.* per annum.

4th. The Return, No. 2., shows the number of Police required for the town and suburbs of St. Hélier's, and their yearly expense (including the pay of a Police Magistrate), which amounts to 1972*l.* 4*s.*

5th. The Return, No. 3., shows the number of Police required for the night duty, in the town and suburbs of St. Hélier's, and their yearly expense (including the pay of a Police Magistrate), which amounts to 1560*l.* 4*s.*

6th. I should propose that an equal number of inhabitants of the Island, and of strangers, should form the Police on its first formation. The chief officers I would strongly recommend not to be elected from the inhabitants. After a fair trial having been given to the working of the system, it can then be ascertained which of the two classes of constables are the most effective.

JERSEY.

Communication from Captain Hay.

7th. Having, in the reply to question No. 6., expressed an opinion that it would be politic to have an equal number of islanders and strangers in the lower ranks of Police on its establishment, believing that, in that case, a better feeling would be exercised towards them by the inhabitants, and less animosity shown towards the system itself,—if, however, it is considered desirable that few or none of the inhabitants should form part of the Police at first, I think that, if the system obtained the good opinion of the people, it would be objectionable to introduce natives afterwards, unless reliance could be placed upon their performing their duty with perfect impartiality. With reference to the number of changes in the Metropolitan Police annually, the average is nearly 20 per Cent. from the number of men resigning from various causes, being dismissed, dying or worn out and allowed pensions.

8th. I would beg leave in reply, to refer the Commissioners to my Report laid before the Secretary of State in October last, which embodies all the suggestions I am enabled to offer upon the subject of a Police establishment for the Island of Jersey.

To Messrs. Ellis and Bros, Royal Commissioners for the Island of Jersey. JERSEY.

Memorial of P. Lemprière, Esq.

Gentlemen,

The respectful memorial of Philip Lemprière, of the persuasion of the people called Quakers, No. 2, Parade Place, showeth,—

That the Royal Court and the States of Jersey did, in the year 1840, refuse to register an Order in Council, giving force of law to the third and fourth of William the IVth, chap. 49, which order had been solicited by memorials, and audience granted to that effect to a Committee of the Society of Friends by the then Secretary of State, after hearing the distressed state of your memorialist who was then suffering an imprisonment of ten weeks in a most dangerous state of health. The particulars of the said imprisonment will be seen in the Act of the Court of the day of November, 1839, in the case of Halfyard versus Guillemotte, when he was called as evidence. Yet your memorialist had been previously heard as evidence in another case on his solemn declaration in lieu of an oath in Shave versus Russell, as the Act will show, January 25, 1837; and without further reasons the inferior number of the Court set aside the judgement of a full Court. Your memorialist was liberated on bail in the month of January, 1840, pursuant to the judgment of a full Court enacted on a communication of the Secretary of State, through the Lieutenant Governor. The States took the case in hand, and offered to make an Act that would contain the same enactments as the Acts of Parliament objected to; but, instead of which, they surreptitiously withheld the part providing for people of the persuasion (yet not members to the temporal benefits of the society); and also omitting the clauses giving a general application to the Act in all cases where an oath is required. Your memorialist forwarded the needful information to the Council against the Act of the States in that form receiving the Royal Sanction: so that to this day the Island of Jersey is without law on that subject, to the great loss and suffering of your memorialist: for some of the advocates present at a sitting of the Court declare that evidence on affirmation in cases of crime would have no effect; and to these declarations of the gentlemen of the bar your memoralist considers himself indebted for a series of robberies, escalading, and breaking into his premises, with personal ill treatment, practised against him ever since. The said Halfyard, in whose former case the advocates mentioned the above cited opinions, was seized and presented before the Court by Centenier Sorrell, for two robberies of timber found on his premises. The theft had been committed by the aid of a man in his employ in the night: yet the Court, on hearing the conclusions of the Queen's Procureur, admitted Halfyard to bail, in the sum of five pounds. The other man is still in prison. Witnesses have been twice called: yet, as the cause made no progress, when the prisoner Halfyard was allowed to find bail, he felt so far encouraged from the security he felt in your memorialist not taking an oath, as actually to solicit your memorialist whom he had robbed to become his security, and this in open Court. Since that time he has by bargains and strong drinks been enticing the other witness to his employ, and annoying your memorialist publicly with loud and improper language, and in one instance accompanied by the wife of his accomplice. She said, staring and pointing at your memorialist, "that is the crapau, I shall stab him in the same way the woman Le Gendre stabbed the Centenier Le Cronier." A man returning from his work heard this threat; and Constable Le Sueur was informed of it next morning. Effects found of two other robberies are still in possession of Centenier Sorrell. His reluctance to do anything in this case arises from his knowledge of your memorialist's refusal to take an oath. A fall of a large takle found on one Deluche, who was for that offence detained in the hospital by an Officer of Police, was released after two weeks confinement. Your memorialist can positively declare and prove the takle is his, and that he has been obliged at different times to suffer and abandon claims, and can obtain no protection for either life or property: for, when the constable will not interfere officially, there is a process of law called "Jurer les Trèves," which is to swear in open Court the life of the applicant is in danger. Then the Court orders the aggressor to furnish bail for his good and peaceful behaviour towards the injured party; but my persuasion against swearing make the said process of no avail. The above cited and many other grievances too long to detail, your memorialist begs respectfully to solicit the kind offices of the Royal Commissioners to interpose in the matter, the remedy that in their wisdom they shall deem the more salutary; for the authorities here have shown at all times a constant determination to oppose the salutary and paternal enactments from the mother country, both in conscientious and personal liberty, —recently the Habeas Corpus to wit. Yet, in my case, for refusing to comply to take oath, on account of my persuasion, you will see that I have been most grievously injured and outraged, notwithstanding I was most courteous in my conduct to the authorities.

And there are a great many other important matters that ought to come before you, and which up to this time I believe have not reached your ears as Royal Commissioners.

And your memorialist will ever pray, &c.

September 19, 1846. Philip Lemprière.

Gentlemen,

Communication from J. Carré, Jun., Esq.

Being absent from this Island when you commenced the labours of your Commission, I have not had an occasion of being present at any of the sittings except on Saturday last; and, on my return home, I betook myself to put in writing my views on the Criminal Institutions of this Island, and of their defects, and likewise of the abortive attempts which have been made to attempt a reform—which had always failed in consequence of party feeling and want of union on the part of the people. So much so, that it has become the settled opinion of all practical reformers that no reform will ever be accomplished through the efforts of Jerseymen, or by means of the established authorities of the Island—that no reformation worthy of the name will be achieved unless forced upon them. But the Institutions contain within them the elements of correction, so that, without overturning the Institutions, it is possible to so remodel them as to render them in harmony with the present wants of the population. Not being aware that your labours were at an end, I have gone to town intending to present you my written views, and to solicit the favour of a hearing this morning: but, finding that you had left the Island yesterday for Guernsey, I have recourse to the only alternative left me, to send you my manuscript by post, which I beg to submit to your attention and perusal. One thing must strike every impartial observer of the laws and of their administration, and of the institutions, that it is really surprising how, with so many elements of discord, the people have been so quiet and orderly. This is the only favourable feature with Jerseymen, but it is an important one, that they are patient, quiet and orderly; else God knows what would be the consequence; for the whole system, political, civil and criminal, is rotten to the very core.

Apologising for intruding my individual views,

I am, &c.,

That the laws of Jersey, both criminal and civil, need reform to adapt them to the requirements of our age and civilization, and that the institutions themselves require great and important changes in the way of remodelling, no Jerseyman denies; but the great error of most of those who have complained against the laws and institutions of this Island has been to attack the institutions themselves instead of their defects, to attack persons instead of their measures, and the assuming the laws of England to be perfection itself, and then, by a comparison of those laws with ours, condemning our's merely because they differed from the English laws; not because, after a faithful and careful examination, they had been proved to be essentially bad. Now, when a wholesale condemnation of their laws and a total subversion of their institutions were thus avowed and insisted on by their opponents, Jerseymen had a right to demand the reasons, the why and wherefore, of such measures; to demand proof of the evidence of the perfection of the English laws and institutions; to demand likewise proof of the imperfections of the Jersey laws and institutions; such proof to be laid down in a clear and lucid and comprehensive manner, so as to carry conviction to the mind that things are really so, not by the undecisive, unsatisfactory process of taking an assumption of perfection for a position, however false, on the one hand, and then from that position pass a partial judgment, and hurl a sweeping denunciation on the other, merely for differences of detail. I say of detail, because in essence, in principle, our criminal institutions are precisely the same as those of England, and, where they differ (except in two important particulars, of which I will speak presently), that difference is all in favour of ours, and are improvements on those of England.

For example, the appeal from the verdict of the "Enditement" to that of "la Grande Enquête" is a beautiful institution, and is a proof of the interest shown to guard against precipitate and erroneous judgments, and of surrounding an accused person with every possible safeguard. This is an institution which exists in no other place but Jersey; and because of its singularity it has been condemned by some, chiefly it must be confessed by Englishmen, who cannot bear anything that does not exactly tally with their notions of propriety and perfection; but by Frenchmen, who have witnessed the imperfect, and in many particulars, most objectionable practice followed in France, the institution of an appeal in criminal cases from one jury to another has been extolled as one of the most sublime conceptions of the mind of man, as a grand and majestic protection against error or oppression. Indeed, when it is considered that, in a miserable dispute for a few pounds, shillings, and pence, an appeal lies in civil cases from the judgment of the inferior Court, composed of the Bailly and two Jurats, to that of the full Court, composed of seven or more judges, and from the decision of the latter to Her Majesty in Council, on what principle of reason or justice can it be objected that a supposed criminal, whose reputation for life or even his life itself is at stake, should be denied even the protection of one appeal ere the iron stamp of the law sets its brand of infamy on his devoted head? Is not the reputation of a man or woman, and his or her future prospects for life, of much more importance than the gain or loss of a few pounds to one or other of two disputants? Is not the life of a human creature of much more value and importance than the deciding which of two "chicaneurs" shall be constable or centenier of a parish?

Another improvement in our system is, that the Jury are not bound to be unanimous. It has been admitted by law authorities, that the English law, in this respect, is a departure from the original institution—which was, that twelve OUT OF A GREATER NUMBER must agree; which is exactly consonant with the Jersey law as regards the verdict of the "Grande Enquête," that body being composed of twenty four jurors, of which number twenty must agree to give a verdict of Guilty; but, even in this particular, the consciences of the jurors are perfectly free from force or violence, because, in case there be not twenty that do agree, they are not shut up, as would be done in England, until they did agree: no, but, respected and uncontrolled in the event of a disagreement among the jurors, each juror confides his opinion to the Bailly, who, after he has heard them all, declares whether there be a sufficient number agreeing; if there be not twenty, then the prisoner has the benefit thereof. A good deal of misconception has prevailed as respects the number necessary to conviction or acquittal; and by some it has been deemed ridiculous that five or six dissentients on a body of twenty four jurors sufficed to acquit an accused party. But the institution is not, in reality, that five may acquit, but that twenty must agree in order to convict. It stands to reason that, the law requiring the unanimous verdict of twenty of the twenty four jurors, if a lesser number than twenty do agree, that the prisoner must necessarily have the benefit thereof. But the misconception does exist; and the manner in which the Bailly oftentimes announces the opinions of the jurors has tended much to fortify that idea: thus the President will say, " il y en a un nombre suffisant pour déclarer le prisonnier innocent," instead of saying, "Il n'y en a pas un nombre suffisant pour déclarer le prisonnier coupable." By a reference to what takes place after the Bailly has announced the decision of the " Grande Enquête," it will be seen that the construction I have given is correct, and agrees with the whole theory of the institution. After announcing the Jury's verdict, the Bailly calls on the Procureur Général, who draws his conclusions to the effect that the prisoner be discharged. Now, if five dissentients did acquit, of what use would it be to call on the prosecutor to know his wish in the matter? Would it not suffice for the Bailly to say, " Prisonnier vous pouvez vous retirer," since he would be free by virtue of the verdict? But no; because twenty do not agree, no conviction follows, and the prisoner receives the boon of a liberation at the hands of both the prosecutor and the Court, in consequence of the doubt implied by the non-unanimous verdict given by the jury.

JERSEY.

Communication from J. Carré, Jun., Esq.

It appears to me that, in point of fact, the " enditement " represents the institution of the " grand jury" of England; because the prisoner is not treated as a supposed criminal until after the verdict of the " enditement;" after which verdict he is generally handcuffed, and reappears before the Court surrounded by bodyguards, called hallebardiers; and from the wording of the accusation, when presented before " la grande enquête," thus " endité criminellement par l'enditement de la paroisse de—," which in English, means " against whom a true bill has been found." If a prisoner be acquitted by the enditement he is instantly liberated, the same as in England if no bill were found; and, if he be found guilty, that is endité, he may submit to judgment on that finding—or he may demand " le bénéfice de la grande enquête du pays," which exactly corresponds with the English system of " appearing before his peers," of " being tried by God and his country."

Why the Jury of Appeal is called " Grande Enquête," does not exactly appear; it may be because of its being composed of a greater number of persons than the enditement, but, more probably, because of its being composed of " principaux de paroisse." And it is because of its being composed of " principaux," that some who dream of nothing else but English laws and institutions have wished the " grande enquête" to sit first; then the enditement to follow. The terms of denomination used by the English journals here, of " petty jury " and " grand jury," are not legal or correct terms, but an Anglicanism or borrowing words from England. Besides not being satisfied with the assumed perfection of the English institution nor convinced that it is the best of two systems, Jerseymen prefer the guaranty of an appeal on the question of fact, which cannot be denied to be a great safeguard, to the merely matter of routine of English grand juries, who only decide whether there be sufficient grounds to prosecute. In our opinion, such an inquiry is more properly in the province of the magistrate, an institution which Jersey has not. But the appointment of magistrates to hear complaints and to commit prisoners to stand their trial cannot be a sufficient reason for the abolition of one of the juries, as propounded by Mr. Advocate Hammond, but would be an additional guaranty against improper imprisonments previous to trial: and the institution of a sitting magistrate to hear and investigate complaints, would also do away with the illegal assumption of power exercised by the Police, of liberating persons of their own free will.

Now, as regards the composition of the juries in criminal cases, two grand defects in our system appear prominently. 1st. That the " officiers du connétable " compose the enditement, and 2nd. That the Procureur Général, the prosecutor of the prisoner, himself selects the persons who are to compose " la grande enquête." The composing the enditement by police officers might have answered very well in bye-gone ages, when the population was small and the calls and exigencies of society were different to those of the present day. Then " les officiers du connétable " had not the right of arrest, but merely to assist their chief, and were more properly his immediate advisers. Thus the institution did not appear so objectionable in principle as it does now that their powers have been increased. But, although some reason can be shown by a reference to what police officers were formerly (for the " officiers du connétable " have always been considered as the advisers of the constable; which fact appears in the oath of office, thus: acting agreeably " à l'avis et bon conseil des principaux et officiers de votre paroisse ") as an excuse for their composing " l'enditement," it is difficult to find any reason for the anomaly, that the prosecutor choses the members of " la grande enquête," except in the severity of the laws and institutions of former times, or the grasping disposition at power, which may be termed " envahissements " of the Crown officers. I suspect the latter supposition to be the true one.

The police officers have, however, no wish to retain these onerous duties; they would on the contrary rejoice at being relieved from them: and the present Crown officers have likewise no wish to retain the power of selecting the members of the jury. The Solicitor General caused a projét de loi to be presented on the subject to the States to reform the law on the constitution of the juries; but, in consequence of a senseless attempt to abolish one of the juries, which in part succeeded, that learned gentleman abandoned the matter; and it has not since been taken up. The reform proposed by the Solicitor General was amply sufficient, doing away with the two grand defects previously mentioned, and was in accordance with the views expressed by Mr. Advocate Godfray before the Commissioners. The qualification for jurymen of the enditement was proposed to be from six quarters upwards, and under twenty quarters on the rate list; and for jurymen of the " Grande Enquête" from twenty quarters and upwards. In both cases, when a jury were to be called, the Sheriff to have the names of all the persons subject to serve as jurymen of the parish from which the jury were to be called placed in a box or urn; from which a certain number were to be drawn by him in the presence of the Bailly and Crown officers. In consequence of the great increase of voters now on the list, the qualification could be fixed at from six quarters to twenty quarters for the "enditement," and all persons registered above twenty quarters on the parish rate-list, for the "grande enquête." These changes in the law would be well received by the whole population; but the abandonment of one of the juries would, I am convinced, be objected to by the great majority of the people: for, although the greater portion of those who appear before the juries are not natives, but strangers to the soil, still the inhabitants would not depart from what they consider, and I believe with much reason, an important guaranty and safeguard.

Another great advantage to an accused person exists in the manner of constituting la grande nquête, which is, that only eight of the jurors are taken in the parish where the crime was committed, the remaining sixteen being called in equal numbers from two adjoining parishes, thus having sixteen jurors strangers to the parish where the crime was committed, and perhaps all of them ignorant of the commission of said crime, consequently not influenced by partial reports or idle conversation on the subject, previous to appearing in their place at Court.

There is another point to which I would advert, it is, "the changing the venue of the Jury," for which there is, it seems, no law or authority. I know of only two instances. The first was on the prosecution by the Lieutenant Governor, the late Major General Thornton, of Mr. Advocate Godfray, then constable of St. Hélier's, for "misprision of treason;" in which, Mr. Godfray threatening to challenge the "enditement" of his parish, which was composed entirely of political opponents, the Procureur Général called the enditement of St. Saviour's, the parish which Mr. Godfray now represents. The second case was that of Mrs. Le Gendre for the murder of the late Mr. Le Cronier; when, as Mr. Le Cronier was a police officer, it was not thought advisable to have the jury from town, and the Procureur Général summoned the enditement of St. John's parish. Now, although in both these cases the change of venue was most just and reasonable, and all to the advantage of the defendants, still it must be confessed that the change ought not to depend upon the will of the prosecutor, but should be authorised by law, and the law ought to express the mode of proceeding in the matter. It seems to me that the prosecutor ought not to have the power of changing the venue except in cases where the interests of the Crown were involved, and then only after having made a representation to the Court, and obtained their sanction; and that, in all other cases, the venue ought not to be changed, except at the request of a prisoner's counsel made in Court; the Court alone to have the power to state from which parish the jury is to be drawn.

It would be advisable that the Criminal Court held sessions, as is done in other places, and not mix up criminal and civil causes together, as is now done, to the detriment of civil suitors, who are oftentimes obliged to return home with a host of witnesses without having had a hearing, although the cases had been summoned for that particular day. But, the Crown officers having the privilege of presenting their causes first, it has been alleged that, from motives of "calculation," causes have been thus presented to prevent other causes from being called before certain magistrates, whose judgment was feared, and in order to cause them to be heard before other Jurats, whose judgment was desired and sought. This is called "calcul de jours," calculation of days; and the practice has been repeatedly alleged to take place. The officers of the Court or Advocates could explain the matter. I have seen the charge made repeatedly in the "Chronique de Jersey," and "l'Impartial." I have seen shown how and by what means certain causes had been delayed, in order that others might be called for a hearing in the presence of Messrs. So and So, who were to be Jurats of the day. Not having taken the trouble or had the desire to ascertain how far such was the case, I cannot give any explanation; but the gentlemen who have advanced the charge, or some of their friends, may be able and willing to furnish the explanation. This much I do know, that, when certain causes were to be called for a hearing, chiefly political causes I admit, that it was usual to cast an eye on the magisterial bench, to see "who were the men of the day," and immediately predict how the case would be decided; and, moreover, that rarely was the prediction falsified.

The constitution of Jersey views the connétable as a person of importance, somewhat akin to the mayors of England. The office is held to be most honourable, the English word constable not conveying to the mind the meaning of the office, its attributions, or the nature of its powers. This is in consequence of the amalgamation, or "mixtion de pouvoirs," which prevail here. The connétable is both civil and political chief of his parish. The constable is always a party man, be he Rose or be he Laurel; it is not, therefore, too much to suppose, for whoever has studied human nature will readily conceive the possibility, that the constable will be disposed to be lenient with those he knows to be his friends, and to be cold, dédaigneux, if not absolutely provokingly harsh towards his political opponents; and it is notorious that great partiality and injustice has prevailed and does prevail in consequence of party predilection or animosity. In a small community like this, where every one is known, the espousing the cause of either party is sure to be observed, because the elections, being numerous, are consequently frequent; and, as the "officiers de connétable," be they Rose or Laurel, are the most active of canvassers, every voter is visited, and the opinions and feelings of all are known to them. It has been observed by several persons heard before the Commissioners, that favoritism or injustice has been the consequence of the elector's vote at the poll; this is so notoriously true, that it has been publicly stated and avowed in the States at one of their recent meetings, by Mr. Advocate Godfray, in his place as constable of St. Saviour's, that he had been "connétable" in three different parishes, in St. Helier's, in St. Martin's, and in St. Saviour's, that he had been in the minority and in the majority, that in the three parishes he had seen the same principle to prevail, that when his party were in the minority his opponents acted unjustly towards his friends, and that when in the majority his friends were unjust towards their opponents. This frank avowal of the learned gentleman could not, cannot be gainsayed: but what is to be done? Here is the difficulty: few appear disposed to take up the subject because of its importance and magnitude, and the opposition which is likely to be the consequence of attempting to reform the abuses complained of. The remedy, however, is simple, though severe, the separation of the political and civil powers throughout our institutions.

By depriving the Police of their political powers, I do not mean to disfranchise them, and not allow them to make use of their undoubted right as other citizens, but that the civil and political functions be severed, that they be not members of the Parish Assembly by virtue of their office; for it is a matter of fact that the "assemblées de paroisses" at which the police officers always make it a point of duty to attend, and where they exert a very great influence, far from meeting for the purpose of making a just and honest distribution of the rate (the ostensible purpose, nevertheless), on the contrary, meet there, bent upon nothing else but the fortifying one party and damaging the other. Thus the parish of St. Martin's has been for the last twelve years the arena of the most disgraceful scenes and the greatest injustice, sometimes by the Laurel against the Rose, sometimes of the Rose against the Laurel. At the present moment, through party opposition, that parish is deprived of its constable and one of its centeniers. Nearly all the parishes have been in the same state of ferment within a certain number of years: and many of them have been, by party opposition, deprived of the services of their elected chief or chiefs, sometimes by the hitherto dominant party who had lost the day, sometimes by the party in the minority, who alleged injustice or corruption. In the parish of St. Laurens, last year, the Laurel majority actually struck off the rate list the name of their constable, thus disfranchising their own chief because he was a Roseman; and, in the parish of Trinity, the Rose majority did the same thing to an ex-constable of that parish, who paid his rate as "principal," the son in law of one of the Jurats of the Royal Court, because he was a Laurel man. Now, in all these proceedings, the several polices take an active part, and are, in fact, the chief abettors of these unseemly proceedings.

Edward Nicolle, Jun., Esq., is of opinion, that the police is not an efficient police for the town and parish of St. Hélier's, in consequence of the great increase of population and commerce. Mr. Nicolle is reputed a Rose man; and this candid opinion of his on the subject, is the more worthy of respect and consideration; but that gentleman is known as a thorough reformer; he has stood the brunt and even recriminations of his own party, because of his honesty to avow defects and anomalies in the institutions, and of his unflinching advocacy, boldness and courage in the cause of reform. Mr. Nicolle's opinion is held by very many of the town people, and the only obstacle in the way of the establishment of a paid police has been the expense. I have myself, both in writing and by vote in the parish meetings, opposed the establishment of a paid police; but the opinion is gaining ground, and there exists a very prevalent feeling that something in that way must be done; for it is too much to expect that the gentlemen who compose the police, most of whom are in business, and consequently have their own interests to attend to, can sacrifice by night and by day the requisite time to effectually perform the duties of police in a population so extensive as that of St. Hélier's. Some of the gentlemen of the town police have, I believe, expressed themselves not opposed to the appointment of a limited number of paid policemen, to act in concert with the present honorary police, and to be under the control and orders of the constable. But it would be objected against this expedient that the honorary police would resign what is vulgarly called "the dirty work" to the paid police, and reserve the honorary, that is political work, to themselves; and, perhaps, play the "gentleman" while the others would only be "hommes de bras."

If the present system of honorary police be continued, then that body must be considerably increased. The chief obstacle in the way of an increase of the police in town has been, the additional political power that such an increase would give to the dominant party. Hence, the evident necessity for a separation of the political and civil functions. As to the country parishes, whose populations are small, the present unpaid police could continue to exist as hitherto (but divested of their political functions), as it is usually the practice, in all the parishes, to choose persons living in different districts, thus dividing the police force as much as possible in the various vingtaines or cantons. It is my opinion that much good would result from the severance of the civil and political functions of the police throughout the island; that it would be the means of allaying much of the effervescence and spirit of party which unhappily exist to a great extent. As a demonstration of the trickery to which persons are sometimes obliged to have recourse, in order to regain or assert their rights, I will instance the case of Mr. Gallichan (son in law of Judge Le Maistre, referred to in the foregoing), and three other voters who had been struck off the list by the Parish Assembly of Trinity; it has been asserted that the Solicitor General, who was to present their claim to the Court, actually carried the remonstrances three months in his pocket, watching for an opportunity to present them in the ABSENCE of Mr. Advocate Le Sueur. One day, as his learned opponent was enjoying the benefit of open air, the Solicitor General pulled out of his pocket the "remonstrances," and got them admitted, and his four friends rated. As soon as Mr. Le Sueur heard what was going on at Court, he hurried off thither; but came "just in time to be too late;" he, however, addressed the Court on the subject, complained that the claims had been received, and the parish condemned in costs exparte, and on that account demanded the suspension of the judgment just given. Now mark the result! the two Jurats of the day were, one Laurel, the other Rose; and their judgment was precisely in accordance with the political views they and their friends entertained. Jurat Le Gallais said, the same Court could not undo what had been done, but only the superior Court, which was correct in law; Jurat Arthur, on the contrary, was for suspending the judgment just given, for the reasons assigned; when the Bailly, by the casting vote, maintained the judgment rendered, and set the matter at rest. It is not merely in the election of municipal officers that party spirit shows itself; so powerful is the influence of these political bodies of police and their friends, that they control the general elections and materially assist in bringing about the election of their staunchest friends to the bench.

JERSEY.

Communication from J. Carré, Jun., Esq.

At the present moment, of the twelve Jurats now sitting on the bench, only seven have walked over the course without opposition, namely, Messrs. De Ste. Croix, Edw. Nicolle, Ph. W. Nicolle, Bertram, Le Couteur, Picot and Pelgué. But even these seven gentlemen, although all of them most worthy men, and enjoying the esteem of all for their domestic virtues and high standing, had been, with the exception of Mr. Picot, party men, and would have been opposed on that account had the Laurel party considered themselves sufficiently strong to risk a contest. Of the other five Jurats, all of them have been called to the bench by a party majority, or, what is still worse, by party intrigue and chicanery. Jurat Marett, a Laurel man, obtained his seat by judgment and contestation, in spite of the electoral body, he being in an enormous minority: the next, Mr. Le Maistre, at the time of his election was a Rose man; and on that account his being sworn to office was opposed by the Laurel party, who alleged, among other objections, his being illiterate and otherwise incompetent to fulfil the duties of the office. Although that gentleman obtained a majority of upwards of 200 votes, he was kept out of office for about two years, after which time it was rumoured that his political views had undergone a change; and the Laurel party, in the hope that in future he might be "a Laurel man true," all at once found him a most "competent" person, dropped the opposition; and he was sworn into office. This was the first election in which I was qualified to vote; and I voted for Mr. Le Maistre. The next, Jurat Bisson, carried his election by a triumphant Rose majority. I likewise voted for that gentleman. Jurat Le Gallais was elected by a small Laurel majority. I likewise voted for Mr. Le Gallais, not that I approved of his party, but because that gentleman had practised at Court for a great number of years, and that, from his extensive knowledge of our laws and customs, I considered him eminently qualified. The last, Jurat Arthur, carried the day by an immense Rose majority, the consequence, as the defeated party allege, of the partial distribution of the rate in the preceding January. I likewise voted for Mr. Arthur. I have not had occasion to judge of him at Court; but in the States he is one of the most liberal in his views and vote. Of the seven Rose Jurats first mentioned, I have voted for those of them who have been elected since I have been qualified to vote, except one or two. I am, and in principle, have always been a Rose man; but attachment to my party will not prevent, and has never prevented, me from avowing the truth, because indeed the complaint of reformers is not against men but against the system. By Rose men, I mean the movement or reforming party; but I regret to say that, when in power, the Rose party have not always been reformers, but that, having the majority, they have oftentimes acted as though the struggle had only been to overturn their opponents and occupy their places; and the Laurel party, when in power, have done the same, finding every thing in the most perfect condition because they had the mastery. And it would not be too much to avow that, had that party succeeded in electing their candidate at the last election for a Jurat, and thereby had the prospect of gaining other elections, they would have opposed everything in the shape of real and substantial reform, as they have formerly done. A circumstance worthy of observation is, that, although the Jurats must have had innumerable occasions of witnessing the imperfections of the laws, not one of them has ever presented any amendment to said laws, in his place in the States.

Although many would willingly give up their right to vote in the election of Jurats, I verily believe that any alteration in the mode of election or infringement of the right of election would be disapprobated by the great, very great, majority of the people; and this feeling is not entertained by one party alone but by both, yet less strongly by the Laurel than the Rose party. Indeed, it would appear more urgent to establish the qualifications necessary in the candidate, than to change the mode of election. The Bar should be thrown open, and the future selections of Judges to be confined to persons taken from among the Advocates. But then it would not be fair to do away with the present Jurats, and immediately choose two Judges from the present limited number of Advocates: besides, that would not be an improvement on the present system, because the gentlemen of the Jersey Bar are all party men, and much more versed in the system of intrigue and chicanery that prevails here than in the general principles of jurisprudence. It would suffice for the Government to renew the practice of sending the justiciers itinerant to hold sessions here once a-year, and to revise the judgments of the Court; an institution recognised by our Constitution. The sending justiciers itinerant to revise the judgments of the Court would be a most salutary check against the errors of judgment so much complained of, and be a bar against political resentments. Were the practice spoken of revived, there would then be no necessity for having so large a number of Jurats as twelve; two Judges with the Chief Justice would suffice to form the Court; and, in order to maintain to the people the privilege of appeal, the itinerant Judges might be considered the court of appeal in all cases where, according to law, appeal lies to the superior Court, and from the judgments of the itinerant Judges an appeal to Her Majesty in Council, as allowed by law. In order to reduce the number of Judges to two, the present Jurats could be allowed to retain their seats in the States during life, and the electoral body be required to choose two out of the twelve to form the new Court; and that afterwards, any vacancy on the bench be filled up by the election of persons chosen from the Jersey Bar. The two Judges to have fixed salaries of so much per annum, and, although allowed to sit in the States, and even to offer their opinions and views on questions of law, not to be allowed to vote. As to the reconstruction of the States in consequence of the reform of the Court, the proposition made in the States by Mr. Advocate Godfray, when he was constable of St. Hélier's, which at the time was much approved of, and would still be approved of by the great majority of the people, was this—That the twelve Jurats and twelve Rectors be continued for life members of the

JERSEY.

Communication from J. Carré, Jun., Esq.

States; that, on the demise or resignation of either Jurats or Rectors, the places of Rectors be filled up by representatives chosen by the parishes wherein the vacancy occurs; and of Judges, by the parishes having the largest population in rotation; and, in definitive, that the States, after the demise or resignation of all the Jurats and Rectors, be composed of representatives triennially chosen by the parishes, each parish to send 3 members, and the town to be allowed for excess of population 4 additional members; thus composing the States of 40 members, instead of 66 as at present. But the reform proposed by Mr. Godfray, although good so far as it went, did not go far enough, because it proposed to continue the constable or municipal chief a member of the States, and left the constitution of the "assemblées de paroisses" untouched, instead of severing the political and civil functions throughout the institutions. For, if it be an axiom that the Judge ought not to be a legislator, it must with still more force and reason be maintained that "a political body of police" is, and must of necessity be, a faulty institution.

Several attempts at reform have been made; but, in consequence of opposition on the one hand and indifference on the other, nothing has been done. The first attempt, in my recollection, was made by Mr. Godfray, constable of St. Hélier's; but, in consequence of his proposing to remodel the Court by the election of two judges chosen from the Jersey Bar; a formidable opposition was raised against the project because of the limited number of Advocates, which caused the Bar to be called after the name of the sinecure seats of the old British Parliament, a rotten borough! The Bar should have been previously thrown open. The next attempt, some time after, was the establishment of a "Reform Society," to be composed of electors, without reference to party, who maintained and held the separation of the judicial and legislative functions necessary, and the insisting on the States being composed solely of representatives triennially elected: after the first election, one-third to go out at the end of the first year, these to be those who had obtained the lesser number of votes; another third at the end of the second year, and so on; thus renewing the personnel of the States in a easy and practicable manner, as is done in England in respect of the municipal corporations. The States thus reformed to choose their own Speaker or President, subject to the approbation of Her Majesty in Council, to be conveyed through the Lieutenant Governor; the Governor retaining "a veto" on the Acts of the Assembly, as hitherto. This society obtained a certain footing in two parishes, St. Hélier's and St. Brélade's; but all attempts which the Committee made to introduce it into other parishes failed, particularly in the parish of St. Lawrence, then a stronghold of the Laurel party; they approved, said they, the principles, but would not bind themselves in any manner; the same result followed an attempt to introduce it into Grouville, then a Rose parish. It was evident that neither one or other party honestly and conscientiously desired a reform; men were men of party; and they combatted each other for the mastery, without knowing why or wherefore, save the love of dominancy; for they had not, and never have had, any distinct political principle to fight for. It is that which makes the contestations of Jersey appear so ridiculous, that neither party has any particular or distinguishing principle in view. Nevertheless, soon after the formation of the Reform Society, a vacancy occurred on the Bench. I, as secretary, addressed circulars to the two candidates to know their views on the plan of reform; and, the answer of the candidate of the Laurel party being the most satisfactory of the two, the members of the Society voted for him. This was Mr. Le Couteur, the present vicomte, who carried the day by a triumphant majority of upwards of 200 votes!

Some time after, through the opposition of adversaries and the coldness of professed friends, the Society gradually dwindled away. Another attempt was made, some years after: a public meeting was called which was numerously attended; which meeting was presided by Mr. Edw. Nicolle, Jun., previously named, at which a petition to the States was agreed to; the petition obtained a goodly number of signatures, and was, I believe, presented to the States; but nothing has been done, and the matter has been left at rest. The love of power with the leading men of both parties has been the cause of the failure at every attempt to reform the Court and the States. There are few really liberal men in the States. I believe, Judge Edward Nicolle is favourable to a separation of the judicial and legislative functions, as likewise Judges Marett, Le Maistre, and Le Gallais.

In respect to the constitution of the "parish assemblies," a good deal could be said, and the defects of the institution clearly demonstrated. For efficiency, an elective municipality, as in England, would be far more effective for the purpose intended, of which the Mayor or Connétable would be President. The members of the "assemblée de paroisse" ought not to go there in right of their property, but by the election and choice of their fellow townsmen; and a public body of twenty four men thus chosen would fulfil the duties of their office much more efficiently and with more impartiality than the 300 persons who now have a right to attend there by virtue of their property; for it cannot but appear most probable that all these gentlemen will go there on the rating days to protect themselves, and throw the burthen of the rate on their poorer fellow-citizens, who have no vote, and who, although allowed to be present, cannot speak except it be on the question of their individual rate. But, as this question does not enter into the objects of the present enquiry, I will not pursue.

COMMISSION.

VICTORIA by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland QUEEN Defender of the Faith. To Our trusty and well beloved THOMAS FLOWER ELLIS, Esquire, Barrister at Law and THOMAS BROS, Esquire, Barrister at Law, greeting.

WHEREAS We have deemed it expedient for divers good reasons and considerations that a Commission should forthwith issue for enquiring into the Criminal Laws now in force in Our Channel Islands and into the constitutions and powers of the Tribunals and Authorities charged with the execution of such Laws. Now KNOW YE that WE having especial trust and confidence in your wisdom and fidelity have assigned nominated and appointed and do by these presents assign nominate and appoint you the said THOMAS FLOWER ELLIS and THOMAS BROS to be Our Commissioners to go into our said Islands for the purposes aforesaid. And for the better effecting the purposes of this Our Commission, We do by these presents give and grant to you or any one of you full power and authority to call before you or any one of you such persons as you shall judge necessary by whom you may be the better informed on the subject of this Our Commission and of every matter connected therewith. And also to call for have access to and examine all such official Books Documents Papers and Records as may afford the fullest information on the subject, and to enquire of and concerning the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever. And We do hereby give and grant to you or any one of you full power and authority where the same shall appear to be requisite to administer an Oath or Oaths to any person or persons whatsoever to be examined before you or any one of you touching or concerning the premises. And Our further will and pleasure is, that you do and shall with as little delay as possible report to Us in Our Privy Council under your hands and seals respectively your several Proceedings by virtue of this Our Commission as the same shall be respectively completed and perfected. And We will and Command and by these presents ordain that this Our Commission shall continue in full force and virtue and that you Our said Commissioners or any one of you may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof and of every matter and thing therein contained although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment. And we do hereby require all and every Our Officers and Ministers in our said Islands respectively to be aiding and assisting to you and each of you in the due execution of this Our Commission. And we have made choice of Our trusty and well-beloved CHARLES CLARK Esquire Barrister at Law to be Secretary to this Our Commission and to attend you in the execution thereof whose service and assistance we require you to use from time to time as occasion may require. In witness whereof We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent. Witness Ourself at Westminster, the Sixteenth day of May in the ninth year of our Reign.

By Writ of Privy Seal,

EDMUNDS.

SECOND REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY IN COUNCIL.

GUERNSEY.

We, whose hands and seals are hereunto set, Commissioners, appointed by Your Majesty's Commission, bearing date the 16th day of May, in the ninth year of Your Majesty's reign, for inquiring into the Criminal Laws in force in Your Majesty's Channel Islands and into the constitutions and powers of the Tribunals and Authorities charged with the execution of such laws, humbly certify to Your Majesty that, having completed our inquiry so far as the same related to the Island of Jersey, the result of which we have already laid before Your Majesty in our First Report, we forthwith proceeded, in further obedience to Your Majesty's gracious commands, to the Island of Guernsey.

At an early day after our arrival there, a special meeting of the Royal Court was convened, at which we were invited to attend, when Your Majesty's Commission, having been presented to the Court by the Secretary to the Commission, was read in open court by Your Majesty's Procureur before the Bailiff and Jurats there, in the presence of his Excellency the Lieutenant Governor; and an Acte of Court was passed, in conformity with precedent, for its registration.

We do not think it necessary to detail our proceedings previous to commencing the inquiry in Guernsey, nor to state at length the mode adopted by us in conducting it while there; but for these particulars we consider it sufficient to refer to our First Report, as, in these respects, the course which we followed with regard to both Islands was substantially the same.

Our sittings were conducted in open court, and were constantly attended by the Bailiff, the Jurats of the Royal Court, Your Majesty's Law Officers, the Greffier, the Prevôt, and the practising Advocates of the Court. From all these gentlemen we received valuable aid, as well by the written answers which they had returned to our preliminary questions, as by the assiduity and intelligence with which they assisted at the oral examination, and the readiness which they shewed in supplying us with information on all points connected with the object of the Commission.

In our First Report we stated that we had derived valuable assistance, in our inquiry at Jersey, from suggestions made to us by non-professional persons; but that the evidence was much coloured by the violent conflict of opinions which exists respecting the institutions of that Island. We found a very different state of things at Guernsey. Little was offered to us by the inhabitants, as distinguished from the functionaries, which threw light on the general working of the system. The complaints preferred to us were not many; and of these by far the greater part related to individual grievances, which, assuming the complaints to be just, could not be traced to any peculiarity in the Criminal Law or Tribunals, and into which, therefore, we did not feel ourselves authorized to inquire. We were indeed assured, from more than one quarter, that, but for the dread entertained of the great power and influence possessed by the Jurats, important evidence would have been offered to us. How far this was true we had no means of ascertaining. The assertion was, of course, not disproved by the fact that such evidence was not offered; and we think that the preponderance of the Jurats was shewn to be sufficient to suggest such an apprehension. But we could not see beyond this. On the whole, however, we came to the conclusion that there prevails nothing like a general dislike or suspicion of the present system; and that whatever prejudice or passion is felt on the subject is, without much exception, in favour of the existing institutions.

We shall now proceed to lay before Your Majesty the result of our inquiry into the Criminal Laws in force in the Bailiwick of Guernsey, and the constitution and power of the Tribunals and Authorities charged with the execution of the same, pointing out what have occurred to us as the principal defects, as well in the existing laws as in their administration and the constitution of the Tribunals; and humbly suggesting, for the consideration of Your Majesty, certain amendments which appear to us to be required.

GUERNSEY.

The Bailiwick of Guernsey, besides the Island of Guernsey and the adjacent Islets of Herm and Jethou, comprises the more distant Islands of Sark and Alderney. Each of the last two possesses a Criminal Tribunal, of a limited jurisdiction, dependent on the Royal Court at Guernsey, of which the jurisdiction extends throughout the Bailiwick.

The Criminal Law of Guernsey is derived from sources similar to those pointed out in our First Report as the origin of the Criminal Law in Jersey: namely, first, the Customary Law; secondly, the Charters; thirdly, the Orders of the Sovereign in Council; fourthly, the Ordinances of the Local Legislature; fifthly, certain Statutes of the Realm.

The Customary Law, however, seems never to have been precisely the same in the two Islands, the Grand Coustumier de Normandie having never been received as law in Guernsey to the extent to which it prevailed in Jersey. The former Island, probably, was at all times governed by a local custom, differing, as was frequently the case in Normandy, in some particulars, from the general custom of the Duchy. This appears from the answer of the inhabitants of Guernsey, given upon the holding of certain Placita de quo Warranto, before Sir John de Fresingfeld, in the second year of King Edward II. "Communitas hujus insulæ, allocuta quâ lege utuntur et per quam legem clamant deduci, an, videlicet, per legem Anglorum, vel Normannorum, aut per speciales consuetudines eis per Reges concessas, dicunt quòd nec per legem Anglorum, nec Normannorum, sed per certas consuetudines in hâc insulâ usitatas a tempore quo memoria non existit."

In proof of these customs a document was produced to us, regarded as of very high authority in Guernsey, styled the Précepte d'Assise. The opinion of Colonel De Havilland, one of the Jurats of the Royal Court who has made the history of his country his peculiar study, is that, prior to and at the beginning of the reign of Edward the Third, Commissioners were almost periodically sent to the Island, about every three years, and that, from their not knowing the customs and usages of the Island, their decisions were always at fault, and great numbers of complaints were made, which were at last gathered together; and Sir Henry Spigurnell, and, the individuals named in the Précepte d'Assise, were sent, in the 17th year of Edward the Second, to examine into those decisions. They declared the decisions to be of none effect, and that the inhabitants of the Island continued in the enjoyment of their liberties and privileges as fully as before those processes and decisions had taken place. But, as their judgment did not declare what those liberties were, but only that the inhabitants possessed the right of enjoying them, annulling the old proceedings which had been in opposition to them, the Court had them laid down and approved by Sir Henry Spigurnell and his associates, and afterwards by the different Justices in Eyre named in the Précepte d'Assise. We have not been able to satisfy ourselves that this view is correct. The document produced before us bears date the 23rd of September, 1693, and professes to be taken from a copy of the original instrument made the 30th of September, 1489, by Nicholas Effard, the then Lieutenant Bailiff of Guernsey. The instrument, in form, is a certificate by the Bailiffs and Jurats, dated the 30th of September, 1441, setting forth the liberties, usages and ancient customs of Guernsey as found by inquests of the Douzaines of each of the parishes of the Island, witnessing that they are the same with those proved before Sir Robert de Norton and Sir William de la Rue, Justices in Eyre, in the 5th year of Edward the Third, also before Sir Henry Spirgurnell and William Denon, and in like manner before Sir Robert de Scarboro' and his companions, Justices, and more fully set forth in an instrument called the Extente of the said King (that is, Edward the Third). We thought it necessary, from the importance attached to this document by the Royal Court, on our return to England, to search among the records in the custody of the Master of the Rolls for the documents referred to. The record of the pleas before Sir Henry Spigurnell and William Denon, in the 17th year of Edward the Second, still exists among the records of the public Record Office; but we have not been able to trace the connection between those proceedings and the Précepte d'Assise. It appears, from the Placita of 17 Ed. 2., that the King had assigned John de Fresingfeld and certain Justices therein mentioned, to inquire, amongst other things, into the subtraction of certain rights of the Crown in the Island of Guernsey, and that the Islanders had petitioned the King in Parliament, complaining of the judgment of De Fresingfeld and his companions as erroneous, and also of certain wrongs done them by Otho de Grandison, the Custos of the Island; whereupon the King sent other justices, namely, William de Bourne, Nicholas de Cheney, and John de Carteret, to review the judgment of the former, and to inquire into the wrongs alleged to have been done to the Islanders by the Bailiff and Ministers of Otho. And, upon a suggestion that the Justices last-named had exceeded their authority, the writ of 17 Ed. 2. was directed to Sir Henry Spigurnell, William Denom, and two others, to review the proceedings, and also to inquire into the subtraction of the said rights of the Crown. The proceedings before William de Bourne and his fellows are set out at length, in which the inhabitants of Guernsey claim, for themselves and all their ancestors, islanders of the said Island, certain rights and liberties comprising most of the articles of the so called Constitutions of King John, together with many others. The judgment of De Bourne and his fellows is in the following words. "Ideo consideratum est per Justiciarios et Juratos secundum legem et consuetudinem patriæ, quòd prædicta Communitas per prædictas libertates et consuetudines de cetero deducatur, et quòd dicta Communitas uti et gaudere debeat predictis consuetudinibus et libertatibus, salvo jure domini Regis." This was evidently a decision by the Jurats, in conjunction with the King's Justices, upon their own privileges. The proceedings of 17 Ed. 2., before Sir Henry Spigurnell and William Denon, are in the nature of a writ of error upon this judgment, which is reversed for the errors assigned, principally that the Court had exceeded its jurisdiction. The proceedings before Sir Robert de Scarborough and his companions are also extant among the public records in the custody of the Master of the Rolls. They are of the 5th of Edward the Third, and are pleas in a writ of quo warranto, calling in question the rights and liberties before mentioned. The answer of the inhabitants is, "Quoad prædictas libertates de habendo duodecim Juratos de se ipsis et quod omnia placita, quæcunque fuerint, debeant hic terminari et non alibi adjornari &c., dicunt quod ipsi et omnes antecessores sui a tempore quo non extat memoria, inde seisiti fuerunt sine temporis interruptione, &c. Et quoad omnes alias libertates petunt quod ipsi ad invicem possunt habere colloquium et avisamentum." The result of the proceedings is that judgment is given against the Islanders by default, and the liberties are seized into the King's hands.

We also caused search to be made for the document referred to in the Précepte d'Assise, and there called the Extente of the King; but the record is missing. A writ, however, exists in the Patent Rolls of 4 Ed. 3., addressed to John de Roches, the Custos of the Islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Sark and Alderney, Robert de Norton, and William de la Rue, a copy of which was produced before us in evidence, which is considered in Guernsey to be connected with the Précepte d'Assise. It commands the above named Commissioners to inquire "qui et quot Ministri et Officiarii vadia aut alia feoda a nobis percipiunt in Insulis prædictis et percipere consueverunt, et quæ et cujusmodi vadia et feoda, et à quo tempore, ex quâ causâ, et qualiter et quo modo, ac de aliis articulis præmissa tangentibus." There is also another writ in the Patent Rolls, dated the 17th day of February, 5 Ed. 3., directed to the same parties, commanding them to take inquisitions "super vero valore insularum earundem," and, amongst other things, also, "ad informandum," "per hujusmodi inquisitiones capiendas de omnibus et singulis articulis contentis in quodam rotulo quem vobis mittimus sub pede sigilli nostri, et aliis eosdem articulos contingentibus." This writ appears to have been superseded, and a subsequent writ issued, dated the 18th of June in the same year, directed to the above mentioned Robert de Norton and Peter de Hoo, reciting the former writ, and assigning them "ad supervidendum statum Insularum quæ aliàs extensæ non fuerunt," "et ad informandum vos, per inquisitiones per sacramentum &c. capiendas &c., de præmissis omnibus et singulis, et ea tangentibus, in formâ prædictâ." The Extente was probably an inquisition taken in obedience to these writs. A copy of the Extente of the Island of Jersey taken before Robert de Norton and William de la Rue, in 5 Ed. 3., shews that the inquiry in that case was for purposes purely fiscal. But the articuli in rotulo may have related to the privileges claimed by the inhabitants, and, if so, would partly explain the statement contained in the Précepte d'Assise.

The opinion which we have formed, from a review of all the documents, is that the instrument called the Précepte d'Assise was framed by the Royal Court, and is valuable as evidence of what the inhabitants, at an early time, claimed to be their customs and privileges; and that, so far as it relates to the constitution and jurisdiction of the Royal Court, it is of great importance in the present inquiry; but, so far as we have been able to discover, it derives no force from the approval of the Justices in Eyre, in the manner stated in the instrument. The portion of it relating to the Royal Court evidently owes its origin to the Constitutions of King John, referred to in our First Report: but an attentive comparison of the documents shews that the liberties granted by the Constitutions are greatly expanded in the construction put on them by the Royal Court. The Extente and Précepte d'Assise are, however, recognised in the Approbation des Loix (to be presently mentioned), and there directed to be kept and inviolably observed, "tant pour l'Election, Estat et direction des Justiciers et autres Officiers de sa Majesté, que aussi pour les Droits, Rentes, Revenus, Services, Hommages et suittes de Court, apartenants et dûes à sa Majesté en cette dite Isle de Guernezey." And the Précepte d'Assise, whatever its origin, has always been regarded as authority in questions touching the jurisdiction of the Royal Court and the limits of the power of the Bailiff and the Governor, as representing the Crown.

The principal authority for the law, both civil and criminal, in Guernsey, is the work just mentioned, entitled, "Approbation des Loix, Coustume, et Usages de l'Isle de Guernezey, differentes du Coustumier de Normandie d'ancienneté observés en ladite Isle." It professes, in the introductory chapter, to be a digest and arrangement of these laws, customs and usages, made the 22nd of May, in the 24th of Elizabeth, by Sir Thomas Leighton, Knight, the then Governor of the Island, Thomas Wigmore the Bailiff, the Jurats of the Royal Court, and the acting Procureur of Her Majesty, in obedience to two separate Orders in Council made, the one at Richmond, on the 9th October, 1580, the other at Greenwich, on the 30th July, 1581. It was ratified and approved of by Her Majesty in Council on the 27th of October, 1583, in the 25th year of Her reign.

This account, however, conveys a very inaccurate idea of the work, which is nothing more than a series of remarks upon each chapter of Terrien's "Commentaires dv Droit civil tant pvblic qve privé, obserué au pays et Duché de Normandie," stating wherein the custom of Guernsey differs from, and wherein it accords with, the law laid down in the particular chapter of Terrien, often simply using the expression "nous usons de ce Chapitre." An examination of the two Orders in Council of 1580 and 1581 shews that something very different was contemplated. The first, after reciting a complaint of the want of due administration of justice, "through the libertie, the Bailiffe and Juratts do take unto themselves to directe theire judgment by presidents, wherein there is neyther certaintie nor rule of justice," "forsaking the customarye of Normandie whereunto they should holde themselves in all points not restrained or supplied by the Booke of Preceptes" (probably the Précepte d'Assise already noticed) "and Booke of Extente," orders them, in all matters not restrained by those instruments, or by any order in Council, to "follow the customarie of Normandie, and according to the customs thereof, minister justice within the said Isle." And, after permission given to retain their forms of proceeding as theretofore had been usual, where they differ from the forms prescribed by the customary of Normandie, "unless in any theire Courts of Chief Pleas they shall by assent of the States of the Isle agree uppon anie orders tending to the abridgement of length of sutes," it is ordered that "the Bailiff and Jurats shall joyne unto them twelve other persons of the most ancient and best experienced in the Isle, to be named by the Governor, and shall altogether conferre the sayd customs" which differ from the customary, "with the customary of Normandie, corrected and amended, in the reign of King Henry the 2 of Fraunce" (that is the Reformed Custom of Normandy), "in matters touching the abridgment of length of sutes; and suche as they shall finde different from the sayd customary shall put in writing, and send the same to the Lords of Her Ma$^{ties.}$ Privie Counsell before Easter then next, to receive their order therein." The customs referred to, as differing from the custom of Normandy, regard the right of succession, partage, dower, retraicts and other like matters, but appear not to affect the Criminal Law or its administration. This Order was not complied with. The Order in Council of 1581, after reciting that "the Bailliffe and Jurates were commanded by a former order from their Lordships, to sett down in writing the lawes and customes used and observed in that Isle, and thereof make a certificate unto their Lordships, which hath not yet been done," directs them, with the assistance of the Captain, or, in his absence, his Lieutenant, and Her Majesty's Procurer, jointly, to make "such a booke of the sayd lawes and customes, so farre forthe as they all can agree amonge themselves touching the same; and if they shall disagree in anie pointe, that the Bailliffe and Jurates for their parts shall set downe in writing and send unto their Lordships their opinions touching that pointe or matter which is doubted of, and the said Captain or his Lieutenant and Her Majesty's Procurer to doe the lyke, to be thereupon decided and determined on by their sayd Lordships, with the advise of the Judges and others of Her Majesty's learned Counsell, what is to be holden and observed therein." The Approbation des Loix was the book of the laws and customs made in obedience to this order. It received the approbation of Her Majesty in Council, in the following terms, according to the translation appended to the Approbation. "Messeigneurs du Conseil Privé de la Royne nostre Souveraine Dame, après avoir veu & entendu & consideré le contenu de ce Livre, soubsigné par le Sieur Thomas Leighton, Capitaine, et Gouverneur de l'Isle de Guernezey, les Baillif & Jurez de ladite Isle, ont ratifié & approuvé, ratifient & approuvent lex Loix et Coustumes y contenuës, pour estre observée & pratiquée en ladite Isle de Guernezey, sauve toûjours à sa Majesté & à ses hoirs & successeurs, pouvoir d'y ajoûter, diminuer & corriger à son bon plaisir, reservant semblablement tous autres Priviledges, profits, droits & préeminences apartenant à sadite Majesté, ses hoirs & successeurs, sans toutes fois faire aucun préjudice aux anciens & legitimes Priviledges, octroyée par cy-devant aux Habitants de ladite Isle."

This, in terms, is merely a ratification and approval of the laws and customs contained in the book. The construction which has been uniformly put by the Royal Court on this Order in Council is that it has a legislative force to make the Commentaries of Terrien, coupled with the book of the Governor, Bailiff and Jurats, a code of law for the Island. The effect of this construction, whether correct or not, has in practice been to compel the Bailiff and Jurats to continue to exercise the liberty, condemned in the Order of Council of 1581, of directing their judgment by precedents without certainty or rule of justice.

We have expressed our opinion of Terrien's Commentaries in our First Report. If his work was, in other respects, unobjectionable, its form alone would unfit it for the purpose to which it has been applied. But the text, not being confined to the Customary of Normandy, to which the Bailiffe and Juratts were directed to hold themselves, but extending to Ordonnances of the Court of Exchequer at Rouen and the Parliament of Normandy, and recent Edicts of French Kings, contains laws never contemplated by the Orders in Council; and the notes, abounding with superfluous discussions in the style common at the time in which Terrien lived, with decisions of the French Courts upon laws never prevalent in Guernsey, and with statements of opinions conflicting one with another, form a worse than useless groundwork for a system of definite law. The arrangement of the treatise appears also to us to be ill judged and most inconvenient for use. In some cases, too, the Approbation has entirely misrepresented the meaning of Terrien. A curious instance of this is given by Mr. Le Marchant in his "Remarques et Animadversions sur l'Approbation des Loix," of which we shall speak more fully hereafter. The first Book of Terrien is entitled "De la Jvstice et dv droit des Normans." It consists of a dissertation on the various meanings of the words, right and justice, the "Droict" of the first chapter of the Grand Coustumier, and the "Justice" of the third chapter of the same treatise in its abstract sense only. But the framers of the Approbation, supposing "La Justice" to mean the legal functionaries, that being the popular name under which the tribunal of the Bailiff and Jurats passes in Guernsey, and "Droict" to mean the revenues of the Crown, which are sometimes so called, make this remark. "Au lieu du premier livre qui traite de la Justice et du droit des Normands nous avons accoustumé d'user suivant le livre apellé l'Etente du Roy et Précepte de l'Assise," which treat, as we have before pointed out, of legal functionaries and revenues of the Crown, but contain nothing relating to Justice or Droict in the sense attached to those words in the first chapter of Terrien.

The work so executed was not satisfactory to the people of Guernsey. In the answers of the Lords of the Privy Council, in 1605, to a request on the behalf of the inhabitants that "the Booke of their laws of that Isle made, anno 1583, but remaining imperfect and supposed to be in many poyntes erronious, may be re-examined, reformed and made perfect," it is answered "that the Bailiffe and

GUERNSEY.

Juratts of Guernzey, calling to them such assistance as the generale Estates of the whole Isle shall holde to be most sufficient, both for their understanding and integritie, shall sett downe a faire Booke agreeablie to the Local Customes which that Isle hath ever observed in the course of Justice amonge themselves, which being orderly made up, they shall present the same to the Lordes of the Privy Counsell, and from them receave either correction or confirmation, as in their wisedomes after conference with the compilors thereof, shall be thought best for the Government." This "faire booke" was never made, whether from inability to agree amongst themselves as to what was the law, or from a desire to continue that state of uncertainty which leaves so wide a scope for the discretion of the Court, and is so favourable to the extension of its power.

In the 5th of James the First, however, a commission issued under the Great Seal, directed to Sir Robert Gardiner, Knight, and James Hussy, Doctors of the Civil Law, reciting that the Crown was informed that there were "divers matters concerning the state and government of those Isles" (Jersey and Guernsey), "that do require reformation and amendment, by reason of many defects and ambiguities, which either through the length and alteration of times," [or] "by the misinterpretation and wrongful use and practice of persons, had grown and risen in the laws, customs and forms of government in those Isles," and authorizing the Commissioners, among other things, "to enquire and to take knowledge of all such defects, ambiguities, and imperfections, as are to be found in the laws, customs, and government of the said Isles, and have grown by the means before mentioned; and to consider of them, and how they may be reformed and amended." In obedience to the Royal commands, the Commissioners heard the complaints, as well as of the community at large as of the several parishes of Guernsey, and made such orders in the matters as seemed to them necessary. These are called Réglemens des Commissaires Royaux, Envoyés par S. M. Le Roi Jaques I. L'Année, 1607. They have always been received as authority in the Island; and we were frequently referred to them during the progress of the inquiry. The second article of the general complaint of the people against his Majesty's Justices of the Isle of Guernsey, the Bailiff and Jurats, especially, is "that the book of laws is confused, containing some contradictions, and more uncertainties; so that the judges have very few certain rules and directions for the administration of justice, whereof proceedeth the diversity of sentences and judgments, to the great hurt of the people; and yet in the laws certain, the justices often times dispense themselves from the due observation thereof." To which the answer of the Commissioners is: "Albeit that we cannot find by any proof hitherto made before us, that the Justices have taken or given unto themselves any such dispensation as is mentioned; yet it is acknowledged that their book of laws is, in many points, uncertain, defective, and imperfect, and therefore the Bailiff, and Justices, with one consent, in the name of the rest of the inhabitants, and for that special care which they seem to have of the common good of the Island, have requested in like manner as they of Jersey have done before them, that we would be pleased to join with them in a petition to the King's Majesty, for the appointing of some chosen Commissioners, to whom authority may be given to set down such points as in their old laws they find worthy of a reformation, or else of a new law to be established: which being done with their three Etats, they will cause the same to be brought into England, there to be considered of by the best learned, as well in the Common Law as the Civil Law, and then present the same to the Lords of His Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, that so likewise they giving their approbation to the same, by His Majesty's royal assent, under the great seal, it may be confirmed."

We have not been able to discover that this recommendation was ever carried into effect: and Terrien, coupled with the Approbation, has continued to be treated as the exposition of the laws and customs of the Island of Guernsey to the present day. These constitute much the greater part of what is commonly termed "the written law."

The Twelfth Book of Terrien treats, "Des Crimes et Procez Criminels." The existing Criminal Law of Guernsey mainly consists of such parts of it as received the confirmation of Queen Elizabeth in the manner above stated.

Besides the written law found in Terrien and the Approbation, which derives its authority from the legislative act of the Crown, records of the proceedings of the Court are preserved at the office of the Greffe, which have the force of precedents in doubtful cases. No digest however of the decisions, nor index to the cases, exists; but the Advocates keep collections of cases which are cited as authorities for the guidance of the Court.

The criminal procedure in Terrien being very similar to that in force in France before the first Revolution, the older French Criminal Jurists, more particularly Pothier, Jousse and De la Combe, come to be considered as authority.

The modern French and English text writers are also cited in illustration of the principles of the Criminal Law.

A work frequently referred to, in the discussion of questions arising on Terrien and the Approbation des Loix, is "Remarques et Animadversions sur l'Approbation des Lois et Coustumier de Normandie usitées es Jurisdictions de Guernezé, et particulierement en la Cour Royale de la ditte Isle. Par Thomas le Marchant." The author was a Presbyterian minister, who lived in the middle of the 17th century, and had devoted a great portion of his time to the study of the laws and customs of his country. His treatise has been recently published by order of the Royal Court: and its value is best expressed by the following extract from the introductory notice of the work by the members of the Court who had been intrusted with its publication. "En mettant sous les yeux du public les Remarques et Animadversions du Rév. Thomas le Marchant, le public est prévenu que ce n'est pas le dessein de la Cour de confirmer ou approuver toutes les opinions de cet écrivain; son unique objet étant de fournir aux habitans l'occasion de s'instruire sur l'origine de nos coûtumes locales et sur les changements qu'elles ont éprouvé à diverses époques."

We do not find that any Charter granted by the Crown has materially contributed to establish or modify either the Criminal Law or the Criminal Tribunals of Guernsey, with the exception of the instrument called the Constitutions of King John, which we have found it necessary already to describe in the course of our remarks on the Customary Law, from its provisions having been at different times incorporated with customary privileges, and indeed spoken of as such.

All Orders of Your Majesty in Council have the force of law in Guernsey, as in Jersey, proprio vigore; whether they originate in the Privy Council, or are in confirmation of enactments of the local legislature, or direct the application of some Act of Parliament not originally intended to take effect in the Island. The mode of promulgation is by reading the Order in full Court, after which it is registered at the Greffe. It is considered to take effect from the date of its registration. But, except to that extent, an Order in Council derives no effect from registration; and the Court has no discretion with respect to its registration, but is bound, on its reception, to register it, without in any way suspending its operation.

The Royal Court claim and have exercised, from the beginning of the 15th century, the right of acting as a legislative body at certain Courts, called Chefs Plaids. The Royal Court consists of the Bailiff and Twelve Jurats; the manner of the appointment and election of these functionaries will appear hereafter. The Chefs Plaids are held three times in the year: on the first Monday after the 15th January; the first Monday after Easter week; and the first Monday after the 29th of September. The Bailiff and at least seven Jurats, with the Procureur and Contrôle de la Reine, constitute these Courts. The Governor, also, has the right to be present; the Crown vassals attend to do homage; and one of the constables of each parish is also bound to appear, by virtue of an Ordinance of the Chefs Plaids made in the early part of the present century. The law is, in fact, always proposed by the Law Officers of the Crown. The enacting power rests with the Bailiff and Jurats alone, after hearing the conclusions of the Law Officers; if the votes be equally balanced, the Bailiff has a casting vote, besides his original vote. But the constables have the right of making observations in favour or disapproval of any proposition submitted to the Court. Private individuals also, whose interests are likely to be affected by the proposed law, may be heard in person or by counsel against it. The Governor possesses no veto; but, in the event of any provision affecting his rights or duties, it is usual to submit it to him for his approval prior to its being proposed; and, although his consent is not necessary to its enactment, it would probably, in the absence of such consent, be disallowed by the Privy Council on his complaint. The laws so passed are called Ordonnances. They take effect by the mere power of the Royal Court without the intervention or approbation of the Lords of Your Majesty's Privy Council, or the assent of Your Majesty's Governor in the Island, or the concurrence of the general body of the people.

The origin of a power so extensive is not clearly ascertained, nor the limits within which it can be lawfully exercised accurately defined. We were referred to an article contained in an Order in Council, of the date of 1568, as the earliest recognition of this right by the Crown. It is in the following terms. "Item, that all Graunts and Confirmacions of Priviledges from the Queen's Majestie, and her Progenitors shalbe alwayes inviolably observed, maynteyned and kepte in force with the credit of the Bailyeff and Juratts, to be obeyed in all their ordinancs made and to be made for the good Governmente, Suretie, and Quietnes of the said Isle. And that noe officer or Mynister of Justice be at anie tyme hereafter resistid, ympeched, or ymprysoned for executinge the Sentences, Ordinaunces and Constitucions aforesaid, but maynteyned and assisted according to the Lawes, Usages, and auncyente Customes of the Isle." We were informed that this provision grew out of the imprisonment of a constable by the then Governor for having executed an Ordonnance of the Royal Court: and it was argued that it recognised the right of the Royal Court to make Ordonnances generally for the good government, surety and quietness of the Island. We have not been able to obtain the whole of the proceedings in the case so as to form an accurate opinion on the effect of the particular order; but it was clearly proved to us, from the Approbation des Loix, that Ordonnances were made by the Court at Chefs Plaids at the time of that work and long before, with respect to the repair of roads, the assize of bread, the regulation of public amusements, the right of sporting, and other subjects of local police.

Similar powers appear to have been exercised by the Justices itinerant in their Assizes. We have inspected regulations, called their "Ordinationes et præcepta," dated 17 Edw. 2., which bear a strong resemblance to the Ordonnances of the Royal Court. These, however, might derive their authority from the Royal Commission directed to the Justices.

The Jurats, in an answer transmitted to the Privy Council on the 10th of January, 1737, thus define the powers of the Royal Court. "We never pretended to be invested with the power and authority of making laws, and it is what neither we nor our predecessors before us, ever assumed; but we beg to acquaint your Lordships, that this Court has always, as well by the nature of our constitution, as by virtue of sundry charters from the Crown, and other express orders in Council, deemed itself authorised and empowered to make regulations, and set down such rules and methods as were necessary for enforcing and putting in due execution the laws of the Island." The practice, however, has greatly exceeded these limits. The received opinion, at present, as to the limit of the legislative power of the Court in Chefs Plaids, is that it is incapable of passing and enforcing Ordonnances which militate against any Order in Council or any other law passed by an authority superior to that of the Royal Court, but that its power in other respects is unrestrained. The application of the rule was illustrated by the inability of the Court in Chefs Plaids to alter the law with respect to the admissibility of witnesses without the intervention of the Privy Council, the objection to their admissibility existing in a chapter of Terrien, confirmed by the Approbation des Loix. This rule, if strictly observed, would still leave a wide scope for legislation. But much of Terrien, though sanctioned by the Approbation, has, as we shall have occasion to remark, ceased to be law; and other provisions have been substituted without any other authority for the change than the practice of the Court. The principal Ordonnances, at present in force, regulate law proceedings, the highways, the harbours, the right of gathering vraic, or sea-weed for manure, the importation and exportation of provisions, and the mode of taxation. The duties and discipline of the militia are also regulated by Ordonnances of the Royal Court. Obedience is enforced by fine and imprisonment; and no appeal lies from any sentence of the Court in execution of their provisions.

It has already been stated that all laws, exceeding the limit within which the Ordinances of the Royal Court are confined, require the confirmation of your Majesty in Council. This extends to laws passed by the States of the Island, as distinguished from Ordinances of the Royal Court in Chefs Plaids.

The legislative functions of this body are very limited. The initiative belongs to the Royal Court, where the projected law must be first discussed and adopted before it can be submitted to the States. If it is passed by the States, it is transmitted to the Privy Council for confirmation: if it is rejected, the measure falls to the ground.

The history of the States is involved in much obscurity. It is probable that they originally were constituted on the model of the Trois Etats in Normandy; the Bailiff and Jurats corresponding with the Noblesse; the Rectors of the parishes answering to the Clergy; and the Douzaines, an elected body in each parish, representing the Tiers Etat. They possessed certain legislative functions, said to be distinct from those of the Royal Court in Chef Plaids, being convened for the discussion of certain matters designated as "affaires politiques," chiefly referable to the election of the Jurats and local taxation. The practice, however, of assembling them for legislative purposes had fallen into disuse at the time of the Approbation des Loix. The passage in the Approbation to the seventh chapter of the second book of Terrien, which treats "Des gens des trois états," is as follows. "Nous n'avons accoustumé en cette Isle d'avoir Gens de trois Estats; mais toutes les affaires politiques se font, par l' advis du Gouverneur, Baillif et Jurez de la Cour Royalle: après avoir par les Connestables, connu le vouloir de la Généralité du Peuple." Mr. Le Marchant, in his Remarques et Animadversions sur l'Approbation des Loix, refers this to the usurpation of the Royal Court. His words are, "Ces autheurs de l'Approbation ayant rejetté les deux autres Estats" (that is, les Ministres et le Peuple), "se sont acquis une dictature perpétuelle, par laquelle ils ménagent à leur poste les privilèges, disposent des deniers publics, et imposent taxes sur les habitants quand bon leur semble; et quant au vouloir ou consentement du peuple par la bouche des connestables, ce n'est plus qu'un ombre sans corps de la puissance ancienne des dits estats; la Justice" (that is, La Cour Royale) "emportant à présent les affaires de haute lucte, les connestables n'osants ou ne gagnants rien de tergiverser, tellement que le plus souvent ils acquiescent à des choses dont la généralité du peuple n'a pas seulement ouy parler." In the year 1605, after the date of the Approbation but before the time at which Mr. Le Marchant wrote, the States were revived, on the petition of the inhabitants, by an order in Council in the following terms. "Furthermore, where it is desired that the ancient use and authoritie of assembling the three States of the Island, for ordering the principale affaires thereof may be re-established; this request seemeth reasonable and according to the auncient custome of the said Isle, thought meete to be graunted." The three Estates of the Island were, thereupon, reestablished according to ancient use; but, on the issuing of the Royal Commission of inquiry, before referred to, in the 5th of James the First, amongst the petitions from the parish of St. Peter Port concerning the general good of the Isle, it is prayed that "an order be made for the formal composing of the General Estates of the Isle; what number of persons, and of what calling and quality; the manner of their election and admission into that company, and what shall be the authority of the said company in general." Also that "hereafter the number which shall be appointed for the third Estate or Commons, be chosen indifferently upon all the Isle, of the most sufficient, without respect of their dwelling, in the same manner as the Jurats shall be chosen." The answer of the Commissioners is, that, "upon conference had with the Bailiff and Justices, they find no such difficulty in the ordering and composing of all the Estates of this Isle; but that the Bailiff and Jurats, according to their ancient customs, may order the same as shall be needful."

The present constitution of the States of Guernsey is settled by an Order in Council of the 13th of December, 1844, confirming an Acte of the States for that purpose. In order to make its provisions intelligible, it will be necessary to state the mode in which the parochial Douzaines are constituted.

There are eight parishes only in Guernsey for ecclesiastical purposes, each of the eight having a rector appointed by the Crown; but for municipal purposes there are ten. Each of these has its Douzaine, consisting of certain members, called Douzeniers, who, together with the Constables, form the council of the parish. They provide for the relief of the native poor; attend to the repair of the roads; and make the parochial rates. The practice is to rate no one in the country parishes who does not possess seven quarters of wheat rent, equivalent to a capital of 140*l.*; and no one in the town parish who does not possess a capital of at least ten quarters, equivalent to 200*l.* The rate-payers in each parish elect the Douzeniers and the Constables. There are two Constables in each parish. Their duties are not confined to acting as Peace Officers. They also preside at the meetings of the Douzaine in their respective parishes, are the treasurers of the public moneys, and, prior to the law of 1844, were the representatives of the Douzaine in the States, when acting as what were termed States of Délibération. They are compelled to serve for one year; but, unless successors be elected, they continue to serve for three years; at the end of that period, there must be a new election; but the same persons, if they consent (not otherwise), may be reelected. The Douzeniers are elected for life from those who have served the office of Constable; they must also be assessed in the parish books at not less than ten quarters, in the country parishes, and not less than thirty quarters in the parish of St. Peter Port. They are, however, entitled to their discharge after attaining the age of sixty years: they also vacate their office if they cease to reside in their respective parishes, and are liable to be removed for sufficient cause by decree of the Royal Court. To have served the office of Constable and Douzenier is a common introduction to the office of Jurat. The number of Douzeniers in each parish, as the name imports, was originally twelve. By ancient usage, the parish of St. Peter Port had twenty; and the parish of the Vale sixteen, that is, twelve for one district called the Clos du Val and four for the remaining district, called L'Epine. The law of 1844, however, has greatly increased the Douzeniers for St. Peter Port, by creating in that parish four Cantonal Douzaines of twelve members each, in addition to the parochial Douzaine of twenty, making, in the whole, sixty eight Douzeniers for the town parish and its cantons. The augmentation of the number of their Douzeniers had been long claimed by the inhabitants of the town parish. In their petition to the Commissioners in the reign of James the First, they state that "time out of mind, this said town and parish of St. Peter-Port did stand in all elections of public persons and other affairs that do concern the state of the Isle, for the third, even as the said parish sustained the third part of all public charges in subsidies and taxations." They complain that "the Bailiffs and Jurats have lately in the proceeding to public elections, deprived the same parish of her ancient preferment and advantage, reducing her to the same order and degree that the lesser parishes of the Isle holdeth." The Commissioners, in their answer, state that "there was never any such privileges or pre-eminence allowed to the said parish," and proceed to lay down certain laws for the election of officers, placing the right in the Bailiff and Jurats, with the Constables and Douzeniers of every parish.

GUERNSEY.

The Bailiff, the Jurats, the Rectors, the Procureur, the Constables and Douzeniers of the Town Parish and its Cantons, and the Constables and Douzeniers of the Country Parishes, now constitute the body of the States when acting in the character of Etats d'Election. Thus the States of Election consist of 222 members; the Bailiff, the eight Rectors, and the Procureur, appointed by the Crown; the twelve Jurats, elected for life by the States; the 180 Douzeniers, elected for life by the rate payers of their respective Parishes and Cantons, from a select body, namely those who have served the office of Constable; and, lastly, the 20 Constables, also elected by the rate payers for three years. When the States are assembled for the purpose of legislation, under the name of Les Etats de Délibération, the Bailiff, the Jurats, the Rectors, and the Procureur, alone possess, as individuals, a vote, the Parochial and Cantonal Douzaines being represented by Deputies, in the following manner: the Parochial Douzaine of the town parish sends two Deputies to the States of Délibération, and each of its Cantonal Douzaines one, in all six Deputies representing the Douzaines of St. Peter Port. Each of the country Douzaines sends one Deputy, in all making 9 Deputies representing the Country Douzaines. The whole number amounts thus to 37.

The Constables thus form the only popular element in the States, and form a part of them only when they are acting as States of Election. The States of Election elect the 12 Jurats, and an officer called the Prévôt, whose functions nearly resemble those of an English sheriff. Each member of the States of Election has a single vote. The legislative functions of the States are confined to the States of Délibération. They are convoked by the Bailiff, who is the President of the Assembly, after conference with the Lieutenant Governor. Their absolute power of taxation is limited to levying general taxes, not exceeding, in the course of each year, the amount of a penny per quarter. If they impose a heavier tax, this must be confirmed, first by the States of Election and then by the Crown in Council, to make it legal. Their power of passing laws is limited to the discussion of projects of law sent up to them from the Court of Chefs Plaids, which consist of laws considered to be beyond the power of the Chefs Plaids. If such laws are confirmed by the States of Délibération, they still require the assent of the Crown in Privy Council.

No authorized collection of the acts of the local Legislature exists in print.

Acts of the Imperial Legislature in which the Island is named, either specifically or by necessary intendment, also have the force of law in Guernsey. The course is for the Clerk of the Council to transmit them to the Governor and the Royal Court with an order to register them, expressing that the registration is not essential to their validity, but is directed in order that the inhabitants may take notice of them, and govern themselves accordingly. This mode of proceeding was adopted in consequence of the Court suspending the registration of an Act of Parliament in 1806, and has been followed ever since.

Questions of practical difficulty often occur with respect to Acts of Parliament which have been registered. First, the provisions of an Act in which the Island is expressly named are often inapplicable to the state of things in Guernsey and incapable of taking effect there. Secondly, Acts are transmitted in which the Island is not named, either expressly or by intendment, with the ordinary direction to register. In the first case, the Act would seem to be merely inoperative. In the second, it is questionable whether it has the force of law, seeing that it derives no validity in the Island from the act of registration nor from the terms of its enactment. Acts of Parliament are also often transmitted for registration long after they are passed, when it becomes questionable whether they take effect from the time of their enactment in England or of their promulgation in Guernsey. We think that these points deserve the attention of Your Majesty's Privy Council and of the Imperial Legislature.

We now proceed to give an account of the Criminal Law, as existing in the Island of Guernsey and its dependencies. In so doing, we shall necessarily be led to repeat many of the remarks made, in our First Report, with respect to the Criminal Law of Jersey. The same causes have produced similar results in both Islands. The ancient law, as found in Terrien, is most defective, both in the definition and classification of crimes and in the annexation of specific punishments to particular offences. There have been no legislative enactments since the Approbation des Loix to supply these deficiencies. The necessary consequence is that cases have continually arisen, not provided for by the written law, with which the Court has been compelled to deal by an exercise of its general criminal jurisdiction, and to punish according to what, under the circumstances, appeared to be expedient. According to the Précepte d'Assise, the Jurats possess "la cognaissance, jurisdiction, précognition et jugemens en la compagnie du dit Bailliff de toutes matières de causes ciuilles et criminelles eschéantes en la ditte Isle toutes fois et quantes." This is considered to confer on the Royal Court the right to try and punish every offence against society; whatever, in point of fact, is malum in se. Consequently, in all cases where the law had not affixed a specific punishment to the act, the Court has been forced to award punishment in its discretion on every case as it arose, or to exercise a quasi legislative power, by creating a precedent to govern future cases on a recurrence of the offence. The former course has mostly prevailed in Guernsey. In all cases not provided for by the written law, the Court assumes to act arbitrarily, with regard both to the mode of trial and to the punishment it inflicts. But, in some even of the few instances in which particular punishments are mentioned in Terrien in connection with particular offences, a different punishment is now inflicted. The Procureur endeavoured to account for this on the ground that by the general law, as laid down in Terrien, the punishment of offences is left in the discretion of the judge. In support of this, he referred to the following passage from Lib. xii., chap. xxxix.:— "Les peines des crimes sont toutes arbitraires en ce Royaume" (that is the kingdom of France), "si non d' autant qu'il y en a de statuées, indites & imposées par les edicts et ordonnances Royaux." The effect of this, applied to Guernsey, would be that, where no specific punishment can be found in the written law applicable to the crime, the Court may exercise its discretion in inflicting the punishment. The passage, however, affords one instance, among many, of the absurdity which results from regarding Terrien's work as the written law of the Island. The punishment of crime is regulated by the edicts of French monarchs in force in France at the time Terrien wrote; where these are wanting, it rests in the discretion of the Jurats. This, in itself, would be a great defect; but, according to the construction adopted by the Court, even where a specific punishment is mentioned in Terrien, the Jurats are not bound to adhere to it, or to abstain from another. In its legislative character, acting in Chefs Plaids, it was admitted, the Court has no authority to change the written law. But we were told that its judicial power is superior to its legislative power: that the Court, sitting in Chefs Plaids, has no right to bind the Court sitting in judgment on an offender to a specific punishment, and that the judge, notwithstanding Terrien, is not bound specifically to any one punishment, but may inflict another, provided he does not go beyond that named in Terrien. The practice of the Court evidently concurs with this view; but it is wholly inconsistent with the recognition of Terrien as the written law of the Island.

The great divisions of indictable offences in Guernsey are determined by the different modes of trial applicable. These we shall describe more fully when we come to explain the constitution and powers of the Court. At present, it will be sufficient to state that there are two modes of trial; first, that A l'ordinaire; secondly, that Au grand criminel.

Offences of the class first mentioned may be punished by fine, imprisonment, flogging, the pillory, or banishment for any period less than seven years. These are again divided into two classes: first, those offences which are punishable by fine and imprisonment only; and for these the Act of accusation uses the words "à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne:" secondly, those which may be liable to all of the punishments mentioned; and for these the Act of accusation uses the words "à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne." Within these limits, the degree of punishment rests wholly in the discretion of the Court.

Offences tried "Au grand criminel" must be laid to have been committed "félonieusement," and subject the offender to "les peines et punitions imposées par les loix." Those were formerly loss of life or limb, or banishment from the Bailiwick for not less than seven years, which constitutes a civil death. To these punishments forfeiture, as well of lands as of goods and chattels, was incident. The modern practice has added transportation, but has disused punishment by loss of limb. It also retains the confiscation of the felon's property, real and personal, as incidental to the punishment. In what way this change has been effected is not known. The Court, however, has gone much farther, by ruling that, in a proceeding "Au grand criminel," it is not bound to inflict any of the punishments which we have mentioned as appropriated to this proceeding, but is at liberty to pass a minor sentence without confiscation. This is inconsistent both with the law and the form of the proceedings, and incapable of being referred to any principle. The law is first altered without legal authority, and the law so altered is not adhered to. Offences prosecuted "Au grand criminel" are, however, still called felonies, as distinguished from those prosecuted "A l'ordinaire." And to this extent the existing law affords a definition of felony, that a crime which may subject the offender to a punishment to which confiscation is incident is a felony. In endeavouring to ascertain what crimes must be so punished, we found it impossible to arrive at any rule determining the particular acts which are legally felonious. The only conclusion we have been able to draw from the evidence is that it rests with the Court to direct what crimes shall be tried "Au grand criminel," and that all so tried are felonies, because the act must be laid to have been done "félonieusement" in that mode of proceeding. The highest crimes, as Murder, which is punished by death, necessarily fall within this class; but the limit separating this class from the class below seems to us not only unsusceptible of definition, but liable to continual change. We were told that there could be no felony which was not an act of violence. This coincides with the definition in Terrien. "Est cy interpreté vn outrage commis par felonnie, qui est commis par force & violence, & de courage meu, en intention & volonté de mal-faire: A la difference des cas qui se commettent extra animum, et sans y penser."—(L. xii. c. 28.) Upon this principle we were told that simple theft cannot be properly laid "félonieusement." The modern practice certainly is not so to charge it. But, according to Terrien, "Larcin notable et qualifié," and "larcin" after a previous conviction for the same offence, are felonious (L. xii. c. 20.). This is no longer the law in Guernsey. At least a difference of opinion appeared to exist, whether a person brought up on a number of charges of "vol" together might be indicted "félonieusement:" but it was admitted that, where the theft is accompanied with "effraction" (breaking into a house), or with violence, the facts would be properly set out in the "mise en accusation," and the offence laid to have been committed "félonieusement." With regard to forgery, there are modern cases in which it has been laid both ways; and, notwithstanding the absence of violence, it is generally laid félonieusement. Again, maliciously stabbing or cutting and wounding, notwithstanding the violence, is prosecuted either "A l'ordinaire" or "Au grand criminel," according to the view the Court takes of the circumstances of the act. In a recent case, the offender, an Advocate of the Court, was tried "A l'ordinaire," although the second head of the indictment charged that, after the defendant had given the wounds, he pursued the prosecutor with the intention of killing him. The same observations will apply to other crimes. In examining the returns of persons prosecuted "Au grand criminel" and "Au criminel ordinaire," for the ten years preceding 1846, we found instances of burglary, house-breaking, cutting and wounding, sheep stealing and larceny by servants, tried sometimes "Au grand criminel," and sometimes "A l'ordinaire;" and one instance of a person tried "Au grand criminel" for what appeared to be several simple thefts, more than one offence being charged in the indictment.

We do not think it necessary to detail more minutely the several heads of crime, and the punishments incident to them. It is sufficient to state that we found scarcely a single instance in which the law could be traced to a higher source than the discretion of the Court, or in which that discretion was itself secured from continual variation in practice. We except, of course, the cases in which Ordinances have been passed by the Legislature of the Island. We have already stated the nature of the subjects of these Ordinances; and we need here only add that manifestly the Criminal Law of the Island, in the higher and more general sense of the term, cannot be considered as resting upon this foundation to any serious extent.

It is clear that the continuance of such a system is inconsistent with the administration of justice on any fixed principle, and that it tends to subject the Court to the imputation of partiality or caprice. The community may fairly demand a definite state of law; and we think the Judges themselves entitled to be relieved from the exercise of a discretion which cannot fail to be embarrassing to themselves and unsatisfactory to the community. We recommend the adoption of a course, with regard to the criminal law of Guernsey, similar to that suggested in our First Report with regard to the criminal law of Jersey: that is to say, that a code be drawn up, embodying in as few words as possible the definitions of crime, and, so far as may be thought expedient, assigning punishments, in language which has already become familiar in the English law books. The effect of this will be to supply those who have to administer the Criminal Law in Guernsey with that which they cannot possibly obtain from their own Court, namely, a copious body of practical precedents accessible through authorized publications. The present Bailiff is an English lawyer of experience, and takes a very great interest in the discharge of that part of his duties which regards the administration of justice. We are ourselves greatly indebted to him for most valuable information and assistance in the progress of this inquiry, and feel confident that he is the person best qualified, from his familiarity with the existing law and the confidence which the Court place in him, to prepare a measure which shall remedy these defects. The amendments which have taken place in the law during the short period he has held the office, and the improvements which his legal experience has enabled him to introduce into the practice of the Court, are a satisfactory guarantee of his willingness and ability to cooperate with the States in preparing a definite system of penal law.

We recommend also that a House of Correction should be connected with the Gaol in Guernsey, and that the Court should be authorized to inflict the punishment of hard labour, in addition to imprisonment, in certain cases. We doubt whether such punishment would at present be legal in Guernsey. It is certainly, in practice, unknown there; and it is nowhere expressly provided by any law, with which we were made acquainted. The want of the means of inflicting it leads to periods of solitary confinement on bread and water, in some instances, as it appears to us, disproportionate to the offence.

We now proceed to describe the constitution of the tribunals and authorities charged with the execution of the Criminal Law in Guernsey, and the mode of proceeding therein.

The Supreme Criminal Tribunal is the Royal Court of Guernsey. Like the Royal Court of Jersey, it probably derives its origin from the Constitutions of King John, in the manner pointed out in our First Report. It exercises jurisdiction over all offences committed within the Bailiwick, with the exception of those described in the Constitutions as "casus nimis ardui." These are defined by the Précepte d'Assise to be treason, coining, and laying violent hands on the person of the Bailiff or any of the Jurats while in the exercise of his office. The cognizance of these offences is said to belong to the Court; and the punishment of them only is reserved to the Crown.

The Judge and Jurats of Alderney and the Seneschal of Sark also have a limited criminal jurisdiction within their respective Islands, which will be noticed in a subsequent part of the Report.

The Royal Court of Guernsey consists of the Bailiff of Guernsey, the twelve Jurats of the Court, and the Procureur and the Contrôle de la Reine. Six Advocates have the right of pleading before it. Its chief officers are the Prevôt, the Greffier, and the Serjeant.

The Bailiff is appointed by the Crown, and holds office during pleasure. He has a salary of 300*l.* per annum, in Guernsey money, which must be reckoned at a deduction of about 6 per cent. on the nominal sum. He has also fees, producing somewhat less than 100*l.* annually. An inspection of the proceedings which took place before the Justices in Eyre in the reigns of Edward the Second and Edward the Third leads to the conclusion that he was originally an annual officer. He is the President of the Court, and has the power of appointing a Lieutenant from among the Jurats, who presides in his absence. He is required by the Précepte d'Assise to be resident in the Island, and is to be capable of answering the King's Justices in all cases touching the Crown which happen there. His duty, as there stated, is to execute and carry into effect the ordinances, records and judgments (regars, recors et jugements) of the Jurats; and, if by ignorance, or otherwise, he shall happen to make any default or trespass against them, he is immediately to correct himself by the ordinance and good opinion of the Jurats, and keep himself according to such correction; nor is he to make any judgment by himself without the order of the Jurats. This, if taken to its full extent, appears scarcely consistent with his practice as the officer of the Crown and President of the Court. According to the present practice, he sums up the case in criminal proceedings, as well with regard to the law as the facts, collects the opinions of the Jurats, and delivers the sentence of the Court. He has, however, no voice in the proceedings, unless in the event of the opinions of the Jurats being equally divided, when he has the casting vote. It does not appear to be settled whether this privilege is confined to the case where the Jurats are equally divided between two opinions, or extends to all cases in which an equal number of the Court adopts different views, as is sometimes the case with regard to the amount of punishment to be awarded.

The twelve Jurats hold office for life. They are incapable of being removed, unless by promotion to the office of Bailiff, or in the event of being convicted of acting contrary to their oath of office, or, in the language of the Précepte d'Assise, d'être reprins et diffamé de son serment.

It was represented to us as a hardship that a person should be liable to be elected Jurat against his consent and compellible to serve for life; an order in Council, which is in the nature of a law, being requisite for his discharge. A complaint was made to us by Mr. Gosselin, one of the Jurats, that he had been so elected, and that, upon his petitioning the Crown for leave to resign, his petition had been referred to the States of the Island for their consideration, and by them rejected. He suggested that, as the Douzeniers are by the law of the Island not compelled to serve after the age of sixty, the Jurats also, on attaining that age, should have the power of resigning. It does not appear to us that there could be any objection to a law to that effect.

The Constitutions of King John direct the Jurats to be elected, "de indigenis insularum, per ministros Domini Regis et optimates patriæ." The Précepte d'Assise, on the contrary, states the ancient usage to be for the inhabitants and dwellers of the Island (les habitans et demourans en la dicte Isle) to make and elect the Jurats from among themselves. The Royal Commissioners in 1607, in order to bring back the election as near as might be to the ancient use, expressed in the Constitutions of King John, provided, by a Réglement made to that effect, that the "Bailiff and Jurats, with the Constables and Dozens of every parish" "shall have voices in the said election, and whosoever is nominated by the greater part of them, the Bailiff shall pronounce and declare him to be lawfully chosen." It is remarkable that the Réglement of the Commissioners does not mention the Rectors of the parishes as forming part of the elective body. They appear, however, to have always formed part of the States of Election. By the recent law of the 13th of December, 1844, the number of the electors has been increased by the addition of the Cantonal Douzaines of the town parish, in the manner before stated.

The Précepte d'Assise directs that the Jurats shall be elected from among the most notable and discreet, wise, loyal and rich men of the Island. They are, in fact, chosen from the most ancient and respectable families: but the limited number of the electors and the constitution of the elective body tend to make the office almost hereditary in some of them; and relationship by blood or marriage prevails to a considerable extent among the members of the Court.

No express qualification, beyond what has been stated, is required. A common practice is to elect those who have filled the offices of Constable and Douzenier. No legal education is considered requisite. Of the Court, as constituted at the period of our inquiry, one member only had practised as Advocate, and one had formerly practised as a solicitor in London; the rest were wholly unconnected with the legal profession. An election has since taken place, at which a gentleman who had filled the office of Contrôle has been chosen.

A question has arisen whether the Lieutenant Governor has a veto on the election of a Jurat. The assertion of the right is founded on a passage in Warburton's "Treatise on the History, Laws and Customs of the Island of Guernsey." The passage (p. 53.) is as follows. "The election being clear, the governor is to be made acquainted with it, and if he has nothing to object against the person chosen, he is then to be sworn within some few days after; but if the governor except against him, his exceptions being heard, the matter is to be determined by the King in Council." This, it will be seen, stops far short of asserting that an absolute right of veto is lodged in the Governor. We were informed that the right (either of veto or suspension) had been assumed and exercised by Sir Thomas Leighton, who was Governor in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, at the time of the framing of the "Approbation des Loix;" that it certainly did not exist before his time; and that it fell into disuse afterwards. No mention is made of such right in the Réglemens of the Commissioners before cited; nor have we been able to find any trace of it in the Précepte d'Assise, or any ancient record. We were not in possession of evidence sufficient to enable us to come to a decided opinion on the subject: but we are inclined to think, on looking at the descriptions of the offices of Governor and Jurat in the Précepte d'Assise, and at the mode of electing the Jurats as settled by the Réglemens of the Commissioners in 1506, subsequently to the time when Sir Thomas Leighton was Governor, that the claim has not any legal foundation. It is, however, very desirable that the question should be set at rest.

The Jurats are stiled, in the Précepte d'Assise, mean judges between our Sovereign Lord the King and his men inhabitants of the Island. They are also there said to have the cognizance, jurisdiction, precognition and sentencing (jugemens), in company with the Bailiff, of all matters of causes civil and criminal occurring in the Island, with the exception of the reserved cases before mentioned. They are also said to be placed and ordained in the name and place of four knights according to the establishment of the custom of Normandy:* and their office is declared to be well and faithfully (loyalement) to record and judge, according to their consciences, all and every the cases and causes of what kind soever that before the Bailiff and themselves shall be in law determined.

The Procureur de la Reine and Contrôle de la Reine are Law Officers appointed by the Crown during pleasure. The salary of the Procureur is 300*l.* per annum, that of the Contrôle 200*l.*: these officers have also fees, amounting annually to 30*l.*

or 35*l.* for each. They answer, respectively, so far as they are the legal advisers of the Crown, to the Attorney and Solicitor General in England. But they also form a constituent part of the Court when sitting as a criminal tribunal, and conduct all criminal prosecutions, which, although directed by the Court, are technically said to be at the instance of the Officers of the Queen. No sentence of the Court can be legally passed until their "conclusions" have been given, that is, their opinion on the law applicable to the case and their view as to the effect of the facts proved, and the punishment that the crime demands. In performing these functions, they are supposed to act, not as advocates whose duty it is to bring the charge home to the accused, but as ministers of justice assisting the Court with their advice. Some such officers are evidently necessary in a Court whose judges are not lawyers, to prevent the decisions of the Jurats from infringing the law. But, since the practice has been to appoint a lawyer to the office of Bailiff, the necessity for the performance of this part of the duty of the Crown Officers is not apparent. Their power, as public prosecutors, is extremely limited, being confined to the conduct of the case in Court. Not only are they incapable of instituting criminal proceedings ex officio, but the Court decides, without the assistance of their conclusions, whether a party presented by the Constable shall be prosecuted or not, and on the form in which the charge is to be preferred.

The Crown Officers also appear in all cases where the interests of minors and persons incapacitated from taking charge of their own property are concerned; and proceedings for penalties for the infraction of Ordinances of the Royal Court must be prosecuted at their suit. Causes en adjonction also, the proceedings in which will be described hereafter, and actions of Clameur de Haro and Nouvelle Dissaisine, which, though civil remedies, are, in form, in the nature of criminal proceedings, must be instituted by one of the Law Officers of the Crown; and, if the defendant appears, it must be by the other. In civil cases they act as advocates.

The Advocates are admitted by the Royal Court, upon application, as vacancies occur, and are liable to be suspended or displaced by the Court for misconduct. There is no competition for the place of Advocate at present. From 1806 to 1824 there were only three besides the Law Officers of the Crown; and, between that period and 1846, the number has been full for only three years. There are at present four Advocates in practice; one of the body being under suspension, and one place vacant. No examination or particular course of study is required previously to admission. The practice is to study under an Advocate in Guernsey, and to attend lectures in law at one of the French Universities. There are no officers of the Court corresponding to attorneys, the Advocates performing the duty both of attorney and counsel. They are obliged to undertake the defence of criminals, but are entitled to their fees if the parties, for whom they act, have the means of defraying them. In the event of conviction, the goods of the offender are liable for the costs of the prosecution and the defence.

The office of Prévôt, in some measure, answers to that of Sheriff in England. As an officer of criminal justice, he has the custody of prisoners after their committal for trial; and it is his duty to see the sentence of the Court carried into execution. He holds his office for life, and is elected by the States in the same manner as the Jurats. His salary is 14*l.* per annum, to which, we presume, fees must be added.

The Greffier is the keeper of the records of the Court. It is his duty to register the actes and proceedings of the Bailiff and Jurats in criminal matters. In certain criminal proceedings he also records the interrogatory of the prisoner, and takes the examinations of the witnesses. He is appointed by the Crown, and holds office during pleasure. His office, as well as that of the Prévôt, may be discharged by deputy. He has a salary of 40*l.* per annum, with fees which he rates, after the payment of clerks, under 150*l.* per annum. He complains, and we think not without justice, that, while the salaries of other officers have been much increased, his salary has remained unaltered, though his duties have become more heavy.

The Serjeant is the Huissier of the Court: he also issues the summonses to parties and witnesses in criminal proceedings. He receives his appointment from the Crown. He has a salary of 50*l.* per annum.

The Constables also may be considered officers of the Royal Court. Each parish has two Constables, elected by the rate-payers in the mode before stated. Their power of acting is not confined to the limits of their respective parishes, but extends throughout the whole Island. On their election they take an oath of office before the Royal Court.

Besides the two Constables which St. Peter Port has, like the country parishes, there are, in that parish, four Assistant Constables who are appointed by the Douzaine of the parish. No qualification is required for the office of Assistant Constable, not even that of being a rate-payer. They are not ex officio members of the Douzaine. They were first appointed in the year 1736 by an Ordinance of the Royal Court, strictly as Assistants to the Head Constable. By a subsequent Ordinance of 1799, they were empowered to do all acts, in the absence of the Constables, which appertain to that office as far as regards the police of the town parish: it is, however, considered that their authority, like that of the principal Constables, extends throughout the Island.

The Constables and their Assistants constitute the whole Police of the Island, properly so called. Formerly it was usual for the Constables to obtain the assistance of the soldiers of the garrison in apprehending offenders. But, by an order made by the present Lieutenant Governor, 12th April, 1844, approved of by the Secretary at War and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, neither the Bailiff, nor the Royal Court, nor the Constables and Assistant Constables, can claim military assistance, unless with the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor. This is conceded only in the event of fires by night or day, and of great or dangerous riot.

To supply any want of force on the part of the ordinary Police, the Constables may, in case of necessity, apply to the Court for additional aid; whereupon persons presented by the Constables and Douzaine are sworn in to act as Special Constables, either for a limited period or jusques à autre ordre. In November, 1838, twelve special Constables were appointed for the parish of St. Peter Port to act for a limited time, in consequence of a number of robberies that had then lately been committed. When that time had expired, they had been found so useful, as assistants to the Police during the time for which they had been sworn in, that they were again presented, and have been since continued. The practice is, to present those only, as Special Constables, who have served the office of Assistant Constable.

As officers of police, the Assistant Constables and the Special Constables have the same power with the Constables. The Senior Constable, however, is considered chief of the Parochial Police; and the Assistant Constables are subordinate officers who ought to act under his directions.

It is the duty of the Constables to apprehend all parties charged with breach of the peace or crime, whether taken in the fact, or on the information and complaint of the party injured, or on mere suspicion. For this no warrant of a Magistrate or mandate from the Royal Court is required. The Constables act on their own authority in a quasi magisterial capacity. They ought, however, with all convenient speed, to make their report to the Bailiff and Law Officers of the Crown, and take their instructions with regard to detaining their prisoners in custody or liberating them, on a summons to appear at the next Court-day. A section of the Royal Court sits, every Thursday, for the purpose of hearing the charges of the Constables: no criminal case can be brought before the Court but by their presentment. They may, however, be set in motion by the Court, either immediately or through the Crown Officers, on complaint of their refusal to act; but an individual has no means of procuring a warrant for the apprehension of a party on a charge of crime, or a summons to compel his appearance to answer before the Court.

The Royal Court exercises criminal jurisdiction by means of the Cour Ordinaire and the Cour en Corps. The former acts as a Police Court, and as a Court of Instruction Criminelle; the latter for the trial of crimes and misdemeanours.

The Cour Ordinaire is generally called the Cour du Quartier, from the Jurats attending in rotation, in pursuance of an ordinance directing four of the twelve Jurats to attend by turns at the opening of the Court after every Chefs Plaids, and to continue to sit, every Court day, till the next Chefs Plaids; after which they are to be relieved by four other Jurats. The presence of the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff, and at least two Jurats, is requisite to constitute the Court. These, however, need not be the Jurats du Quartier. But, although two Jurats with the Bailiff form a quorum, all have the right to be present and take part in the proceedings. The sittings of the Court are held every Thursday.

The Cour en Corps consists of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant, and, at the least, seven Jurats. It holds its sittings for the trial of crimes and misdemeanours every Saturday during term time. But it is usual, even during vacation, for the Court to assemble for the trial of a prisoner, on application being made to it for that purpose.

As a Police Court, the Cour du Quartier exercises summary jurisdiction in criminal cases of small importance, such as assault, breaches of the peace, and disorderly conduct. The practice also is to deal summarily with petty thefts. The limit of its jurisdiction is marked by the extent of punishment that can be inflicted. This cannot exceed imprisonment for a month, the whole or any portion of which may be in solitary confinement, and on bread and water. Whenever the offence charged, supposing it to be proved to its full extent, would be considered to be adequately punished by the infliction of such a penalty, the practice of the Cour du Quartier is to take it summarily. The opinion, however, of the Bailiff is that, when the matter is in the nature of a crime, such as theft, the party would be entitled, if he insisted upon it, to be tried by the full Court; but that, when it is mere disorderly conduct, and little more than a breach of the peace or an assault without matter of aggravation, the Cour du Quartier would be quite justified in taking it summarily, even in invitum. It also exercises summary jurisdiction in proceedings for penalties for the breach of Ordonnances where the penalty does not exceed thirty livres tournois. The Crown Officers form a constituent part of the Court, while acting in exercise of its summary jurisdiction. All proceedings are at their instance; and no sentence is valid unless given after hearing their conclusions.

The Cour du Quartier, as a Court of Instruction Criminelle, acts, in the first instance, as an inquest of crime. This is either a Grande Enquête or a Petite Enquête. The former is not of frequent occurrence. It takes place when a crime has been committed but the perpetrator is unknown, so that no charge is made against any particular individual. The Grande Enquête having been, upon due consideration, octroyée by an acte which the Court gives to the Law Officers, the Court, then, investigates the circumstances of the crime by examining on oath all witnesses who present themselves, with a view of discovering the guilty party. Inquests in the nature of our proceedings before the Coroner are also held before the Cour Ordinaire, and are instances of the Grande Enquête. But that form of inquiry is not confined to cases of sudden or violent death; on the contrary, it is applicable to all crimes and misdemeanours. On the evidence pointing to a particular individual as the author of the crime, he is apprehended, and a Petite Enquête takes place, where the investigation is limited to the examination of witnesses in support or disproof of the charge against him.

Both the Grande and Petite Enquête are probably referable to the proceedings by the Bas Justiciers, noticed in our First Report as the origin of the Enditement in Jersey. The Petite Enquête seems to have been formerly an inquiry preliminary to the apprehension of the party accused, and furnished the grounds on which a warrant for his apprehension was granted. It was anciently conducted for the most part by the Vicomte in Normandy, whose duties in this respect are particularly described in Terrien, Lib. xii. Chap. ii. There is no officer in Guernsey corresponding with the Vicomte of the Coustumier; but the "Approbation des Loix" states: "nous usons du premier & second chapitre, reservé ce qui est dit du Viconte, ces choses appartiennent à l'office du Baillif et Jurez."

According to the modern practice, the Procureur and Contrôle are present, and take part in the proceedings of the Enquête, whether Grande or Petite. But this is apparently an innovation; they have no specific functions to perform there, and do not, as upon other occasions, constitute part of the Court. It is also evident that, according to the practice of continental Normandy, under an Ordonnance of Francis I., 1539, the information obtained by the Enquête was the ground on which the Procureur instituted criminal proceedings; and, on his commencing the prosecution, a prise de corps for the apprehension of the party accused, or a summons for his appearance, ajournment personel, issued according to the circumstances of the case.

The proceeding by Petite Enquête, whether resulting from the information obtained on the Grande Enquête, or (which is the ordinary course) from the discovery of facts supposed to implicate a particular individual, takes place only on the presentment of a Constable. Where the Constable has declined to proceed, and the case still appears to the Court to require investigation, the Court, either at the suggestion of the Law Officers of the Crown, or upon the application of the party insisting on the charge, directs the Constable to take up the case. If he were still to refuse to do so, it seems that he would be punishable, but that the case could then be brought on only by being placed in the hands of some other Constable.

On presentment by the Constable, the investigation takes place at a sitting au secret of the Cour du Quartier, in the absence of the accused; the Law Officers of the Crown, the Greffier, the Prévôt and the Serjeant alone being present, besides the members of the Court.

Upon the information obtained from the preliminary examination, an "acte d'accusation" is framed by the Court, charging the accused with the facts deposed to by the witnesses. He is then called before the Court. The "acte d'accusation" is read to him; and, if he denies the crime, he is questioned by the Court upon the evidence previously obtained. This is called the "interrogatoire." It is also taken at a secret sitting of the Court; the prisoner being alone, and not allowed the assistance of a legal adviser. The present practice, however, requires that he be told that he cannot be compelled to answer the questions of the Court, and that what he says will be used against him at the trial. This is a departure from the old law in Terrien and the Approbation, by which the accused, in the event of refusing to answer or not answering pertinently, would be subjected to the torture. We have pointed out, in our First Report, that the practice of torture seems to have been engrafted upon the Ancient Norman Custom: and we believe that, at present, it is legal in Guernsey, according to the strict theory of the law.

Upon the result of this examination, he is discharged or sent to take his trial before the Cour en Corps. If he is sent to trial, an acte of the Court is framed, reciting the charge against him, and ordering his imprisonment, either absolutely or in default of bail, and directing the law officers of the Crown to proceed against him.

Up to this point of the proceedings, although the Law Officers of the Crown have been present, as advisers of the Court, the whole conduct of the case has rested with the Court alone. The Court takes the preliminary examinations, decides whether the case shall be disposed of in a summary manner or sent to the Cour en Corps for trial, frames the acte d'accusation, and directs the mode in which the trial shall proceed, which materially affects the amount of punishment. The Acte d'Accusation answers to an English indictment, except that it is the act of a Court, and that it contains a direction as to the committal of the prisoner. It generally conveys fuller information than an English indictment, and appears to possess the additional advantage of being less subject to mere formal objections. The functions of the Law Officers of the Crown as public prosecutors then commence; the subsequent proceedings are carried on in their name; and they have the future management of the case. In point of fact, however, the intervention of the Law Officers takes place earlier. They are present at the examination au secret; they advise the Court; and one of them ordinarily administers the interrogatoire. But, in theory, these are merely the acts of the Court.

There are two modes of trying indictable offences in Guernsey. In each case the proceedings, from the forming of the Acte d'accusation, are before the Cour en Corps. One mode of trial is by Procès extraordinaire, usually called Au grand criminel; the other by Procès ordinaire, called Au petit criminel, or Au criminel, or A l'ordinaire. We have already spoken of this distinction, and have pointed out that it rests upon the nature of the punishment assigned to the offence, which is technically described in the Acte d'accusation.

The commencement of the proceedings in both modes is the same. A summons, under the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown and the Serjeant of the Court, first issues, requiring the appearance of the accused, whether in prison or out on bail, before the Cour en Corps, on a day named. If the proceedings are Au grand criminel, the form of the summons is "à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix;" and the act with which he is charged is stated to have been committed "félonieusement." If the proceedings are A l'ordinaire, and the offence be punishable by fine and imprisonment only, the summons is "à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne:" if the punishment may include flogging, pillory, or a banishment for less than seven years, the summons, instead of the word amende, has the words châtiment corporel. It repeats the contents of the charging part of the Acte d'accusation. On his appearance, the accused has the assistance of an Advocate to defend him, and is allowed a copy of his interrogatoire. The Advocate acts gratuitously, wherever the prisoner is unable to defray the expense of the defence. The prisoner's plea is taken at the time of choosing his Advocate. If he pleads Not guilty, the Law Officers of the Crown are ordered to proceed to the proof of the charge; and an acte of the proceedings is drawn up.

Up to this point the proceedings are the same, whether the trial is "Au grand criminel" or "A l'ordinaire." But the mode of taking the evidence and conducting the trial differs essentially in the two cases.

The proceedings "Au grand criminel" are as follows.

After the case has been sent to proof, the first step is to take the examination of the witnesses in support of the prosecution. The preliminary proceedings, as before stated, are in the nature of an inquest to ascertain the fact of crime. Of these no record is kept, except the interrogatoire of the accused. The witnesses are, therefore, again summoned before the Cour du Quartier by the Law Officers and the Queen's Serjeant. Their number can in no case exceed twelve; for which limitation no authority or reason was suggested. On their appearance, the evidence of each witness is taken separately on oath, at a secret sitting of the Court, in the absence of the party charged and of his counsel. The Greffier is present and takes down each question as it is put to the witness and the answer. The depositions, so taken down, are severally signed by the members of the Court. The evidence is then said to be paraphé. A copy is also made and signed by the Greffier, and given to the Law Officers. When the examinations of all the witnesses for the prosecution have been taken, a day is assigned, for which each witness is summoned a second time before the same tribunal. His evidence is then read over to him; and he is asked, after being again sworn, whether he confirms and corroborates his deposition, and whether he wishes to make any addition to it or withdraw anything he has said. This process is called the "Récolement des témoins." This differs from the practice in Terrien, according to which the original informations were preserved, and the witnesses, after the accusation had been framed by the Procureur, were only recalled for the purpose of confirming their previous testimony at the Récolement.

At the next meeting of the Court, the prisoner is summoned to appear and see the witnesses, whose names are inserted in the summons, confronted with him; and he is then furnished with a copy of their depositions. This is called the "Confrontation des témoins." On this occasion the prisoner has the assistance of an Advocate, who, by a late order in Council, is furnished with copies of the evidence, on the morning of the Confrontation. Each witness is then brought before the Court in the presence of the prisoner, who is asked whether he has any objection to make to him. If he has, the nature of it is stated by his Counsel, and a note of it taken by the Court. The witness is then sworn afresh, and his deposition and récolement read over to him. He is then asked whether the prisoner is the person mentioned in his deposition; after which, the Counsel for the prisoner is at liberty to cross-examine him. The questions and answers of the witness, on the cross-examination, are taken down by the Greffier in the same manner as in the examination in chief. The evidence on the part of the Crown is then closed, subject to any objections on the part of the prisoner which have been reserved for the consideration of the Cour en Corps at the trial.

The prisoner is then at liberty to produce his evidence in defence. But, before so doing, he is compelled to give in a list of his witnesses, who are also limited to twelve in number, and to state the facts he proposes to establish by their testimony. If the Court considers the proposed evidence relevant, the witnesses are summoned by the Crown Officers. They are then examined in chief by the Counsel for the prisoner, and cross-examined by the Crown Lawyers; the questions and answers being taken down in writing by the Greffier in the manner before described.

It will thus have been seen that, in the proceedings "Au grand criminel," the Cour du Quartier conducts the preliminary inquiry, frames the acte d'accusation against the prisoner, and takes the whole of the evidence in the case, subject to the objections of the prisoner to its admissibility, which are reserved for discussion by the Cour en Corps. The case is then ripe for trial, which, regularly, can take place only in Term Time.

At the trial, the Cour en Corps, consisting of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and, at least, seven Jurats, being assembled, the proceedings commence by reading the acte d'accusation and the interrogatoire. The Jurats may be challenged, if they are so nearly connected as first cousins with the accused. But we believe that few instances of such challenges occur. Then the depositions of the witnesses, as well in support of the accusation as for the defence, are read. The Counsel for the prisoner next addresses the Court, and is heard upon all legal exceptions to the proceedings, as well as upon the evidence. After the defence is concluded, the Law Officers of the Crown are heard. Their office is to state the result of the evidence, to advise the Court on matters of law, and to suggest the sentence which they deem suited to the case. This is technically called "les conclusions des Officiers de la Reine." The Bailiff then sums up the whole of the case, as well on the law as the facts, and the Jurats severally give their opinions upon the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and, in the event of their finding him guilty, on the amount of punishment to be inflicted. The decision of the greater number constitutes the sentence of the Court, the Bailiff, in the event of the numbers being equal, having a casting vote, but otherwise having no voice in the verdict or the sentence. The Bailiff passes the sentence. In strictness, if he be dissatisfied with the opinion of the majority, he has the power of suspending the passing of judgment for forty days. Some doubt, however, has arisen whether this power be not confined to civil cases.

The proceedings at a trial "A l'ordinaire" are as follows.

Up to the point of taking the plea of the prisoner, and the choosing the prisoner's counsel, the proceedings are precisely the same as those "Au grand criminel." The mode of proof at the trial is the only essential difference between them. The witnesses on both sides are summoned by the Law Officers of the Crown for the day of trial; those for the defence, from a list furnished by the prisoner. The number on each side is limited to twelve. The proceedings commence by the "évocation" of the witnesses, all of whom, on being called, appear together at the bar of the Court; and, if no objection is taken to the admissibility of any of them, an oath is administered to all by the Bailiff. The trial then commences by reading the acte d'accusation and the interrogatoire of the prisoner. The witnesses in support of the charge are then examined vivâ voce, in the presence of the prisoner, and cross-examined by his counsel. The witnesses for the defence are also examined and cross-examined in the same manner. The evidence being concluded on both sides, the Counsel for the prisoner first addresses the Court on the whole case, and then the Law Officers of the Crown. The Court then proceeds to give the verdict and sentence, as in the mode before detailed respecting the trial "Au grand criminel."

The proceeding called Cause en Adjonction, in which one of the Law Officers of the Crown is joined to the Partie Civile in actions for libel, slander and battery, exists in Guernsey. The nature of this proceeding, as practised in Jersey, has been described in our First Report; but some differences in the modes of instituting and carrying it on in the two Islands render a separate notice of it necessary here.

The first step in the cause is a summons served on the party complained of. On his appearance, the adjonction of the Law Officers of the Crown is prayed and permitted by the Court, as of course, unless cause is shewn to the contrary. If he makes default, the adjonction also takes place as of course. The cause then proceeds in the name of the plaintiff, "et les Officiers de la Reine joints." The Crown Lawyers have claimed the privilege of sending the first summons in Causes en Adjonction, and have insisted that no Advocate, in strictness, can do so without their sanction. The present Procureur de la Reine, however, is of opinion that there is no such exclusive right as to the first summons; and he supports his view by arguing that the first summons precedes, and is intended to lead to, a decision of the Court upon the question whether the Adjonction ought to be granted at all; an argument which appears to us to have great weight. The Law Officers also claimed the exclusive right of pleading in such causes, the one for the plaintiff, and the other for the defendant. This was contested by the Advocates, who presented a petition to the Privy Council, in 1809, denying the right. Subsequently the matter in controversy was, by an Order in Council, referred to the Royal Court for decision. The result was that the right of the Crown Lawyers to plead, the one for the plaintiff and the other for the defendant, in Causes en Adjonction was confirmed, with this modification: that it should be lawful to either of the parties in the cause to employ an Advocate to plead for him in addition, who should be heard before the two Officers of the Crown. This continues to be the law at present.

The practical effect is that no Cause en Adjonction can be prosecuted without consent of the Procureur or Contrôle. The Court may refuse the Adjonction of the Crown Lawyers, but cannot compel it. This has been in effect decided by a case recently before the Court. Proceedings en Adjonction were commenced by one of the Jurats of the Royal Court, against his Excellency General Napier, the

GUERNSEY.

Lieutenant Governor of the Island, for an alleged libel. On the refusal of the Crown Lawyers to commence the action, a summons was issued by one of the Advocates of the Court; and, on default being made in appearance, permission for the Adjonction followed as a matter of course. The Law Officers, however, refused to be parties to the proceedings, on these several grounds: that, as Officers of the Crown, they could not proceed against the Governor; that the Governor was not amenable to the Court; and that they had been commanded by the Government at home not to proceed. The plaintiff, upon this, complained to the Court of a denial of justice; and the Court held itself incapacitated from proceeding further in the cause, for want of the Adjonction of the Law Officers. This case involved, not only the question as to the power of the Law Officers to refuse their adjonction, but also the question how far the Governor was amenable to the Court for an act done in his private capacity. So far, therefore, as the Royal Court can decide, it appears to be settled that the Court cannot order an adjonction where the Law Officers refuse their sanction: but, as far as we can understand the decision, the Court did not determine how far the particular grounds assigned by those functionaries for their refusal were valid or not. The second of the grounds assigned was supported by a precedent of the date of 1783. To us, it rather seems probable that a complaint by one of the Royal Court, or indeed by any one, of an act done by the Governor is one of the "casus nimis ardui" spoken of in the Constitutions of King John, and properly reserved for the judgment of Your Majesty in Council. The Royal Court, however, seems to have preferred placing the decision on grounds which make the right of a party to a civil remedy depend on the will of the Law Officers of the Crown, to the risk of appearing to abandon one of the supposed privileges of the Court.

The proceedings, after the adjonction is granted, proceed much in the same way as civil causes, the principal distinction, up to the time of the pronouncing judgment, being in respect of the Counsel employed. But the judgment includes, if the Court thinks fit, both damages to the party and a fine to the Crown.

We have now to offer our opinion upon the constitution and practice of the tribunals.

The law which regulates the criminal practice in Terrien is far more defined and systematic than that which relates to crimes and punishments. It differs, however, essentially from the proceedings under the old Norman law. The Enqueste du Pays, described in our First Report, had become obsolete at the time when Terrien wrote. After describing the ancient mode of proceeding, he goes on to say, (l. xii. c. 28. l.): "Toute accusation criminelle se poursuit aujourd'huy par la voye de Justice, selon la forme introduite par les ordonnances Royaux:" and again (l. xii. c. 31. l.): "se fait le procèz d'un prisonnier selon la forme contenue aux ordonnances Royaux." These are laws, for the most part, of Francis the First. It is difficult to suppose that they formed part of the customs or usages of Guernsey at the time of the Approbation des Loix. The present practice, however, is essentially derived from them, and with very slight variations, most of which have been already noticed, is in perfect accordance with their enactments.

The Police, both as the body charged with the general maintenance of the peace, and as comprising the individuals through whose intervention all offences must be brought under the cognizance of the Court, become a necessary subject of consideration.

The extent and nature of the authority of the Senior Constable is undefined; different opinions are entertained upon the subject; and, whatever the authority may be, there appears to be no means of enforcing it. Mr. Mellish, a very active constable of St. Peter's Port, told us "that there is nothing that wants regulating more than that in the Island of Guernsey." And this we may state as the unanimous opinion, with respect to all the constabulary functions, of all who gave evidence on the subject. There is no organized mode of acting, nor any report systematically made from the Assistant Constables to the Head Constable; neither is there any day or night patrol of the streets, except where some unusual danger to the peace is anticipated.

In the discharge of their duties, the Constables, in practice, assume a discretion, which appears to us inconsistent with their functions as police officers. The law is understood to entrust cases of mere drunkenness or disorderly conduct to their discretion, to be presented or not to the Court, as they may think fit; but, where a party has been once taken into custody on a charge of violence, "voie de fait," or crime, the offence must be dealt with by the Court. How far Constables are justified in refusing to entertain such a charge, or permitting it to be afterwards withdrawn, or are warranted in investigating its truth before apprehending the party accused, is left in doubt. Such discretion is, however, assumed by them.

In one case, an Advocate of the Royal Court had stabbed an Englishman with a knife, upon some fancied provocation, inflicting two wounds upon him. The circumstances of the case were of a nature which rendered the party wounded an unwilling prosecutor. The matter, therefore, although known to the Constables, was not, in the first instance, brought before the Court. It becoming, however, afterwards the subject of public talk, the Court directed an inquiry which terminated in the trial and conviction of the offender. But it does not appear to have occurred to the Court that the Constable had been guilty of any dereliction of duty in forbearing to present the case as soon as he was aware of the crime.

In another case, a complaint was made against the captain of a foreign vessel, for ill using one of his ship-boys. The Assistant Constable had himself been the master of a vessel; and, being satisfied that the boy had not been beaten more severely than masters of vessels are in the habit of beating their apprentices, he took upon himself to tell the boy that he had better go aboard again. He accordingly returned to the ship. The ill treatment was repeated with aggravation; and the boy died, as it was alleged, in consequence. The master was afterwards tried for the murder by the Royal Court, and acquitted.

The mode also of reporting the apprehension of offenders to the Bailiff and the Law Officers is very informal. No official books of the charges are kept; and the proceedings are altogether irregular. This will best be explained by one of the cases brought before us.

An Assistant Constable had taken a man up for drunkenness and assault, one Thursday, after the sitting of the Court. He was conveyed to prison, and kept there till the following Wednesday, when the Constable wrote to the gaoler to say that he, the Constable, was too ill to bring the prisoner before the Court, and that the gaoler might let the prisoner out. The latter was accordingly set at liberty. This was regular, so far as the gaoler was concerned; persons in confinement, before examination, though in the gaol, being still in custody of the Constable. The man afterwards proceeded by a cause en adjonction against the Constable for the false imprisonment. It appeared, on the trial, that the Constable, while conveying him to prison, had met the Procureur in the street and told him he had a man in the cart who had behaved very ill, detailing the circumstances. This constituted the defence to the action. The Court held that, the man having committed an assault and being in a state of drunkenness, the Constable was justified in putting him in prison, and that, having mentioned the case to the Procureur, he was relieved from any responsibility for his detention. The plaintiff's case was, accordingly, dismissed with costs. According to the law, as represented to us, if the charge was mere drunkenness, the Constable had no right to detain the prisoner so long; if it was more, he was bound to report to the Bailiff and the Law Officers, and had no power to liberate him after he had made his report. It is possible the Court was desirous of protecting the officer who had acted bonâ fide and without malice. But, in any view, a greater degree of regularity in the proceedings would have prevented any charge against the Constable, and any imputation on the Court.

Another department of the Constables' duty, connected with the Police of the Island, is the treatment of strangers. The relief of the stranger poor is administered by them. By an Ordonnance of the Royal Court of the 30th of April, 1821, they are also authorized to prevent persons of evil life, or without means, or who have no occupation, from settling in the Island. The Ordonnance goes on to direct that no favour be shown to such persons, particularly at the beginning of their residence. Les personnes de mauvaise conduite, les ivrognes, les fainéants ne doivent point trouver grâce dans leur paroisses, particulièrement dans le commencement de leur séjour. The Constables are authorized by their office to send them out of the Island, apprising them that they may appeal to the Court. They are directed to act with strictness (sévir) against persons of this description, but to show indulgence towards those who, after residence more or less long, have given constant proof of good conduct and industry. We were informed that, in practice, the Constables never proceed to remove strangers from the Island for disorderly conduct, unless by sentence of the Court, and that those only who have become chargeable are, in point of fact, sent away on the authority of the Constable. But it is questionable whether even the Court ought to have the power of removing British subjects from the Island on so vague a charge. It appears to us that, in matters of crime, the punishment of all ought to be equal: and we think it right to draw your Majesty's attention to the fact that this Ordonnance is an instance of the exercise of that legislative power, by the Royal Court, which we have already alluded to as incompatible with its functions as a Court of Justice. The removal of aliens evidently depends on different considerations.

A party becomes chargeable who applies for relief, or who is in such a situation that the Constable thinks it necessary to relieve him and does relieve him. As many as four hundred persons have been sent from the Island by the Constables in the course of one year as chargeable. Cases of individual hardship certainly sometimes occur. In case of refusal, a complaint is made to the Court stating the party to be "au charge." An inquiry then takes place as to the fact of chargeability; and, if it is satisfactorily established, an order of the Court is made for the removal of the pauper, unless he can find security not to continue chargeable. Inquiry is also made into the place of his birth; but in effect he is almost always sent to the nearest English port. The annual cost of the stranger poor in the parish of St. Peter Port, including the expense of their passes from the Island, amounts to 800*l.*; and the increasing communication between England and Guernsey makes this a subject of great importance. It falls within the scope of our inquiry to notice it only in connection with the duties of the Police: but it appears to us to deserve the attention of Your Majesty's Government. It is of course proper that the Island should be relieved from the burthen of maintaining the stranger poor; but, in the mode in which the law is administered, the being a stranger and in want comes to be considered in the nature of an offence to be treated with more or less rigour at the discretion of the Constables. This is clearly objectionable. Neither does the power of appealing to the Court offer sufficient security. It is seldom acted on; and the shape which it assumes in practice is an application by the Constables to compel the departure of those who refuse obedience to their orders. We think that the whole of the law with regard to the relief and removal of the stranger poor requires revision.

The peace of the Island is generally well preserved; and the instances of crime are rare. This we attribute, not to the system of Police, but to the smallness of the Island, and especially of the principal town, and to the absence of those habits which, in richer and more populous countries, produce at once a temptation to crime and a population liable to the temptation. To these circumstances, also, we attribute the fact that so little attention has been directed to the state of the Police, and that the system remains in so rude and unsettled a state. Had an emergency arisen, it would, we think, have been felt, and in case of any future emergency it will be felt, that much change is necessary. The system is defective from the want of a superintending officer; from the Constables having other avocations, the Head Constables being for the most part gentlemen or merchants, and the Assistant Constables tradesmen, who are glad to be relieved from the office as soon as their term of duty expires; from the absence of any law strictly defining the duties and limiting the power of the Police; and particularly from the connection of the Head Constables with the Royal Court, as members of the States of Election and assistants at Courts of Chefs Plaids. The amount of the population and the state of public opinion do not perhaps necessitate so great a change as we were compelled to recommend in Jersey; but the evil, although less in degree, is the same in nature, and will probably, at some time or other, demand the same remedy. We think that the inferior officers of Police ought to be paid, and that some at least of them should exclusively and permanently devote themselves to the duty, as a distinct calling: and that, if the present mode of election be retained, the Constables should be placed under the controul of some responsible officer. It further appears to us that the office of presiding in the Douzaine, and acting in the States of Election, ought not to be joined with Police duties. These functions, each important in itself, require very different qualifications: and, if they were separated, the result would probably be that each would be better performed.

We are of opinion that the method by which alone offences are brought within the cognizance of the Court is objectionable. We see no reason for intrusting the Police with so large a discretion; nor do we think that parties desiring to prosecute have, in the present system, sufficiently ample means of producing cases.

We recommend that, as we have already suggested for the case of Jersey, there should be three modes of prosecuting. We will for the present suppose that some tribunal for preliminary inquiry (either that now existing, as the Cour du Quartier, or any which it may be thought desirable to substitute) is to exist, distinct from the Court which is to try the case. We suggest that every individual should have the power of bringing a charge before this Court, and of obtaining a warrant for compelling the appearance of the accused party, where such Court, on an ex parte application, decides that the case ought to go on. We think, also, that the Law Officers should have the power, ex officio, to demand a warrant. And that, where the Court of preliminary inquiry has refused a warrant, it should be competent to the party to bring the case by affidavit before the Court which is to have the power of reviewing (as we shall hereafter suggest) the proceedings at trials; and that such Court shall then grant or refuse a warrant. For the subordinate details which we would recommend as to this stage, we refer to our First Report, page xliv.
